Ah, yes, that Dick Cheney, the quintessential optimist, a most cheerful fellow who's been known to wander about the White House whistling "Always Look on the Bright Side of Life."

Bush, making the media rounds in a State of the Union follow-up, also lamented the nastiness of the nation's capital. "And there is distrust in Washington," he told NPR's Juan Williams on Monday. "I am surprised, frankly, at the amount of distrust that exists in this town. And I'm sorry it's the case, and I'll work hard to try to elevate it." As Bush said in the same interview, "I'm not that good at pronouncing words."

DOJ_NMG_0126029

Bush told Fox News's Neil Cavuto that, despite his dismal polls, "I'm going to sprint to the finish" in his final two years and that he has had one whale of a fun time being president.

"I've got too much on my mind to worry about, you know, standing in the polls or what life's going to be in 2009," he said. "This may come as a shock to you, but I have found this to be an exhilarating, joyous experience."

Even though he had to give up jogging? Almost died chewing that pretzel? Got that thumpin' a couple months ago?

Nuclear Security: Don't Need It or Don't Have It

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission ruled this week that the country's 103 nuclear power plants don't need to protect themselves from possible attacks by terrorists flying airplanes into them.

That saved plant operators billions of dollars. But it probably didn't do much to make folks living near those plants feel much safer.

Meanwhile, people who live near nuclear weapons plants are finding out that those highly trained bomb-sniffing dogs the Department of Energy uses to detect explosives and to catch intruders aren't exactly up to snuff.

In fact, "half of the canine teams we observed failed the explosive detection portion of the operational evaluations," the DOE inspector general reported this week after visiting three DOE sites.

What's more, "each of the canines we observed in suspect apprehension demonstrations failed to respond to at least one of the handler's commands," the report found, and the dogs "were not receiving the minimum number of hours of weekly training for explosives detection." The IG said the DOE canine programs should be reviewed, given that "explosives are a terrorist's weapon of choice" these days.

A Florida Republican? He'll Feel Right at Home.

Good news from the 100 block of D Street SE on Capitol Hill! This storied block was once a GOP bastion and home to six Republican House members. Four lost in November; one, Porter Goss (Fla.), went to run the CIA and was bounced from there; and the sixth was another Floridian, Mark Foley.

But Republicans still appear attracted to the neighborhood. Our colleague Mary Ann Akers reports in her blog -- http://www.washingtonpost.com/sleuth-- that incoming Rep. Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.), apparently unaware of the D Street jinx, has bought former Florida GOP congressman Clay Shaw's house there, pretty much sight unseen.

Treasury and Transportation Losing Top Aides

Taking off . . . Treasury Undersecretary for International Affairs Tim Adams-- chief of staff at the agency for the first three years of the administration, policy director on the 2004 reelection campaign and in his present job since early 2005 -- is calling it quits. Too much travel -- more than a third of 2006 on the road -- and three little kids getting older every day. No departure date set yet.

Veteran GOP operative Maria Cino is leaving March 2 "after two terrific years" as deputy secretary of transportation, she announced last week in an internal memo. She said she was "pleased to have had the opportunity to be acting secretary" -- fleetingly. She is reported to be headed north to Minneapolis to manage the 2008 Republican National Convention.

Soaring War Funding Raises Concerns About Scope Of Spending (USAT)

By John Yaukey

USA Today, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — Next week, the Bush administration is expected to send Congress what could be one of the largest supplemental spending requests in history — $100 billion or more, primarily for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

It's supposed to cover basic costs, including personnel, equipment repairs and replacement, ammunition and other directly related operating expenses not covered by the Pentagon's regular annual budget for fiscal year 2007.

But military budget analysts and tax watchdogs say if the past is any indicator, the Pentagon and the Congress will try to load this off-budget shopping cart with expensive new weapons and pork for the voters that has nothing to do with defense or any of the disaster relief that emergency spending bills sometimes fund as well.

A recent memo by Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England raised red flags by recommending that the various armed services use the upcoming emergency appropriation not only to fund operating expenses in the two wars, but also to go after money for "overall efforts related to the global war on terror."

That was an invitation to a feeding frenzy, say analysts who track military spending.

DOJ_NMG_0126030

"These supplemental requests are very slushy," said Chris Hellman, a defense analyst with the Center for Arms Control. "You don't have anywhere near the amount of scrutiny and oversight with these as you do with the regular budget so you can get away with a lot."

Critics of emergency spending to fund the military also say it hides the true financial costs of the wars from the public by separating them out from the regular budget.

Since 2001, the year U.S. forces invaded Afghanistan, Congress has approved $383 billion in extra military spending on top of the Pentagon's growing annual baseline budget.

Changes ahead

The upcoming supplemental bill is intended to be the last for the Pentagon. Under pressure from Congress, the Pentagon henceforth is supposed to be calculating what its wars will cost and request the money in the annual base budget.

While budget hawks say getting rid of the military supplementals is a step in the right direction, the readjustment will make for some eye-popping dollar figures next week as the budget process gets underway. That's because the upcoming emergency funding request for the rest of fiscal 2007 will coincide with the Bush administration's 2008 budget proposal, which will include the war costs normally dealt with down the road in supplementals.

The net affect will be requests for defense spending that will total as much as three-quarters of a trillion dollars.

"You will see some whopping numbers next week — no question about it," said Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, a Washington, D.C., watchdog organization.

Lawmakers argue that major purchases such as weapons systems and new cutting-edge equipment should be requested in the annual budget because they can be tracked more closely there and cut it if necessary.

The Pentagon's annual budget request comes with hundreds of pages of explanatory notes while supplemental requests contain scant information about how the money will be spent.

One 2006 emergency request for $68 billion included five pages explaining how $33 billion in the request for military and operations and maintenance costs would be spent.

England argues that supplementals make sense because it's much easier to pay for a war periodically rather than try and project the costs two years into the future, which the regular budget process would require.

"Wars are highly dynamic and when circumstances change, we need a mechanism to handle it," he said. "Supplementals capture the reality of warfare."

Loading up

They're also a magnet for political pork once lawmakers get a hold of them during the approval process.

Once Congress got done with a 2005 emergency supplemental request, it included $24 million for maintenance of forest roads in California, $10 million for wastewater facilities in Pennsylvania, $2 million for a desalination facility in New Mexico, $2 million for a chemistry lab at Drew University in New Jersey and much more.

Sometimes, Congress and the Pentagon work together to lard these supplementals.

In an emergency request last spring, the Pentagon asked for 12 C-17 transport jets, which defense analysts said should have been paid for with the base budget.

Lawmakers not only approved the request but also bumped it up by 10 jets.

That was a boon to the community of Long Beach where 6,500 Californians are employed helping to make the jets — all thanks to a powerful senator who sits on the committee that oversees spending.

"I hope that this funding is the first step in ensuring that more C-17s will be built in the coming years," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., told her constituents in a news release.

How Democrats Work With Tight Purse (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON

After blitzing six top-priority bills through the House in their first 100 legislative hours, Democrats struck a quick deal on unfinished spending bills from the last Congress, and made it look easy.

It's the first test of whether the new majority on Capitol Hill can keep promises to voters to rein in federal budget deficits, yet also fund its party's defining priorities.

Lawmakers face tough deadlines: Money to run the government for fiscal year (FY) 2007 dries up on Feb. 15 unless Congress acts, and President Bush's budget for FY 2008 arrives at the Capitol this Monday morning. In a bid to move quickly,

DOJ_NMG_0126031

House Democrats precooked a master compromise with the Senate Wednesday that rolls all nine remaining spending bills into one.

The deal accepts the White House ceiling of $463.5 billion, avoiding a clash with Mr. Bush. But it carves out some $10 billion for "unmet needs," including veterans' healthcare, low-income housing, education, and some 500 research programs.

Not included were any new earmarks, or member projects, funding for a new round of military base closures, and the annual congressional pay raise. Republicans, who were not allowed to propose amendments on the Democratic bill, complained that they had been left out of the process, but more than one-quarter of the House GOP caucus voted for the bill.

"This is a process that was required by the failure of the last Congress to do its work," said House majority leader Steny Hoyer, before Wednesday's vote.

As the 109th Congress prepared to leave town in December, Rep. David Obey (D) of Wisconsin, who now chairs the House Appropriations Committee, warned that by their "act of abdication" as the majority party, Republicans had "given up any right to criticize in any way whatever devices we have to use in order to dispose of the unfinished business of this Congress."

In Washington terms, $10 billion is not much in a spending cycle that totals more than $2 trillion. But it sends a strong signal, reinforcing what Democrats say will be a key issue in the 2008 election campaign: their commitment to help the middle class.

"It doesn't take a lot of money to get a lock on this issue. It takes some well-publicized votes," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Brunswick, N.J. "It's an indication of where their heads and their hearts are. In the arcane world of symbolic politics, they really hit pay dirt."

Their targets for new spending include: $3.6 billion for veterans' healthcare, a $260 increase to the maximum Pell grant for some 5.3 million college students, $3.5 billion for federal highways, $1.4 billion for low-income housing, as well as new funds for low-performing schools, Head Start, special education, the National Institutes of Health, law enforcement, and global HIV/AIDS prevention.

This deal combines features of an omnibus spending bill, which rolls all unfinished spending bills into one, and a continuing resolution, which funds current programs at the level of the previous fiscal year.

Another selling point for voters is a ban on new congressional earmarks, which have figured in recent corruption cases involving members of Congress. "This is an earmark-free bill," says Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D) of Illinois, who chairs the Democratic Caucus. "To get this done with 57 Republican votes, that's a big deal."

But critics note the bill does not "turn off" some 28 earmarks that were funded in FY 2006, including $185 million for agricultural research projects and $50 million provided in FY 2004 to build a rain forest in Iowa. The prairie rainforest, arguably the most controversial after Alaska's $223 million "bridge to nowhere," has until Dec. 31, 2007, to find matching funds, a prospect that critics say is not likely to happen. In all, ongoing earmarks add up to at least $70 million, according to the Republican Study Committee, which represents conservative Republicans.

Still, anti-earmark groups praise Democrats for nixing all new earmarks, at least for a year. "It's a good thing to show that the country can survive without earmarks, but there's a danger that members of Congress may lobby agencies directly to get projects funded. That's a less transparent process than we already have," says Tom Finnegan, a spokesman for the watchdog group Citizens Against Government Waste.

"I can point to project after project in my district that is gone, but they're certainly not gone in West Virginia and Nevada," says Rep. Tom Cole (R) of Oklahoma, referring to the home states of Senate appropriations committee chairman Robert Byrd and majority leader Harry Reid.

On the Senate side, Republicans say they want to amend and debate the bill. "Republicans aren't going to shut down the government, but there will need to be an opportunity for Republican views on this," says Sen. Jon Kyl (R) of Arizona. Senate Democrats aim to wrap up this bill before the Feb.15 deadline.

White House Welcomes Tougher Oversight (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, February 2, 2007

A White House management official said Thursday there is "very little real accountability" in the federal government, and he welcomed the tougher oversight the Democrats have promised now that they control Congress.

"There cannot be enough accountability in the federal government," said Clay Johnson, deputy director of the Office and Management and Budget, which supervises executive branch agencies. "There is very little today. Very little real accountability."

Yet Johnson challenged Democratic lawmakers to help solve problems — not just hold hearings about them.

DOJ_NMG_0126032

Democrats now control Congress for the first time in Bush's presidency, and they are promising more investigation into matters of fraud and abuse. Key examples include spending on Iraq, homeland security and efforts to help the Gulf Coast recover from Hurricane Katrina.

Johnson, previewing Bush's management agenda for 2007, said Democrats can expect candor and cooperation. He said his agency's intention is not, as one reporter asked him, to step up its internal reviews to keep Congress at bay.

"Keeping Congress at bay suggests, 'Let's make them think that everything is just fantastic here.' They know better, and we'd be crazy to suggest that," Johnson said. "We want things to work better and it begins with an honest, candid, transparent assessment of what we know now. And out of that comes the fact that a lot of really good things are going on here."

He added that Democrats who run congressional hearings should do more than just draw public attention to problems. "Let's focus on things that aren't working like we want them to, but let's make sure we're focused on fixing them — not just identifying them," he said.

On that front, so far so good, Johnson said.

He said he has had cooperative meetings with Sen. Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn., chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, and Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee.

The White House under Bush has taken steps to become more accountable to the public. One of them is a Web site, http://www.expectmore.gov, which singles out government programs that work well and ones that don't.

Bush has an ongoing management agenda that grades Cabinet departments on their performance in areas such as financial practices, implementing electronic government plans and competitive sourcing. Overall, scores are on the way up, Johnson said Thursday.

"The average agency today has more management capability than the best agency did five years ago," he said.

Yet this week, federal programs involving food safety, transportation spending and technology security were added to a congressional "high risk" list. That means their inefficiencies leave them vulnerable to fraud, waste and abuse.

Among those, the Homeland Security Department was criticized for not doing enough since its post 9/11 creation to coordinate work and share information among its different components. Johnson said there was no higher federal priority than improving that department.

FEDERAL DIARY: A Tale Of Mice Illustrates How To Save Money (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 2, 2007

For an example of how federal employees can make a difference, the Office of Management and Budget yesterday offered up the story of feeder mice.

When the Interior Department began looking for budget savings, the staff at the Chickasaw National Recreation Area took a look at the time and money they spent on raising mice to feed to reptiles and birds of prey at the Oklahoma refuge. They calculated that they could save $15,000 a year by buying mice from vendors, and they now have more money available for their nature trails.

This budgetary morsel is featured on a Bush administration Web site (http://www.results.gov) that has been revamped to provide information about how federal programs can be made more effective.

Clay Johnson III, deputy director for management at the OMB, called the feeder mice "my favorite example" of how a group of federal employees can be given budget data and asked to sort out spending that is essential and spending that indirectly supports an operation. In the Chickasaw case, raising mice turned out to not be all that important.

Johnson unveiled the Results Web site at a briefing. The site, originally designed to educate Bush administration political appointees on the president's priorities in federal management, is being redirected toward federal employees, congressional staff aides and groups interested in government performance, he said.

The OMB wants to focus on making strides in the effectiveness of federal programs over the next two years, after spending much of the past six years urging agencies to improve internal management techniques and practices. "The American people know we are not performing on all cylinders," Johnson said.

Federal employees are key to making programs more effective, Johnson said. He said he hopes the revamped site will attract suggestions from them on how to improve programs and on any laws or rules that should be changed because they hamper agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0126033

But Johnson acknowledged that most federal employees outside the Beltway "don't get the word" about administration efforts to make programs more effective. "Their knowledge of these things is less than I would like it to be, and [outside Washington] is where 90 percent of the work is done."

With Democrats in control of Congress, it seems unlikely that presidential management initiatives will get much attention on the Hill, in part because congressional committees plan to step up oversight of government contracting and other areas deemed at "high risk" by the Government Accountability Office.

Johnson said he has met with the two chairmen of the government oversight committees, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), and told them he would welcome hearings that focus on how "to fix things."

He said Lieberman expressed interest in a comprehensive review of government, including how it is organized, and Johnson said he suggested staff consultations to weigh whether a reorganization commission should be created.

Johnson also said the OMB is paying closer attention to the GAO's list of programs that are vulnerable to waste, fraud and mismanagement. He noted that "good progress" has been made in some areas and said he would push to get them off the list in the next two years.

Problem areas that might be able to get off the GAO risk list, he said, include the Defense Department's cumbersome process for granting security clearances, Defense's systems for supplying troops with weapons and goods, the project to upgrade the air traffic control system, the government's management of surplus property and building maintenance, the government's strategy for personnel management, and the ability of intelligence agencies to share information about terrorism.

The highest priority, Johnson said, is pulling together the Homeland Security Department, which has been wracked by financial and contracting problems and where employee morale appears low. The department, which was created from the merger of 22 agencies, has been deemed at high risk by the GAO.

Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who has an interest in federal workforce issues, has asked for a Homeland Security plan "on what they intend to do between now and January 2009," Johnson said. "It is a priority for us here to make sure the plan is good, the plan is realistically aggressive."Talk Shows

Art Gordon, president of the Federal Law Enforcement Officers Association, and Jon Adler, executive vice president, will be the guests on "FEDtalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://Federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

George M. Gray, associate administrator for research and development at the Environmental Protection Agency, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Senate OKs Higher Minimum-wage Bill (USAT)

USA Today, February 2, 2007

The Senate, by a vote of 94-3, on Thursday passed its version of legislation to increase the federal minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour. The bill includes a package of tax breaks for small businesses.

Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., raised the possibility that the Senate negotiators may agree to demands from Democrats in the House of Representatives that the tax breaks be stripped from the bill that eventually gets sent to President Bush. A House version passed last month contains no business incentives. Both versions would phase in the increase in the minimum wage over a two-year period.

Prosecutor: Videos reveal Libby's motive

At former vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby's trial Thursday, the jury was shown video clips of a White House spokesman telling reporters that Libby "had nothing to do" with leaking information about the wife of a Bush administration critic. Patrick Fitzgerald, special prosecutor in Libby's perjury and obstruction trial, argued that the tapes show Libby had a motive for lying to investigators and grand jurors when he said a reporter told him that Valerie Plame worked at the CIA. Prosecutors say it was the other way around — that Libby told reporters about Plame.

Then-White House spokesman Scott McClellan's statements "clearing" Libby, on Oct. 7 and Oct. 10, 2003, meant Libby "had to come up with another story" for how reporters learned Plame's identity, Fitzgerald said. Theodore Wells, Libby's attorney, argued the videos are "highly prejudicial" to his client because they might suggest he leaked classified information. No testimony is scheduled for today. — Richard Willing

Capitol workers raise safety concerns

Falling slabs of concrete and exposed asbestos are two reasons a federal agency should investigate passages under the U.S. Capitol complex, a group of tunnel workers said. They have asked the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health for an evaluation.

DOJ_NMG_0126034

The 10 workers who raised this issue are responsible for maintaining the plumbing that provides steam and chilled water to Congress, the Library of Congress, the Supreme Court and other federal buildings. A spokeswoman for the Architect of the Capitol did not immediately return a request for comment.

Senate's Minimum-Wage Rise To Face Test In House (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Senate overwhelmingly approved a $2.10 increase in the federal minimum wage, but the business tax breaks paired with it face hurdles in the House.

On a 94-3 vote, the Senate backed the boost in pay for low-wage workers, as well as about $8 billion over 10 years in tax breaks for businesses, such as restaurants, that could be affected by the higher wage. To pay for the sweeteners -- a condition of support for many Senate Republicans -- the bill would limit the use of certain tax shelters, close loopholes and increase taxes on executive compensation.

MINIMUM WAGE DEBATE

1

See an interactive map2 examining current state minimums, average salaries and poverty rates.

The offsets have spurred criticism from business groups, which hope to persuade lawmakers to change or drop some provisions during House-Senate negotiations. Business lobbyists may be helped by some House Democrats, who say the tax breaks are unnecessary or too large, or who take issue with some offset provisions.

The minimum-wage bill illustrates the Democrats discovering, just as Republicans did before them, that moving their agenda through the House is only a first step. While the House swiftly passed a slew of legislation as part of the Democrats'"100 Hours" agenda, many of the provisions face hurdles or slower passage in the Senate, where Democrats have a slim majority and procedural rules give more power to the minority.

Despite strong support for the minimum-wage increase, members of the House and Senate haven't laid out yet how to resolve their differences. Senators say they are confident they will be able to deal with a constitutional precedent requiring tax legislation to originate in the House, possibly by attaching the minimum-wage package to a separate, House-passed tax measure. But the question remains: How will the House and Senate work out the impasse over tax breaks?

The House passed its minimum-wage increase by a wide margin and without the tax breaks in the Senate version. Rep. Charles Rangel, the New York Democrat who is chairman of the House Ways and Means panel, has criticized the tax breaks. "I'm not authorized to pay that much money for it," Mr. Rangel said after a meeting Tuesday with Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D., Mont.) on this and other issues. Mr. Rangel said he wants to let the issue "stew" in the Senate.

After the vote yesterday, Mr. Baucus said the House and Senate would be able to "harmonize" their bills. "I'm confident that our dedication to a minimum-wage increase is stronger than any differences between our two bills," he said.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) yesterday questioned whether "we need all these business pieces of sugar" in the legislation. Rep. Richard Durbin (D., Ill.), the assistant majority leader, said a minimum-wage increase could emerge from a House-Senate conference without the tax breaks.

"If we go through the process and go through a conference and the message comes back, 'You can have the minimum wage stripped down or not at all,' then we'll face another vote," Mr. Durbin said. "We need Republicans to pass it. If they continue to oppose it, then it will not pass."

The stalemate over the minimum wage is a contrast with the swift action in the House last month during the new majority's first 100 hours in charge. House Democrats reduced restrictions on federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, strengthened House ethics rules and agreed to a pay-go requirement that new spending and tax breaks shouldn't increase the deficit. They rescinded tax breaks for oil and gas companies and required the federal government to negotiate with drug makers over prices in the Medicare health program, among other bills.

Some of the "100 Hours" items have a good chance of getting to the president's desk, though they will take time to wend their way through committees. Senate Democrats have indicated they support strengthening pay-go requirements, for example, and also want to reduce the cost of student loans. On other issues, such as fulfilling certain 9-11 Commission recommendations, the Senate may have other ideas.

On Medicare price negotiation, the Senate may take a different tack than the House. Mr. Baucus has said he supports removing from current law a prohibition on government negotiation with drug companies, while the House version requires the government to do such bargaining. It is unclear what Mr. Baucus might pursue in the Finance Committee and whether a softer approach would do anything to temper what Senate Republicans have promised will be strong opposition.

DOJ_NMG_0126035

Senate Passes Wage Bill, But Obstacles Await (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — The Senate voted overwhelmingly Thursday to increase the minimum wage and give $8.3 billion in tax cuts to small businesses.

The increase in the wage, the first in 10 years, was a victory for Democrats, who had made it a key plank in their successful midterm election campaign to gain control of Congress.

But despite the huge margin of the Senate vote, 94 to 3, the increase — to $7.25 from $5.15 — must clear several hurdles before it becomes law. Democratic leaders in the Senate face their first big conflict with their counterparts in the House as the two chambers try to negotiate differences between the Senate bill and the one the House passed last month.

House Democrats promised that if they gained the majority they would pass the increase in the minimum wage, along with ethics reform and other measures, in their first 100 hours of legislating, and they succeeded.

But the House bill did not include the tax breaks. House Democratic leaders have said they want a "clean" bill that simply raises the minimum wage.

That approach failed in the Senate last week. Democratic leaders there say that they cannot get the Republican support they need without adding the tax provisions.

That leaves it to the Democratic leader in the Senate, Harry Reid of Nevada, to negotiate with the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, and Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

The House could block consideration of the bill or strip out the tax provisions and send it back for another Senate vote.

Mr. Reid said in a meeting with reporters early Thursday that he thought the Senate might approve a clean bill if the House sent it back for another try. But his office later said that he did not believe the vote count had changed and that he expected that the differences could be worked out in negotiations.

"It's not exactly clear what road we're going to take," said Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana and chairman of the Finance Committee. But, Mr. Baucus added, "the desire to get the minimum wage passed is going to trump" any concerns or delays in negotiations.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, who has championed the bill, said it was "unrealistic" to expect that it would simply go through the House.

Still, Mr. Kennedy said: "The minimum wage is going to go up. I wish it was going to be tonight or tomorrow that we get it to the president's desk, but it is going to increase, and the only question is whether it's going to take perhaps a week or it's going to take two and a half, two weeks or so."

Senate Republicans continued to insist that the bill would not pass without tax breaks.

"No one should be mistaken," said Senator Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, the ranking Republican on the Finance Committee. "It is House Democrats, not Senate Republicans, who are delaying passage of the minimum wage."

"The easiest and quickest way to send a minimum wage bill to the president," Mr. Grassley said, "would be for the House to send the Senate a bill identical to the Senate-passed bill."

In a statement, President Bush encouraged the House to support the increase and the tax cuts, saying it would "maintain a strong and dynamic labor market" and promote "continued economic growth."

Republicans argue that Democrats agreed to similar tax breaks the last time Congress raised the minimum wage, and that they should go along with them now to offset the costs of an increase to small businesses.

"It's not a clean issue," said Senator Michael B. Enzi of Wyoming, the ranking Republican on the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. "It's a complicated issue."

Senate Ups Wage To $7.25 Over Two Years (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, February 2, 2007

The Senate voted overwhelmingly Thursday to boost the federal minimum wage by $2.10 to $7.25 an hour over two years, but packaged the increase with small business tax cuts and limits on corporate pay that could complicate its path to become law.

The increase in the minimum wage, the first in a decade, was approved 94-3, capping a nine-day debate over how to balance the wage hike with the needs of businesses that employ low-wage workers.

A top priority of Democrats, the wage hike has both real and symbolic consequences. It would be one of the first major legislative successes of the new Democratic-controlled Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0126036

"Passing this wage hike represents a small but necessary step to help lift America's working poor out of the ditches of poverty and onto the road toward economic prosperity," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

Republicans stressed the importance of the bill's business tax breaks, though it was a significantly smaller tax package than Republicans had sought during previous attempts to raise the minimum wage.

"The Senate's reasonable approach recognizes that small businesses have been the steady engine of our growing economy and that they have been a source of new job creation, a source of job training," said Sen. Michael Enzi, R-Wyo., who helped manage the debate for the GOP.

The bill must now be reconciled with the House version passed Jan. 10 that contained no tax provisions. House Democrats have insisted they want a minimum wage bill with no strings attached, though some have conceded the difficulty of passing the legislation in the Senate without tax breaks.

The measure presents a challenge to Democrats who must navigate between the demands of labor and other interest groups and the realities of the Senate, where Republicans hold 49 of 100 votes. House and Senate Democrats now must try to negotiate a way out of the potential standoff.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., has said she supports some tax provisions in the House package, but said she would prefer them in a separate, House-initiated tax bill.

In a statement, President Bush encouraged House Democrats to accept the Senate version of the bill. "The Senate has taken a step toward helping maintain a strong and dynamic labor market and promoting continued economic growth," Bush said.

But AFL-CIO President John Sweeney vowed to "turn up the volume" to pass a bill without tax breaks.

"Minimum wage workers in this country have waited far too long for a raise," Sweeney said in a statement after the vote. "It's shameful that they must now wait even longer because of the Senate's insistence on business tax giveaways."

The three senators voting against the bill were Republicans Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, Jon Kyl of Arizona and Jim DeMint of South Carolina. Absent from the vote were Democrats Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Charles Schumer of New York and Republican James Inhofe of Oklahoma.

The legislation would raise the minimum wage in three steps. It would go to $5.85 an hour upon taking effect 60 days after the president signs it into law, then to $6.55 an hour a year later, and to $7.25 an hour a year after that.

An effort by the Senate last week to end debate on the House version of the bill failed when Democrats were unable to get the 60 votes needed. But many Democrats in the House and Senate would like to challenge Republicans to vote against a clean bill with no tax provisions.

"If we go through the process ... and the message comes back: 'You can have the minimum wage stripped down or not at all,' then we'll face another vote," said Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., the assistant majority leader. "We need Republicans to pass it. If they continue to oppose it then it will not pass."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Thursday he did not believe the business incentives were necessary. "The minimum wage will be increased," he said. "The question is do we need all these business pieces of sugar or not. We will see."

A spokesman for Reid said the tax breaks are needed to overcome a potential GOP filibuster.

"Of course, Democrats would prefer to pass a clean increase in the minimum wage," said the spokesman, Jim Manley. "The fact is that Republicans have made it very clear that the only way we will pass a modest increase in the minimum wage is with tax breaks for small business."

Besides increasing the minimum wage from the current $5.15 an hour, the bill would extend for five years a tax credit for businesses that hire the disadvantaged and provide expensing and depreciation advantages to small firms. The tax breaks would be paid for by closing loopholes on offshore tax shelters, capping deferred compensation payments to corporate executives and removing the deductibility of punitive damage payments and fines.

Senators also adopted an amendment that would bar companies that hire illegal immigrants from obtaining federal contracts. That measure was designed to encourage companies to participate in an employee identification program that can weed out undocumented workers.

While the tax breaks have won the support of small business groups as well as retailers and restaurant owners, they have drawn opposition from larger businesses that would bear the brunt of the revenue provisions. Several business groups also opposed the immigration measure.

After the House passed its bill on Jan. 10, the White House issued a statement insisting that final legislation include small business tax breaks. It subsequently issued a statement supporting the Senate version, but said the revenue measures were not necessary.

According to the Labor Department, 479,000 workers earned exactly $5.15 an hour in 2005, the most recent estimate available. Most are young and unmarried and more likely to be women, minorities and part-time workers. According to the liberal

DOJ_NMG_0126037

Economic Policy Institute, the wage increase would affect 5.6 million people who make less than the proposed minimum of $7.25.

More than two dozen states and the District of Columbia have minimum wages higher than the federal level. The issue proved to be potent last November when six states raised their minimums in statewide votes.

Senate Adds Tax Breaks To Minimum Wage Bill (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

The Senate voted overwhelmingly yesterday to increase the federal minimum wage for the first time in nearly a decade, but added small-business tax breaks that are unacceptable to House leaders, preventing Democrats from claiming a quick victory on one of their top legislative priorities.

The Senate voted 94 to 3 in favor of the measure, which would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from $5.15 over two years.

To attract Republican support, Senate leaders agreed to extend tax credits and expand deductions for businesses that would be hit hardest by the minimum-wage increase. Those tax breaks, worth $8.3 billion over 10 years, are coupled with a proposal to raise taxes by a similar amount on corporations, their chief executives and other highly paid workers.

Senate Republicans praised the measure as a responsible package that would help workers who earn the minimum wage and the businesses that employ them. They implored House leaders to accept the compromise and send it to President Bush, who put out a statement yesterday praising the Senate bill.

"I want to reiterate our hope that the House will not derail this bipartisan approach," said Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) "Middle-class relief is in their hands."

Democrats were less effusive. After the vote, presidential candidates Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.) lined up at a news conference with the bill's sponsor, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), and bemoaned the complications. Earlier, Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said he would prefer to pass a minimum-wage increase without "all these business pieces of sugar."

The Senate action sets the stage for potentially lengthy negotiations between the two chambers, as the new Democratic majority works through one of its first significant tests. After winning control of Congress in a campaign that emphasized middle-class anxiety and corporate greed, Democrats pushed the minimum wage to the top of their agenda, noting that it had fallen to its lowest value, when adjusted for inflation, in more than 50 years.

The House quickly approved the measure after just a few hours of debate. But the Senate took days, tacking on an amendment to ban companies that hire illegal immigrants from receiving government contracts for 10 years in addition to the tax package.

As approved by the Senate, the bill would extend several business tax deductions and credits, including one that allows small businesses to accelerate deductions for new purchases. It would extend for five years a tax credit for employers who hire welfare recipients and "high-risk youth" and expand the provision to include disabled military veterans.

To cover the costs of those provisions, the bill would close loopholes used by corporations that do business overseas and increase penalties for tax evasion. It would also place new restrictions on one of the most popular perquisites in corporate America by forbidding executives from deferring more than $1 million in pay every year and placing the money in tax-deferred accounts. Anyone who exceeded the allowable amount would be forced to pay taxes on all income deferred since Dec. 31, 2006, plus a 20 percent penalty.

House leaders have demanded that the tax measures be stripped from the bill. They argue that business needs no additional help after six years of breaks from the Bush administration and that, in any case, procedural rules require revenue bills to originate in the House.

That power is particularly important this year, because House Democrats have vowed to offset tax cuts and some spending increases with spending cuts or tax increases of equal value. Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, said he may have other plans for the $8.3 billion that the Senate would use for business tax breaks.

Yesterday, it was unclear how Democrats would proceed. Reid predicted that the differences would be worked out by a conference committee. "The minimum wage will be increased," he said.

Senate Votes To Raise Minimum Wage (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

DOJ_NMG_0126038

McClatchy Newspapers, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Democrats promised last year to raise the federal minimum wage for the first time in a decade if voters gave them control of Congress, but now they're holding it up in a game of chicken between the party's purists and pragmatists.

The Senate voted 94-3 Thursday to increase the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, from $5.15. The House of Representatives approved such a raise weeks earlier. The sticking point between the two versions is $8.3 billion in Republican-backed tax breaks for small businesses in the Senate version.

House liberals argue that now that they're in charge they shouldn't have to cut deals with the Republicans. Senate Democrats have said that without the tax breaks they can't pass the bill because they don't have a big enough majority to overcome Republican obstruction. And President Bush said that the tax breaks are the price of his support for raising the minimum wage.

"I strongly encourage the House to support this combined minimum-wage increase and small-business tax relief," Bush said in a statement released by the White House after the Senate vote.

AFL-CIO President John Sweeney issued a statement saying, "It's disgraceful that the Senate is still holding the minimum wage hostage to tax cuts for business. . . . In the last 10 years, the Republican-led Congress provided corporations with a whopping $276 billion in tax cuts and provided small businesses with another $36 billion in dedicated tax breaks, while America's lowest paid workers have gotten nothing. . . . It's shameful that they must now wait even longer because of the Senate's insistence on business tax giveaways."

Yet if House and Senate Democrats don't compromise, the minimum-wage increase might die.

Even Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., the liberal icon who's long championed a minimum-wage increase, said the GOP tax package is one of the "least offensive" possible because it includes incentives for hiring minorities and disadvantaged Americans.

Raising the minimum wage would benefit an estimated 5.6 million workers directly. The annual salary for a full-time minimum-wage employee would rise from about $11,000 a year to about $15,000. Experts say 7 million more who earn slightly more than the minimum wage could benefit from a ripple effect.

The tax-break package contains several provisions. Small businesses would enjoy more liberal rules for depreciating capital improvements, including equipment. Small businesses that can file individual income taxes rather than corporate income taxes would get new breaks. And the Work Opportunity Tax Credit, which offers subsidies for hiring welfare recipients and other disadvantaged Americans, would be expanded.

Democratic leaders say they'll probably keep the legislation in the Senate until some compromise emerges. Meanwhile, minimum-wage workers will get no raise.

"We haven't resolved anything," said Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., chairman of the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee. Rangel opposes including the tax breaks as part of a minimum-wage increase.

The posturing and uncertainty are frustrating to a broad coalition of organized labor, community and religious activists, which has agitated for years for a wage increase.

But that coalition, too, is splintered over how to react.

"We are so concerned that the minimum wage be raised in support of low-wage working people and families, that although we would prefer a clean bill, we believe this (Senate) bill should be supported," said the Rev. Paul Sherry, the national coordinator of Let Justice Roll, in a telephone interview.

Soon after, Sherry called back to clarify that "we will support reluctantly the $8.3 billion tax package, but if they tack anything else on, we're in a different ballgame."

In a third call, he said he could no longer say with absolute certainty what position his coalition would take. "We haven't been able to make a decision yet," he said.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., hinted Thursday that once House and Senate Democratic leaders sit down together, they may decide to go for broke, strip the tax provisions and dare Republicans to kill the bill.

"The minimum wage will be increased," Reid said. "The question is, do we need all these business pieces of sugar or not? We will see." Asked whether he thought the "sugar" was necessary, Reid said, "No."

As long as the Democrats are fighting among themselves and delaying action on their own campaign pledge, Senate Republicans have little motivation to bargain.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, the ranking minority member of the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee, said the tax package is "peanuts" compared with provisions that President Clinton signed into law a decade ago in the last minimum-wage deal.

"And yet we're having this harangue about it," Grassley said. "Aren't we having a win-win situation in a bipartisan way?"

DOJ_NMG_0126039

Senate Passes Wage Bill; House To Fight Tax Relief (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

The Senate overwhelmingly passed a bill yesterday that would raise the federal minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, but the fight for its survival has just begun.

House Democrats have threatened to invoke a parliamentary rule that would disqualify the legislation because of a Republican-sponsored provision that would provide some tax relief to small businesses. The measure aims to help employers absorb the higher payroll cost.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, is expected to delay sending the bill to the House, which passed its version last month, while the two chambers negotiate.

The talks could last weeks, said Democratic aides in both chambers.

"We've had a period of tax cuts after tax cuts after tax cuts," said Drew Hammill, spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat. "American workers are earning less, and it's long overdue that this raise happens."

Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, has demanded a "clean" minimum-wage bill identical to the House version.

Senate Democrats had balked at the tax-relief measure, but their slim majority forced them to accept it to gain Republican votes needed to pass the bill 94-3. Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Rangel now face a similar bargain.

Ways and Means Committee spokesman Matthew Beck said Republicans were "holding hostage" the wage increase.

Congress has not increased the minimum wage since 1997, the longest stretch without a raise since a minimum wage was established in 1938 at 25 cents per hour.

"The message is the Senate of the United States listened to the people," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, who managed the bill. "That's the powerful message that is out there tonight."

He said the tax measures would help small businesses create jobs and were the "least offensive" additions to the bill.

The tax package would save small businesses $8.3 billion, a fraction of the $268 billion in tax cuts Republicans proposed for a minimum-wage bill last year.

Sen. Michael B. Enzi, Wyoming Republican and ranking member of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, called on the House not to "derail this bipartisan approach."

"Passing the Senate's bipartisan minimum wage and small business relief is good for low-skilled workers, and it is good for the middle-class working families of America," Mr. Enzi said.

Both chambers passed bills that would raise the minimum wage by $2.10 over two years, from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour.

Sen. Benjamin L. Cardin, Maryland Democrat, who spent years on the House Ways and Means Committee before elected senator in November, said the bill would pass once the House "put its stamp on it."

"I don't think they will take the tax provisions out. They might try that, but at the end of the day, I think the tax provisions are going to be in the bill," he said.

The increase would be phased in starting with a raise to $5.85 at 60 days after enactment, to $6.55 a year later and to $7.25 the next year.

How To Really Help Low-Wage Workers (WP)

By Thomas Z. Freedman

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

If the House and Senate are able to agree on a minimum-wage hike and the president signs the bill, some may say we will have done enough to help low-income workers. It's true that low-wage workers urgently need a raise, that millions of Americans work full time and still live below the poverty line. But while an increase in the minimum wage is better than nothing, alone it is an incomplete instrument for really making work pay.

We should raise the minimum wage while committing our country to a bigger bargain: If you work full time, then you and your family will live above the poverty line. This goal is not only morally right but one our country can afford.

Published statistics for 2004, the most recent year with solid available data, show that about 3.5 million full-time workers earned less than poverty-level wages. Factoring in government benefits, about 2.6 percent of full-time workers live below the poverty line. That is about 2.7 million Americans. And these struggling workers frequently support families, meaning millions more depend on them.

On its own, the minimum wage is an imperfect means for ensuring no full-time worker is poor. First, it almost certainly will not be raised enough. Even the plan to raise it to $7.25 an hour has been a political struggle, with success now likely but not guaranteed. It would take a wage of $10 an hour for a worker to earn $20,000 a year, about the poverty threshold for a family of four. Second, there are reasonable arguments that a $10 minimum wage would harm many small businesses. Finally, increases in the minimum wage are not indexed for inflation -- and may never be. The last increase was 10 years ago, and some full-time workers have fallen further below the poverty line since then. Even with a new raise, workers will once again slip into poverty if a decade or more goes by between increases.

DOJ_NMG_0126040

A better approach would be to increase the wage and simultaneously expand the earned-income tax credit (EITC). This program, signed into law by President Gerald Ford and greatly expanded and popularized by President Bill Clinton, is designed specifically to reward work. It is one of the country's most successful anti-poverty programs.

The EITC program, however, has substantial shortcomings. It does not cover childless workers younger than 25, and the credit does not help meet the costs of raising additional children after a family's second child. Further, many people who are eligible don't apply for the credit. These holes have significant consequences.

How many reforms are enacted would affect the cost of the credit. Increasing the EITC for families with three or more children -- more than half of all poor children live in such families -- would help an estimated 3 million families and cost about $3 billion. Crucial actions such as improved outreach or removing a built-in marriage penalty could each be done for about $1 billion; more complete reforms that would also help those living barely above the poverty line could cost 10 times that or more. But this is the best time in a decade to make this bargain with low-wage workers. An increased minimum wage will help millions of poor people; combining it with a new commitment to the earned-income tax credit could take them the rest of the way out of poverty.

Arguably, supporting those who are working hard and playing by the rules is as important a societal good as tax breaks for companies or even encouraging home ownership. The question ultimately is about our nation's priorities. The federal budget is more than $2 trillion, and Congress's pork-barrel projects have been estimated at $47 billion. Home mortgage deductions -- a benefit for mostly middle-class Americans -- average about $9,500 a year per homeowner. By comparison, the cap on EITC payments last year was $4,400. The average EITC benefit in 2005 was only $1,872.

The issue of whether to make such a policy change is timely with a presidential contest looming. It's not unreasonable to hope that some candidate will want the world's richest country to make a new bargain with its poorest workers. We need to raise the minimum wage. But we should also make a larger commitment. If you work hard year-round, we will make sure you are not living below the official poverty line. You may not be rich, but you'll know that in America work pays.

The writer was a senior adviser to President Bill Clinton and is a visiting fellow at the Progressive Policy Institute.

Bush Urges Stepped-Up Campaign Against Childhood Obesity (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

Washington Post, February 2, 2007

President Bush yesterday added his voice to the growing debate over childhood obesity, as he met at the White House with representatives of some of the companies considered responsible for aggravating the problem and urged them to stress the importance of healthful eating and physical fitness in their marketing campaigns.

Among those at the morning meeting in the White House Roosevelt Room were the president of McDonald's USA, purveyor of the Happy Meal; a senior executive of Kraft Foods, which sells macaroni and cheese in the shapes of popular children's characters; and the chief executive of PepsiCo., maker of soft drinks and Doritos, among other products.

"Childhood obesity is a costly problem for the country," Bush said before starting the private meeting, which also included first lady Laura Bush. "We believe it is necessary to come up with a coherent strategy to help folks all throughout our country cope with the issue."

As described by those present, the meeting was cordial and the president signaled no intent to pursue more aggressive policies favored by some consumer groups, such as banning the marketing of junk food to children or requiring more detailed nutritional labeling. Bush told the executives that it is an individual's responsibility to maintain a healthful diet, not the government's. The meeting also included executives of entertainment companies involved with marketing to children.

Peggy Conlon, president of the Advertising Council, which has been working with the government on public service campaign on childhood obesity, said the president is very interested in the efforts some of the companies have been making to offer more healthful choices to Americans. McDonald's, for instance, has been adding salads and other alternative products to its menu and giving people the option of substituting apple slices for french fries in Happy Meals.

"He was curious," Conlon said of Bush. "They talked a lot about their movement to healthier product choices."

The group also played for the president a public service announcement developed by Dreamworks and the Ad Council featuring the characters from the hit movie "Shrek" urging kids to get outside and play.

DOJ_NMG_0126041

Childhood obesity has been identified by public health advocates as a serious and growing problem, with roughly 15 to 18 percent of children and teenagers considered overweight, according to government data. A 2005 report from the Institute of Medicine concluded that marketing practices from the food and beverage industry is "a direct threat to the health prospects of the next generation."

Former Food and Drug Administration commissioner David A. Kessler, who crusaded against the tobacco industry, applauded the president's initiative to discuss the issue but said: "That still leaves the question of what to do. Talking about it is a first step. It is a very large public health challenge, the consequences of which we have only begun to understand. In some ways we have all been AWOL on this issue, including this administration."

Michael Jacobson, executive director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, was more skeptical. "It is a feel-good event for a beleaguered White House, and it's great for some of the companies that have been major contributors to childhood obesity." But he added: "The government needs to put some muscle into [the campaign] and maybe step on some toes."

Bush Urges Parents To Get Kids Outdoors To Fight Childhood Obesity (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush said Thursday that childhood obesity is a costly problem for the country and puts stress on American families.

"One way for this nation to cope with the issue of obesity is to get people outside — whether it be through sports or hiking or conservation," Bush said while meeting with business leaders working to encourage exercise and healthy food choices through advertising.

He said first lady Laura Bush was on her way to New York to kick off Friday's "Wear Red Day" for the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute's Red Dress Project to increase awareness that women are at risk for heart disease. Bush signed a proclamation making February American Heart Month.

"Mothers are the ones, a lot of times, who make choices for their children," the first lady said. "They make their choices on the foods they eat. They're the ones at home, many times, who encourage their children to exercise."

Earlier, the president and Mrs. Bush attended the 55th national prayer breakfast at a Washington hotel where he prayed for the safety of U.S. troops, saying: "During this time of war, we thank God that we are part of a nation that produces courageous men and women who volunteer to defend us."

In the Roosevelt Room, the president and Mrs. Bush met with executives from the food, beverage and entertainment industries to talk about improving healthy food offerings and encouraging physical fitness in their marketing and advertising campaigns.

More than 10 million school-age children in the United States — about 18% — are now considered overweight. The percentage of overweight children tripled among adolescents during the past 25 years, and nearly doubled for children ages 6 to 12. This increases their risk for adult heart disease and diabetes, lowers life expectancy and creates additional health care costs.

Following the meeting, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt was to work with Roger Enrico, chairman of DreamWorks Animation SKG, and Peggy Conlon, president and chief executive officer of The Advertising Council, to launch a public awareness campaign to help prevent childhood obesity. The campaign will include ads featuring characters from the Shrek animated movies encouraging children to "Be a Player" and get up and play for an hour a day.

Representatives from General Mills, Coca-Cola North America, Univision Communications Inc., Kraft Foods Inc., Kellogg Co., PepsiCo Inc., Subway Franchisee Advertising Fund Trust, McDonalds USA and Nickelodeon Television also were at the meeting.

Bush Urges Parents To Get Kids Outdoors (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

Filed at 9:50 p.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- President Bush said Thursday that childhood obesity is a costly problem for the country and puts stress on American families.

"One way for this nation to cope with the issue of obesity is to get people outside -- whether it be through sports or hiking or conservation," Bush said while meeting with business leaders working to encourage exercise and healthy food choices through advertising.

DOJ_NMG_0126042

He said first lady Laura Bush was on her way to New York to kick off Friday's "Wear Red Day" for the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute's Red Dress Project to increase awareness that women are at risk for heart disease. Bush signed a proclamation making February American Heart Month.

"Mothers are the ones, a lot of times, who make choices for their children," the first lady said. "They make their choices on the foods they eat. They're the ones at home, many times, who encourage their children to exercise."

Earlier, the president and Mrs. Bush attended the 55th national prayer breakfast at a Washington hotel where he prayed for the safety of U.S. troops, saying: "During this time of war, we thank God that we are part of a nation that produces courageous men and women who volunteer to defend us."

In the Roosevelt Room, the president and Mrs. Bush met with executives from the food, beverage and entertainment industries to talk about improving healthy food offerings and encouraging physical fitness in their marketing and advertising campaigns.

More than 10 million school-age children in the United States -- about 18 percent -- are now considered overweight. The percentage of overweight children tripled among adolescents during the past 25 years, and nearly doubled for children ages 6 to 12. This increases their risk for adult heart disease and diabetes, lowers life expectancy and creates additional health care costs.

Following the meeting, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt was to work with Roger Enrico, chairman of DreamWorks Animation SKG, and Peggy Conlon, president and chief executive officer of The Advertising Council, to launch a public awareness campaign to help prevent childhood obesity. The campaign will include ads featuring characters from the Shrek animated movies encouraging children to "Be a Player" and get up and play for an hour a day.

Representatives from General Mills Inc., Coca-Cola North America, Univision Communications Inc., Kraft Foods Inc., Kellogg Co., PepsiCo Inc., Subway Franchisee Advertising Fund Trust, McDonald's USA and Nickelodeon Television also were at the meeting.

Bush Gets Aid Of Democrats In Fighting Pandemics (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

At a time of intensifying conflict between President Bush and Democrats in Congress over the Iraq war, the Democratic-led House acted this week to rescue another of Mr. Bush's international priorities: the global fight against AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis, diseases that kill millions of Africans each year.

That Democrats stepped in to champion Mr. Bush's signature global health undertakings suggests the deepening of political support for foreign aid programs, especially those that quickly demonstrate they can save hundreds of thousands of lives. It also bucks a historical pattern of declining support for foreign assistance when control of Congress and the White House is divided between Democrats and Republicans.

"We're in a different world now," said Representative Nita M. Lowey, Democrat of New York, who heads the appropriations subcommittee that oversees foreign aid. "This is the first time since Sept. 11 we've had a power split in Washington, and there's a growing recognition among the public and policy makers that foreign assistance is critical to stability around the world."

The administration's drive for a rapid strengthening of programs to prevent and treat AIDS and malaria had been caught in limbo. The departing Republican-led Congress had failed to pass spending bills to finance most federal agencies this fiscal year, which began Oct. 1, including those that administer foreign aid.

But the new Democratic leadership agreed this week to give the administration $4.5 billion this year to combat the big three global pandemics, $500 million more than the president himself had requested and over $1 billion more than if the undertakings had been required to continue at the previous year's spending levels.

The House on Wednesday approved the global health financing as part of an omnibus budget measure. The Senate is expected to take up the bill as early as next week.

Under Mr. Bush, aid to Africa has risen to more than twice the level of any previous administration and more than triple that achieved during the Clinton administration, according to an analysis by the Center for Global Development, a nonprofit research group in Washington.

But Mr. Bush will need the Democrats to sustain the growth. And while Congress has embraced increased global health spending, it was not as generous to Mr. Bush's other foreign aid innovation: the Millennium Challenge Corporation, an agency that aims to reduce poverty through grants to well-governed developing countries. It approved continuing last year's spending level of $1.75 billion for the agency, far short of the $3 billion Mr. Bush requested for this year. Some Democrats in Congress have complained that the agency has been too slow to spend the money it has and to show results.

DOJ_NMG_0126043

"The politics of aid in this country probably has shifted on push-button issues like H.I.V./AIDS," said Todd Moss, a senior fellow at the Center for Global Development. "It's the longer-term development that's much harder to do and build political backing for. Those are the things that will come under pressure in a Washington with a split government."

Still, this week's progress on global health provides a marker of how much both parties have changed since the Clinton years. Then, the Republican Senator Jesse Helms attacked foreign aid as money poured down a rathole before he had a change of heart. President Clinton, now a leading advocate for global AIDS treatment and prevention programs, failed to muster an American response commensurate with the scale of the dying, many critics say.

Now, both parties compete to claim the mantle of leadership. Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who heads the Senate appropriations subcommittee on foreign aid, said Democrats in Congress had pushed even harder in recent months than the White House for AIDS spending.

Tim Rieser, who has been the lead Democratic staff member on the same Senate subcommittee since 1995, said: "When Clinton was president, he didn't make AIDS the priority he should have. President Bush saw the opportunity and deserves credit for that. But it's not like he owns the issue. We all — Democrats and Republicans — have urged that much more be done."

Vaccine Firms Get Immunity From The U.S. (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration triggered a provision of a 2005 law that gives companies protection from product-liability lawsuits for vaccines or drugs they produce in connection with the avian-flu strain.

The law, enacted 13 months ago, gives the Secretary of Health and Human Services the power to grant immunity to vaccine makers in the event of a risk to public health. In a directive dated last week, HHS invoked that clause, "based on a credible risk that an avian influenza virus spreads and evolves into a strain capable of causing a pandemic of human influenza."

Bill Hall, an HHS spokesman, said that the agency's declaration "allows us to remove the remaining barrier to building up our domestic capacity to manufacturers of vaccines in a flu pandemic." He denied that the move reflected heightened concern about the avian flu. Rather, he said, "It was a precautionary step."

The HHS action comes at a time when fresh cases of avian flu are cropping up in Asia, Russia, Nigeria and parts of Europe, and some in Congress are expressing renewed concern about the threat. Recently, Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa held a hearing to question senior administration officials on what they are doing to prepare for a possible pandemic in the U.S.

Some saw the HHS action as a reflection of increased concern. "This is probably the loudest pronouncement by the federal government to date that the threat of an avian flu pandemic is real," says John Clerici, a partner at McKenna Long & Aldridge in Washington, D.C., a law firm whose clients have included vaccine makers.

The U.S. has long been concerned about a shortage of vaccines, both for seasonal influenza and to combat the H5N1 bird-flu strain and other potentially lethal strains. As part of a plan to encourage development of experimental vaccines and other countermeasures against public health and bioterrorism threats, Congress passed in late 2005 a bill that provided liability protection to those vaccine makers. The measure, signed by President Bush in December 2005, was roundly criticized by trial lawyers and other critics as a giveaway to drug companies. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) demanded a generous compensation scheme for victims of potential side effects of the vaccines. But as part of the defense appropriations bill, the measure had no funds provided.

Drug Industry Faces Bitter Pill (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Congress is kicking off efforts to pass big reforms of the Food and Drug Administration, and that could produce some bitter pills for the pharmaceutical industry: potentially, tougher safety rules and provisions to reduce the cost of medicines.

Yesterday, Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Sen. Michael Enzi of Wyoming, the chairman and ranking Republican of the health committee, respectively, introduced legislation that would give the FDA new authority to impose safety requirements on medicines once they go on the market, including restrictions on consumer advertising. The bill also would require registration of clinical drug trials and their results in public databases.

Meanwhile, Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut, a Democrat, and Sen. Charles Grassley of Iowa, a Republican, on Wednesday introduced their own drug-safety bills, which would restructure the FDA to create a center to oversee the safety of drugs after they go on the market.

DOJ_NMG_0126044

Proposals to beef up regulation have stalled before, often due to skepticism from Republican allies of the industry. This year is likely to be different. Democrats aren't reluctant to give expanded authority to federal regulators and see the drug industry as a tempting target because of its tenuous popularity with consumers and its traditional ties to Republicans. And they're getting support from some Republicans upset by a series of high-profile drug-safety problems, including the 2004 withdrawal of the painkiller Vioxx.

Also, lawmakers have a ready-made vehicle for the changes: legislation that must be approved this year to renew the deal under which the industry pays fees to fund much of the FDA's drug-review process. The current user-fee agreement expires later this year.

"It's pretty clear we have drug-safety problems, and it's clear we need to address those matters," says Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.), chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which has jurisdiction over the FDA. Several lawmakers say the agency's latest drug-safety initiatives, announced Tuesday, need to be bolstered with new legislation.

While these bills are now stand-alone measures, many on Capitol Hill expect that whatever safety legislation moves forward will be combined with the user-fee bill. That legislation also might end up linked to proposals to create a pathway for FDA approval of generic versions of biotech drugs -- which proponents argue would rein in the cost of such medicines -- and allow imports of medication from overseas. Both provisions are opposed by the drug industry, which is pressing for a "clean" user-fee bill.

STRONG MEDICINE

• What's New: Members of Congress propose to increase the FDA's drug-safety oversight and create a path for the agency to approve generic biotech drugs.

• The Issue: The drug industry is concerned about the effect of such legislation.

• What's Next: Proposals to change the FDA may be included in legislation authorizing fees that fund many agency operations.

"We're concerned that it not become a Christmas tree," loaded with legislative extras, says Billy Tauzin, chief executive of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the industry's main lobbying group. But, he says, "we appreciate that the odds are that people are going to load it up."

In an effort to defuse controversial issues and lay the foundation for the user-fee bill, the pharmaceutical industry and the FDA struck a deal, unveiled a few weeks ago, that would provide the agency with $393 million in industry user fees for the next fiscal year. That is an increase of about one-third from the current year.

The pact would grant the FDA substantially more money for safety monitoring, and fund more staff to review pharmaceutical ads. That dovetails with voluntary campaigns by companies to submit their ads to the FDA and include their studies in public registries.

Mr. Tauzin says the industry "has real concerns" about what the Kennedy-Enzi bill might do, and opposes Sens. Grassley and Dodd's proposal to create an FDA drug-safety center: "Is this needed legislation, or is it going to create some new authorities that are problematic?"

If Congress doesn't pass the FDA fee legislation by late summer, it risks shutting down much of the agency's drug-regulation activity. Complicating matters, other FDA-related laws also must be renewed this year, including the fees that fund the agency's regulation of medical devices.

Mr. Dingell says he doesn't want to "bog down" the user-fee bill with procedural fights over provisions that aren't germane, but he also wants to step up drug safety. Later this month, his committee is expected to hold a hearing on drug safety that will include Sen. Grassley, an exacting FDA watchdog. Mr. Dingell calls the proposal to create a drug-safety center at the FDA an "intriguing idea," but says he wants to learn more before endorsing a plan.

Another focus for Congress: drug ads. Mr. Dingell says his reservations about such consumer advertising "have only grown with the passage of time." Democratic Rep. Frank Pallone of New Jersey, chairman of the Energy and Commerce health subcommittee, says the issue "could be part of the reauthorization" of the fee bill, but leaders will "see where there's a consensus" before deciding.

Another House Democrat, Henry Waxman of California, says he plans a drug-safety bill that will largely mirror the Kennedy-Enzi proposal. "The FDA does not have the authority it should have and that our legislation would give them," he says.

The Kennedy-Enzi bill would strengthen the FDA's oversight of drugs after they go on the market, by requiring that drugs be approved with programs to manage their risks. Those programs might be very limited, but they could also include an array of provisions the FDA doesn't currently have the explicit power to impose, including mandatory safety studies, restrictions on who can prescribe or dispense a drug, and an initial ban on consumer ads. A Kennedy staffer says that while the bill initially will be separate from user-fee legislation, "we imagine the process is one where all of these things end up being joined at some point."

DOJ_NMG_0126045

The biggest concern for the biotech industry is legislation planned by Mr. Waxman, which would create a path for generic versions of biotech drugs. Sen. Hillary Clinton (D., N.Y.), a member of the health committee, plans to tie that effort to the user-fee legislation. "Linking it to [the user-fee bill] would be a good idea, because that's must-pass legislation," says another New York Democrat, Sen. Charles Schumer, who will be the generic biotech bill's lead Senate sponsor.

James Greenwood, chief executive of the Biotechnology Industry Organization, says the issue is too complex and scientifically delicate to be examined and resolved in time to link it to the user-fee legislation. "There's barely enough time to have the members of the House and the Senate understand what's in the [user-fee bill]," he says.

Lawmakers Eye Child Insurance Program (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, February 2, 2007

Congress probably will take its time in considering President Bush's plan for expanding health insurance coverage. Lawmakers, however, are moving more quickly to renew a program that now provides coverage to 6 million people, mostly children.

The State Children's Health Insurance Program expires Sept. 30. Democrats and Republicans say they want to swiftly reauthorize the program.

"There is no greater priority for the Finance Committee in the health arena this year," said Sen. Max Baucus, the committee's new chairman. "It's No. 1."

When Congress approved the program in 1997, it provided $40 billion over 10 years. States use the money, along with their own dollars, to subsidize health coverage for families with incomes too high to qualify for Medicaid but too low to afford insurance through the private sector.

Job Bedford, 13, of Baltimore, told Baucus' committee Thursday that being in the program means he can take his asthma medicine with him wherever he goes, which makes him feel safer.

"Asthma attacks are kind of scary. They are very unpredictable and there is always the worry in the back of my mind that I might just die," he said.

Interest groups and trade associations are lobbying for a major expansion of the program as a way to reduce the ranks of the uninsured, now estimated at 46.6 million.

But some senators sought to temper expectations.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, noted the program will require Congress to find $12 billion to $15 billion over the next five years just to serve the existing population. That is above the $25 billion that Congress would spend under the current money formula.

Grassley said he has not heard any advocacy groups say how Congress should pay for expanding the program. He does not consider raising taxes an option.

"A critical part of the discussion needs to be about how we are going to pay for the existing services before we can discuss expanding services," Grassley said.

Committee Republicans said restricting the number of adults eligible to participate could allow more children to be covered.

Some states use their share of the grant money to expand insurance coverage for adults. Arizona, Wisconsin and others even cover more adults than children.

Gov. Sonny Perdue, R-Ga., told lawmakers his state will run out of federal money for its children's health insurance program by March. That would affect 273,000 children.

But even as some states struggle with shortfalls, others get enough money to cover populations that were never the intended recipients of the program, Perdue said.

Several Republicans agreed with Perdue's assessment that the program's resources should be focused on children.

"The SCHIP program is for kids," Grassley said. "The C stands for children. There is no A is SCHIP."

Overall, about 639,000 adults get health insurance through the program.

Congress recently provided $283 million to prevent states from experiencing shortfalls in health insurance funding. It also prohibited states from using their program money to provide coverage to adults without children. An exception was allowed for those states already given permission to extend coverage to adults.

But Cindy Mann, executive director of the Center for Children and Families, said removing adults from the program would not free up significant money for children.

DOJ_NMG_0126046

"The adults covered through this initiative are very low income. We're talking about people who work at minimum wage or at $7 or $8 an hour," Mann said. "They don't have other options, so the ramification of dropping them would be to increase the number of uninsured people. That would be an ironic result of SCHIP reauthorization."

Baucus, D-Mont., said after the hearing that he does not want to just renew the program, but expand it.

"Were going to need more money for CHIP," he said. "And we need to move fast to find it to keep kids from losing coverage this year."

Christina Pearson, a spokeswoman for the Health and Human Services Department, said Secretary Mike Leavitt is committed to renewing the program. She declined to cite specifics on how much money the administration would seek in the president's 2008 budget proposal to be submitted to Congress on Monday.

On the House side, Democrats have said they would seek money for expanding children's insurance coverage and for improving outreach.

Senate Democrats Warn F.C.C. Of Tough New Oversight (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — Signaling tougher oversight, Democrats who recently gained control of the Senate urged the head of the Federal Communications Commission on Thursday to take a more aggressive approach to the industries he oversees.

In his first appearance before the Senate Commerce Committee under Democratic leadership, Kevin J. Martin, the agency's chairman, and the other commissioners faced sharp criticism from some senior senators on the handling of the recent acquisition of BellSouth by AT&T.

The lawmakers also questioned the commission's practice of renewing broadcast licenses of radio and television stations with virtually no review.

Their questions and comments indicated that there was no political consensus on a range of recent legislative proposals. Most telecommunications policy issues do not break cleanly along party lines. So-called Net neutrality bills have been introduced to prevent high-speed Internet companies from charging content providers for priority access, and other measures are expected that would prevent the commission from making it easier for media companies to grow larger through acquisitions.

But the aggressive questioning by the panel's senior Democrats — including its chairman, Daniel K. Inouye of Hawaii; John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia; Byron L. Dorgan of North Dakota; and Barbara Boxer of California — suggested that the senators would be applying significant pressure on the policy-making apparatus of the commission.

That could, at the least, temper any deregulatory action that Mr. Martin and his fellow Republican commissioners have been contemplating, particularly as they prepare to consider measures that would make it easier for media conglomerates to own newspapers and television stations in the same cities.

On Thursday, Mr. Martin yielded virtually no policy ground, saying for example that the conditions that two Democratic commissioners forced the agency to impose on AT&T to gain approval of its acquisition of Bell South would not be applied to the rest of the industry. Republicans hold a 3-to-2 majority on the commission, although a Republican recusal allowed the Democrats to play a decisive role in December in the AT&T-BellSouth review.

In addition to a "Net neutrality" pledge, AT&T offered to sell certain wireless spectrum and phone lines and pledged to upgrade its telephone network so it could provide high-speed Internet service to most of its service area.

Mr. Martin also declined to consider a more rigorous license-renewal process for the stations, although he said that he might favor rules that would require the stations to disclose more information about how they fulfilled their public-interest obligations.

Sensing the new climate, Mr. Martin in his opening statement steered clear of many difficult issues, including the debate over Internet discrimination legislation, decency standards, media-ownership rules, universal service fees paid by telephone users, and agency policies on consolidation in the phone industry.

Instead, Mr. Martin presented a rosy picture of the industries he regulates, noting that telephone prices had been declining, broadband use increasing and innovation vibrant.

"I am pleased to report that the state of the communications industry is strong," he said. "As you no doubt remember, in the year 2000 the communications industry began a precipitous and far-reaching decline. Capital spending by companies followed this market decline, innovation disappeared and companies went out of business, taking jobs with them. What a difference six years make."

DOJ_NMG_0126047

But the Democrats on the commission, as well as those on the Senate committee, said that a digital divide had been deepening between those who could afford, and were being offered, high-speed Internet access and other technologies, and those who could not; and that the agency's deregulatory approach had contributed to what they said were the steadily declining standards of broadcasters.

"One change of this last election," Mr. Rockefeller, the committee's second-ranking Democrat, said "is that there will be a lot more attention on the F.C.C. and what they are doing in the critical area of public oversight."

He excoriated the agency for what he said was the abandonment of "its core responsibility to the public interest" by failing to take steps to reduce sex and violence on television, and for failing to seriously review license renewals by radio and television stations.

"The process of review is so pro forma that it's known as postcard renewal," he said.

Mr. Dorgan urged Mr. Martin to begin proceedings that would give some teeth to the vaguely worded public-interest standards that the law requires the agency to apply to license renewals and mergers. He accused the agency of a "spectacular failure" in its review of media ownership rules.

And Ms. Boxer attacked the commission for what she called a "pervasive culture of secrecy" that several years ago resulted in the suppression of government reports that contradicted the agency's official line on media ownership.

Mr. Martin responded that, after learning of those reports, he had ordered the F.C.C. to search its files and make any other similar reports part of the record of the current proceedings.

Democrats Urge Tighter FCC Rules (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Senate Democrats pressed the Republican-controlled Federal Communications Commission yesterday to slap tighter controls on media ownership, public-interest broadcasting and television violence.

Several Democrats on the Senate Commerce Committee warned the agency not to try to relax limits on the number of media outlets one company can own, as the FCC did in 2003 only to have a federal court stay the action. Recent FCC policies on media ownership, said Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), have been "a spectacular failure."

He railed against rules that allow one entity to own eight radio stations in a large city and against proposals to allow one owner to have three TV stations in a city. "More concentration means less competition," Dorgan said. "The public-interest standards have been nearly completely emasculated."

But FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, who has close ties to the Bush White House, defended the agency's policies.

"The commission has tried to make decisions based on a fundamental belief that a robust, competitive marketplace, not regulation, is ultimately the greatest protector of the public interest," Martin said. He told Dorgan, "I'm not convinced yet we need to have the kind of requirements" for local TV and radio programming that some advocates have championed.

Flexing their muscles at Congress's first oversight hearing of the FCC since taking control of the House and Senate last month, Democrats lectured and sometimes scolded FCC members, saying the agency needs more teeth in its regulation of broadcast outlets, telephones, the Internet and other services.

"The change of this last election," said Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), "is that there's going to be a lot more attention on the FCC. . . . It has abandoned its core responsibility to the public interest."

While the two-hour hearing didn't result in any mandates, it was more than a rhetorical venting, said Tamara Lipper, a spokeswoman for Martin.

"The commissioners are informed by the hearings," she said, and the lawmakers' comments "become part of the record."

As such, scores of lobbyists and interest group members filled long hallways and stairwells in the Russell Senate Office Building before crowding into an overflow room to watch the proceedings on TV monitors. The FCC's two Democratic commissioners often endorsed the senators' complaints, while their three GOP colleagues gently pushed back.

Democratic Commissioner Michael J. Copps told Dorgan that the FCC needs tougher requirements for broadcast outlets seeking license renewals and more detailed descriptions of locally produced content that would serve "the public interest."

Rockefeller called on the agency to put more pressure on cable and broadcast TV outlets to reduce the amount of televised violence. "Commercial television is in the worst state I've ever seen," he said.

Even sharper was Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who questioned whether Martin had aggressively looked into "the suppression" of two reports -- drafted by FCC staff members -- that reflected badly on the agency's media-ownership policies. "A culture of secrecy is still pervasive at the FCC," Boxer said.

DOJ_NMG_0126048

Martin, whose voice never rose above a soft drawl, said he made all the documents public as soon as he learned of them last fall.

Senators Bristle At FCC Chief's Enforcement Of AT&T-BellSouth Merger (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, February 2, 2007

The chairman of the Federal Communications Commission faced tough questions from a Senate panel Thursday over his comments that he would not enforce a key condition the FCC imposed before approving of the AT&T-BellSouth merger.

At a Senate Commerce Committee hearing Thursday, Committee Chairman Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, suggested FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, a Republican, did not intend to "stand by the deal" and that he was obliged to withhold his vote and negotiate further if he had concerns about any of the conditions.

The $86 billion merger — the largest in telecom history — was approved in December by a 4-0 vote after weeks of negotiations between the commission's two Democrats and two Republicans.

The condition in question would require the combined company to slash the rates it charges competitors and big businesses to lease private, high-speed data lines in deregulated markets.

It was among a laundry list of concessions pushed by the FCC's two Democrats to win their votes, and it stands to have perhaps the biggest impact on AT&T's bottom line, costing it a projected $500 million over four years.

But in agreeing to the requirement, AT&T said it would not slash the prices it charges Verizon and Qwest, two of its largest rivals, unless the two local phone giants lower the lease rates they charge AT&T in their territories. AT&T, Verizon and Qwest all have long-distance units that serve big businesses outside their regions.

Verizon and Qwest say they will not cut their prices for AT&T.

In a statement released when the FCC approved the deal, Martin and Republican Commissioner Deborah Tate suggested they would not enforce the condition because it improperly imposed obligations on other carriers. They also said if Verizon and Qwest can't get the low rates, the concession would conflict with FCC rules that require wholesale services to be offered to all carriers on equal terms.

On Thursday, Martin told Inouye he was abiding by the deal but that while AT&T could submit tariffs, which are legal documents detailing its reduced prices, he would not approve them.

"You're not allowed to discriminate among the different companies in terms of who you offer discounted prices to," Martin said. "Where the commission would have to take affirmative action, we said no, we would have hesitation doing that."

Democratic Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein told lawmakers he was unaware of Martin's concerns until after the vote. "It's hard for me to understand how we cannot implement something that was (voted for) unanimously," he said.

He also said FCC rules bar only unreasonable price discrimination and that offering different prices in this case would be "reasonable."

In a letter to Martin on Wednesday, Reps. John Dingell, D-Mich., and Ed Markey, D-Mass., also pressed him about his comments. He's expected to be grilled about them again at a House hearing Markey will chair on Feb. 15.

FCC Told To Focus On Public Interest (WT)

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

COX NEWS SERVICE

Senate Democrats served notice to members of the Federal Communications Commission yesterday that their top priority is protecting the public interest, not boosting corporate profits.

Under Republican leadership, the FCC has "abandoned its core responsibility" to act in the public interest, Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, West Virginia Democrat, said at a packed hearing of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee. As a result, he said, broadcasters put on news programs that are filled with "junk, sex, scandals" and other content that fails to inform the public about important issues.

Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, North Dakota Democrat, said the agency's review of media-ownership rules was a "spectacular failure" that didn't do enough to protect the public.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat, criticized FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin for what she called his agency's "culture of secrecy."

Mr. Martin, who was appointed by President Bush, defended the agency's performance.

He noted that more Americans are getting high-speed Internet access at lower costs and that "the communications industry is strong," especially compared with the late years of the Clinton administration.

DOJ_NMG_0126049

"In the year 2000, the communications industry began a precipitous and far-reaching decline," he said. "What a difference six years make."

But Mr. Martin's optimistic assessment was undercut by the commission's two Democrats.

Commissioner Michael J. Copps said that while profits may be good for many in the communications industry, the public interest is not being well served. For example, broadcasters are presenting far too much "gratuitously violent programming," he said.

In addition, telecommunications companies are not doing enough to provide high-speed Internet connections for Americans living in rural areas and inner cities, he said.

Committee members also pressed Mr. Martin and fellow Republican Commissioner Deborah Taylor Tate on their willingness to vigorously enforce the conditions that allowed AT&T complete its takeover of BellSouth.

After lengthy negotiations with the commission's two Democrats, AT&T agreed in late December to a set of conditions that cleared the way for a unanimous approval of the merger on Dec. 29.

But afterward, Mr. Martin and Mrs. Tate issued a joint statement saying some of the conditions were "discriminatory and run contrary to commission policy and precedent."

Commerce committee Chairman Daniel K. Inouye, Hawaii Democrat, asked if that statement means "you won't stand by the deal that was reached."

Mr. Martin said he would enforce the conditions, but said he intended to signal that it would be illegal to force AT&T's main competitors, Verizon and Qwest, to match those wholesale rates for business Internet service.

Data Privacy Bill Expected To Target Retailers, Banks (WP)

By Brian Krebs

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Data privacy is likely to be among the hottest technology issues to face Congress this year, in part due to interest from the new chairman of the House Financial Services Committee.

Panel Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) said he plans to craft a bill that would exempt companies from disclosing data breaches, provided they secure the data with encryption software or other technology that would render it virtually unreadable if it fell into the wrong hands.

Frank also said he wants retailers to be held more accountable for data breaches. Last month, TJX, the Massachusetts-based parent of discount retailers TJ Maxx and Marshalls, disclosed that hackers had broken into its credit card processing network, possibly exposing financial details on millions of customers.

This week, the Massachusetts Bankers Association said that some of its member banks have reported fraudulent transactions associated with the TJX data breach. Credit card issuers have contacted at least 60 banks affected by the break-in, the MBA said.

While more than 30 states have laws requiring companies to alert residents of data breaches, most of the statutes let the affected company delay notifying banks while law enforcement agencies investigate. Frank said retailers should be required to notify banks that issued the compromised credit card accounts so that financial institutions can issue customers new cards before fraud occurs.

"For too long, retailers have been immunized from having to own up when it's their mistake through contractual protection from Visa and MasterCard," he said.

Mallory Duncan, senior vice president and general counsel of the National Retail Federation, said Frank's proposal was an effort by some smaller banks to shift more of the costs of fraud to retailers. "Most of the larger banks have very sophisticated, round-the-clock fraud monitoring systems in place, but a lot of the smaller institutions don't have those systems," he said.

There have been more than 100 million instances in which Americans have had their personal data compromised due to data breaches or mishaps, according to the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a consumer group in San Diego.

The data breach bill that got the most support from industry and consumer groups last year -- offered by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) -- would require any organization holding personal data to notify consumers upon learning of a data breach. She has revised the bill, and it was among the first to be reintroduced this year.

The measure would preempt many tougher state laws and contains fairly broad exemptions, including not requiring entities to disclose a breach if a risk assessment concludes there is "no significant risk that the breach has resulted or will result in harm" to consumers.

While some major corporations -- most recently Microsoft -- have expressed support for some kind of federal consumer privacy law to govern how companies can use, combine and trade consumer data, the effort to produce baseline privacy protections for consumers may set off contentious policy debates, said Fred von Lohmann, a senior staff attorney with the Electronic Frontier Foundation.

DOJ_NMG_0126050

"The question with this issue -- as with others -- becomes, is this an area where dueling interest groups will make it difficult for Congress to come to an effective solution, or is it something that's moving so fast that anything Congress is likely to do will end up obsolete a year or two from now?" he said.

Consumer groups also expect corporate- and government-backed data mining practices to receive scrutiny from Congress, in part because the Senate Judiciary Committee is headed by Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), known for his staunch advocacy on consumer privacy matters.

The Bush administration has come under heavy fire from privacy advocates for its data mining initiatives and for pressuring Internet service providers to dramatically extend the length of time that they retain records of their customers' online activities.

Sanchez Quits Hispanic Caucus (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Congressional Hispanic Caucus was thrown into turmoil Thursday after Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Santa Ana) resigned her membership amid accusations that its chairman, Rep. Joe Baca (D-Rialto), had been demeaning to women.

Two of the remaining five women in the 21-member caucus expressed concerns about how the group treated them, but did not resign.

Rep. Hilda L. Solis (D-El Monte) complained about the "lack of respect afforded to women members of the Hispanic Caucus."

And Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Lakewood) stood by her sister and fellow congresswoman, saying: "I am waiting to see whether the Hispanic Caucus leadership will make good on its promise to be more fair and inclusive of Latina members."

"Latinas are the fastest-growing segment of the minority population," the Lakewood congresswoman said. "And their perspective deserves to be represented, not denigrated."

On Wednesday, Loretta Sanchez told the Politico, a new Capitol Hill newspaper, that Baca had called her a "whore." She has not responded to requests for an interview since then.

Baca denied the charges Thursday, saying, "These accusations are categorically untrue."

The Orange County congresswoman's resignation comes after six caucus members last year cut their ties to the group's political action committee after it made campaign contributions to relatives of caucus members — including Baca's sons Joe Jr. and Jeremy, who ran unsuccessfully for state Senate and Assembly respectively.

"At a time when the public is crying out for a more ethical government, we should be taking every step to avoid any appearance of preferential treatment for relatives," Solis said in a statement Thursday.

Some female caucus members also complained earlier this year that Baca's election as chairman was not conducted by secret ballot as required.

In her resignation announcement Wednesday, Sanchez cited her concern about the election as her only reason. "I and other members of the caucus voiced our strong opposition to Mr. Baca's chairmanship due to a violation of election rules," she said.

Baca dismissed these complaints Thursday, noting: "These issues have been discussed, reported, and laid to rest."

Sanchez told the Politico that she heard Baca had made the demeaning remark about her to California Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez.

But at a news conference Thursday in Sacramento, Nuñez said, "I have no recollection of any conversation with anybody about a dispute between Congressman Baca and Congresswoman Sanchez."

He added that he would "rather not be dragged into the mud" of a congressional fight.

Sanchez also told the Politico that when the caucus had approached her earlier this year to pay her contribution to support the caucus staff, she asked to be removed from the list of members.

"There's a big rift here," she told the newspaper. Using a vulgarity to describe how Baca treated women, she concluded, "I have no use for him."

Baca, in a statement Wednesday, called Sanchez's resignation "unfortunate." But in his statement Thursday, he implicitly criticized her, saying: "This 'controversy' is of the most disrespectful nature to our constituents and to our colleagues in the House because it is based on untruths."

DOJ_NMG_0126051

A congressional staffer, who was not authorized to speak on the matter and requested anonymity, said that some of the male members of the caucus were often disrespectful of the women — talking, laughing or making jokes while they were trying to speak at caucus meetings.

"This is a serious rift; it's bad for the community," the aide said. "If other women follow her lead, it looks bad for CHC. They let internal bickering override what they can do as a key bloc in Congress."

Breaking News: Two More Reps. Complain About Treatment Of Women In Hispanic Caucus (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, February 2, 2007

A day after Rep. Loretta Sanchez resigned from the Hispanic Caucus charging its chairman had called her a "whore,'' a pair of Democratic congresswomen from California spoke out in support of Sanchez's sweeping complaints that chairman Joe Baca did not respect the women in the caucus.

In an increasingly bitter spat dividing the 21-member caucus, Sanchez also had charged that her follow California Democrat, Baca, had treated the women in the group "like shit."

On Thursday, the two other California congresswomen bolstered Sanchez's remarks.

Rep. Hilda L. Solis said she shared "Sanchez's sentiment about the lack of respect afforded to women members of the Hispanic Caucus.'' And Loretta Sanchez's sister, Rep. Linda Sanchez, said she supported her sibling's decision to resign in protest of Baca's alleged remark, which he has "categorically'' denied.

On Thursday, Baca repeated his denial to Fox News, saying there was no rift within the caucus.

"There is none, absolutely none,'' Baca said. "Everybody is working together."

In her statement Thursday, Linda Sanchez said she was "waiting to see if the Hispanic Caucus leadership will make good on its promise to be more fair and inclusive of its Latina members.''

"Latinas are the fastest growing segment of the minority population,'' she added, "and their perspective deserves to be represented, not denigrated."

If the Hispanic Caucus "is to be truly representative of the Latino community," Solis said, "it must give equal treatment to all its members, regardless of gender or seniority."

Solis also reiterated concerns about the political arm of the caucus, BOLDPAC, which came under fire last year after Baca and his allies authorized political contributions to their relatives. Solis, the Sanchez sisters and three other lawmakers then withdrew from BOLDPAC.

"At a time when the public is crying out for a more ethical government,'' Solis said, "we should be taking every step to avoid any appearance of preferential treatment for relatives."

In an interview with The Politico Wednesday, Loretta Sanchez also cited concerns about whether Baca was properly elected Hispanic Caucus chairman in November and about his general attitude toward female lawmakers.

"I'm not going to be a part of the CHC as long as Mr. Baca illegally holds the chair … I told them no. There's a big rift here," Sanchez said. "You treat the women like shit. I have no use for him."

In a statement Wednesday, Baca said Sanchez "has decided to resign from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus…and has chosen to air baseless statements.''

"Let me be clear,'' he declared, "her comments are categorically untrue."

The last time lawmakers withdrew from the Hispanic caucus was in the late 1990s when its Republican members left over partisan differences.

Sanchez said she had rebuffed an approach earlier this year to contribute funds from her office budget to support the caucus' shared staff, a requirement for all its members.

"I told them to take me off the list, take me off the Web site, take me off everything," Sanchez said.

She said she was surprised and insulted when she learned that Baca had made the disparaging personal comment about her to California Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez and other legislators last year.

Nunez "is a friend of mine. Did he think he wouldn't tell me?" Sanchez asked.

On Thursday, a spokesman for Nunez said the state speaker would have no comment on the flap. But Nunez said at a news conference in California that he did not recall the comment.

"I'm not going to confirm that," he said, according to a posting on the Los Angeles Times blog, Political Muscle. "I have no recollection of being at" a meeting where "anything disrespectful" was said of a Hispanic caucus member.

"Somebody is going to have to refresh my memory,'' Nunez said. "I have no recollection."

DOJ_NMG_0126052

Sanchez voted against Baca in the Hispanic Caucus election for chairman in November. Four other female lawmakers abstained from the vote, raising concerns about whether the election followed proper procedures.

The Sanchez withdrawal is another blow to Baca and his allies who have been trying to bring the caucus back together after a series of internal spats last year. Many of the more junior members and the women have butted heads with him and senior lawmakers.

In recent weeks, Rep. Xavier Becerra, Calif., a caucus member who serves in House leadership as assistant to Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., had been trying to persuade the six members to rejoin the political action committee, which is known as the Committee for Hispanic Causes/Building Our Leadership Diversity.

Four female lawmakers have written Baca asking that the caucus repeat his election as chairman because the earlier vote failed to use secret ballots, as required in the group's bylaws.

Sanchez and other female CHC members have repeatedly complained that Baca and some of his male colleagues do not accord them a high level of respect.

"There is a big rift. Hello? Do they not get this?" Sanchez said.

Join The Conversation (read all 21 comments)

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by WorriedInPA on 02.02.2007 at 12:39 AM

How can I get on Loretta Sanchez' Xmas mailing list?

by sequoia on 02.01.2007 at 08:48 PM

RE: Cela & OC_Voter messages: Sanchez' poor taste in Christmas cards.

I have to laugh, my mother gets those borderline porn-like cards from Loretta Sanchez' office. The one sent out a couple of years back with her in a skin tight leather micro mini perched on top of a desk, again with a cat (Py?) in the picture, was disgusting. You can actually see right up her skirt, she was wearing black underwear, or maybe not? .... pulling a Brittany? The holiday greeting was also in poor taste. Loretta Sanchez, what can you say about her but what Baca said to Nunez about her. She is no class act, that's for sure. Loretta Sanchez has the reputation she has earned.

by Hughie on 02.01.2007 at 07:49 PM

Who the hell cares what Baca called Sanchez ? This Baca rep could have called her an m' f' ing ho-bag-piece- 'o crap and she can do NOTHING about such a slur. Why? She's not in the private sector and the offending representative, like her, is immune to such harassment laws. So, Sanchez baby, it's your bed, you made it, now sleep in it and shut your pie hole.

by theduke on 02.01.2007 at 07:28 PM

It saddens me to see subterranean actions and reactions by people; where is our self-respect and our cultural teaching?gone? We as Americans (Hispanic) have forgotten how hard our fights have been fought by our American heritage. We now war over Nada! For God Shakes, let?s not forget the nature of politics and what it means to be head of politics and the vitriol associated with-it. What I see is: females banding together in the hopes of finding strength in numbers and the refocus in destroying their own party from with-in. I am a Republication, but have no joy in seeing people engulfed with jingoistic and hubris behavior, not to mention the weakness it displays: dissension and trifle engagement?Si being called a ?Puta? is not the nicest of names, but I am sure this name is compassionate opposed to the political strategy employed to gain office?We are quailing over dirty dresses. I am shamed by my hermanos y hermanas whom have forgotten the political gains granted to use by those who have fought for our political causes?it is sickening to see our gains marginalized by name calling and the inability to recognize obtuseness. Stop all this, antes de usted deshonra todos nosotros!

Hispanic Caucus Members Toil Over Insult (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, February 2, 2007

Three female members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus accused the organization's male leaders Thursday of treating women unfairly. Rep. Loretta Sanchez said the caucus chairman called her a "whore."

Rep. Joe Baca denied uttering the insult, which Sanchez cited among grievances that led her to announce this week she was quitting the group.

"Let me be clear: Her comments are categorically untrue," said Baca, who like Sanchez is a California Democrat.

"He said it. For him to deny it is just a silly thing," Sanchez said in an interview.

She and Rep. Hilda Solis, D-Calif., said Baca made the comment at an event in Sacramento, Calif., over the summer and that it was repeated to them by people they declined to identify.

DOJ_NMG_0126053

"Name-calling never helps anything," said Sanchez, adding she confronted Baca about the comment. "He just shook for awhile and then he said, 'That's a lie.'"

The controversy, which became public with a report Wednesday on the Web site politico.com about the "whore" comment, was the latest evidence of conflict between men in the growing caucus and a smaller, mostly female contingent.

Baca was supported by only one of six women in the 21-member caucus when he was elected chairman in November. Solis, Loretta Sanchez and her sister, Linda, and Rep. Nydia Velazquez of New York subsequently disputed the election procedure and asked for a new secret-ballot vote. All caucus members are Democrats.

Other concerns include Baca's decision to use money from the caucus' political action committee to fund his sons' unsuccessful campaigns for state office in California last year. That led Solis, the Sanchez sisters and three other lawmakers to sever ties with the fundraising groups.

There also is a perception among female caucus members that their concerns are given short shrift in a caucus that — like the Congress as a whole — remains overwhelmingly male, despite high profile advances by women in Congress.

"I think there tends to be the sentiment that there has to be more work done to improve relationships in the caucus and the treatment of women in the caucus," Solis said in an interview.

"I am waiting to see if the Hispanic Caucus leadership will make good on its promise to be more fair and inclusive of its Latina members," said Linda Sanchez, whose district is near her older sister's in Southern California.

Better Security For Judges (NYT)

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

One of the more refreshing changes in Congress's mind-set growing out of the November election is that the House is no longer led by Republicans who demonize judges for sport. This change to more judge-friendly leadership should, at long last, lead to the House's joining the Senate in passing a much-needed bill to protect federal judges from physical attack.

The need for strong security measures for judges should be self-evident. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, federal judges have played a very visible role in the trials of suspected terrorists. Many of the most serious threats they face, though, are domestic. This was tragically underscored two years ago by the murder of the husband and mother of Judge Joan Lefkow of Chicago by a man upset with her ruling in a malpractice lawsuit. After those killings, Congress passed a law that, among other things, paid for home security systems for judges. More still needs to be done.

The Court Security and Improvement Act of 2007 includes new criminal penalties for misusing personal information to threaten serious harm to judges or their families, and increased sanctions for retaliating against witnesses. It allocates more resources to the United States marshals, who are charged with protecting federal judges. And it requires the marshals' director to consult with the Judicial Conference of the United States so judges have a greater voice in their own security.

In the last Congress, a similar bill was passed by the Senate, but House leaders blocked it. With the Democrats now in control, the current bipartisan bill — which has the support of the Democratic chairmen and the ranking Republican members of the Judiciary Committees in both the House and the Senate — should pass easily.

One of the best ways Democratic and Republican leaders can set a new tone in Washington is by jettisoning the heated anti-judge posturing and replacing it with sensible measures to protect the safety of the federal judiciary.

OTHER NEWS:

Bush, Dems Have Different Economic Views (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, February 2, 2007

The booming economy that President Bush paints is a far cry from the worrisome one increasingly portrayed by Democratic presidential candidates and party leaders. To them, there are worker insecurities, stagnant wage growth and soaring costs for health care and college.

The vision of rival economies already is a main issue for the 2008 presidential and congressional races. Economists say both sides are right — and wrong. It just depends on what numbers you summon.

Bush is trying to nudge the national focus away from Iraq and is offering a rosy picture of the economy ahead of his presentation Monday of a financial blueprint he says will lead to a balanced budget by 2012.

Congressional Democrats have embraced the same timetable. The course the rival camps chart to get there is bound to be the domestic-policy battle royal of the current congressional session.

DOJ_NMG_0126054

"Workers are making more money. Their paychecks are going further. Consumers are confident. Investors are optimistic," Bush said in a speech Wednesday at Federal Hall on Wall Street. It was his second on the economy in as many days.

"I'm not surprised that some of the good economic news is overshadowed by the difficult news out of Iraq," Bush told Fox News later Wednesday.

The president credits his first-term tax cuts for much of the upbeat news, ignoring the $10 billion-a-month drain on the government's balance sheets from the unpopular war in Iraq and military actions in Afghanistan and elsewhere to fight terrorism.

Bolstering Bush's outlook was a new Commerce Department report showing that the economy gained speed in the final three months of 2006. The economy grew at an annual rate of 3.5 percent, much faster than the 2 percent increase of the previous three months.

Stocks soared after that report and after the Federal Reserve's decision to leave interest rates steady.

But hold on.

Here comes this from Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, reprising the "two Americas" rich-poor divide he depicted in 2004 as a presidential and vice presidential candidate: "We cannot stand by and watch 37 million people wake up and not know how to feed and clothe their children."

Other Democratic presidential hopefuls are echoing the theme.

Also, freshman Sen. James Webb, D-Va., built on it when he gave his party's response to Bush's State of the Union address last month. "It's almost as if we are living in two different countries," Webb said.

To William Galston, a domestic policy adviser in the Clinton administration who now is the Brookings Institution, "We have the president's story of the economic aggregates and we have Jim Webb's story of economic anxiety and inequality.

"That tale of two economies will be argued out, not only between the parties but within the parties," he said.

The Democratic contenders are not shy about weighing in.

"There's something wrong when you have more bankruptcies in America last year than college graduates," Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York said in Iowa.

A 2008 rival, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, said, "Our economy is changing rapidly, and that means profound changes for working people." He cited "skyrocketing health care bills," lost pensions and struggles to pay for college.

The cutback in building has led to thousands of layoffs in the construction industry, Democrats note.

Such observations conflict with the glowing picture Bush and his aides present of a vibrant economy humming along at near-full employment.

"They've both got a point, and they're both trying to make their case" said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com.

"The president is right. The economy in aggregate is performing very well. So he's right to claim that the economy, looking from above, looks very good," Zandi said. "Democrats are also right. The fruits of this strong economy have largely accrued to higher income wealthier households."

The multifaceted state of the economy was reflected in a mixed bag of government economic reports issued Thursday.

The Commerce Department reported that people spent more than they made last year, resulting in a negative 1 percent personal savings rate — the lowest since the Great Depression. Meanwhile, the Labor Department reported a 20,000 drop in claims by newly laid off workers for unemployment benefits, a sign of a healthy labor market.

David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's in New York, said that "any rational way you look at this, the economy is doing pretty decently. You've got a 4.5 percent unemployment rate, productivity growth is solid. And inflation is by historical standards pretty reasonable."

Still, Wyss said, "We've got a couple of big problems out there, and some long-term imbalances. The top 20 percent is doing fairly well and the bottom 20 percent is doing better. If there's a hole, it's in the middle, which frankly are those old blue-collar jobs that the Democrats say are leaving the country. And they're right."

The president's approval on handling the economy was at 43 percent in early January's AP-Ipsos poll, up from December and higher than his overall job approval of 36 percent. The economy, along with Iraq, terrorism and health care are all seen as important issues by the public.

The White House and Democrats battled with dueling economic "fact sheets."

The Democratic headlines: worst job recovery on record; manufacturing jobs continue to disappear at historical levels; share of national income going to wages and salaries see record lows; household income declined by nearly $1,300 under Bush.

On the White House list: The economy has created more than 7.2 million jobs since August 2003; the unemployment rate was 4.5 percent in December; real wages rose 1.7 percent during 2006; real after-tax personal income per person has increased over $2,800 — or 9.6 percent — during this administration.

DOJ_NMG_0126055

The president did concede a point to Democratic rhetoric on Wednesday.

After Webb emphasized the growing and yawning gulf between salaries of chief executive officers and rank-and-file workers in his Jan. 23 Democratic response, Bush took aim at lavish salaries and bonuses for corporate executives. Corporate boards should "step up to their responsibilities" and tie compensation packages to performance, he said in his Wall Street speech.

Job Market Was A Key To Fed's Call (WSJ)

By Jon Hilsenrath

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Lots of investors expected interest-rate cuts early this year. But one part of the economy refused to cooperate: the job market.

Economic output seemed to slow in mid-2006, but the job market remained healthy. Government surveys of businesses showed jobs grew at a respectable clip of around 150,000 a month. Surveys of households showed they grew even faster. The unemployment rate fell to 4.5% in December from 4.9% in December 2005. And the performance was all the more remarkable because the labor force grew faster than it had in six years, meaning more to employ.

This matters to the folks who dictate short-term interest-rate levels at the Federal Reserve. Recessions are always accompanied by job-market weakness. A healthy job market means the Fed has less reason to goose the economy with lower rates. It also has a big impact on the Fed's inflation call. Fed officials want as much as anybody to see Americans fully employed. But a falling unemployment rate can signal reduced job-market slack, which could lead to wage pressure and inflation, something Fed officials don't want.

A debate is bubbling at the Fed now about how to read the job market, something San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen has spoken about. If output has slowed but employment remains robust, it could mean businesses are getting less out of workers. It also could mean output numbers understated the economy's strength.

Either way, the bottom line is simple. Economists expect the Labor Department to report today that payrolls grew another 167,000 in January and the unemployment rate remained 4.5%. Warm January weather will muddy the numbers, as will annual data revisions, which should also point up. But as long as the job market looks this strong, the Fed has little incentive to alter its inclination to push rates higher still.

Where Big is Better: Why Oil Shares Stay High

Investors who bet that Big Oil would get whiplashed by slumping oil prices have been whipped themselves.

Oil prices have dropped 26% since they hit $77.03 a barrel on July 14, hitting the bottom line of large oil companies. But their shares haven't followed suit. Exxon Mobil's profits slowed from a record run in the final months of 2006, falling 4.3% in the fourth quarter from a year earlier. Still its shares have gained 16% since oil peaked. Shares of Chevron, which reports earnings today, are up 12%. Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expect Chevron to report a 7% drop in fourth-quarter earnings per share today.

Why the disconnect? Oil companies are relatively cheap. Energy companies in the S&P 500 trade at 9.8 times their projected 2007 earnings per share, compared with about 15 for the entire index. Moreover, the companies are flush with cash they can use to support their shares. Exxon's dividends and share buybacks surged 41% in 2006 to $32.6 billion.

Not all oil companies have fared well, suggesting the advance of the supermajors is also a flight to quality. Shares of smaller oil producers such as Occidental Petroleum and Murphy Oil have taken their lumps since oil prices peaked. Sometimes big is better.

Fed's Inflation Dilemma (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials, in debating whether to adopt an explicit target for inflation, have discussed whether an implicit, or "soft" target, might be preferable.

The continuing debate reflects Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke's belief that the central bank needs to develop a clearer, more systematic way of communicating its intentions to the public, to lessen the chance of any market-jolting surprises.

Currently, the Fed's official aim is to achieve "price stability," but it doesn't specify what rate or range of inflation it thinks would fulfill that goal.

Mr. Bernanke has long favored setting an explicit inflation target, an increasingly common practice among foreign central banks. Many of those banks strive to keep inflation at or near 2%.

DOJ_NMG_0126056

Proponents of this approach say that adopting an explicit inflation target for the U.S. would reassure Americans, discouraging self-fulfilling inflationary expectations if, for example, the economy overheated or energy prices jumped. It also would give financial markets a better indication of the Fed's likely response to shifting economic conditions.

At Mr. Bernake's behest, the Fed's policy-making Federal Open Market Committee has been studying possible changes in how it communicates its forecasts, statements and meeting minutes. While the 19-member panel has also considered adopting an inflation target, Fed officials emphasize that such a move is far from certain.

Among the drawbacks to an explicit target is potential resistance on Capitol Hill, and internal discord over what, if any, number should be picked. That has prompted Fed officials to take a look at an implicit target, which would communicate the Fed's preferred inflation rate without having the force of an official goal.

Fed officials say one form of implicit targeting would be to extend the horizon of the Fed's economic forecasts beyond the current two years, with the inflation forecast for the last year of the period representing the Fed's implicit target. Another would be to poll all 19 FOMC members on their personal definition of price stability and publish the resulting range, rather than forcing them to agree on a single number or range.

But officials have significant misgivings about both approaches, primarily because they sacrifice clarity and accountability, the very benefits that targets are meant to achieve.

The Federal Reserve Act defines the Fed's goals as both price stability and maximum employment. Mr. Bernanke has long argued that a target is consistent with that "dual mandate." He argues that a target stabilizes the public's expectations of inflation, which enables the Fed to lower interest rates during a slump with less fear of setting off a run-up in prices.

But some Fed officials fear that argument is too subtle for many in Congress, who might contend that an inflation target elevates price stability's importance over that of employment. Barney Frank, the new Democratic chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, opposes an inflation target, while acknowledging that the FOMC has the authority to adopt one.

"There is a little bit of concern that the mandate doesn't extend to picking any particular number," said Ken Kuttner, an economist at Oberlin College in Ohio who wrote about inflation targets while on the staff of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. "There would naturally be people saying, 'Hey, I'm reading your mandate here guys, give us your [target] number for full employment.' And nobody wants to do that. A lot of the gains from ambiguity have to do with finessing that kind of situation."

Another drawback of an explicit target is the continued disagreement within the Fed over both the wisdom of adopting one, and over what the number should be if one were adopted.

One way to minimize both problems would be for the FOMC, rather than announcing a target, to lengthen its current semiannual forecast -- a range of forecasts by individual FOMC members -- to three or four years from the current two. Because that would ordinarily be long enough for the Fed's interest-rate actions to achieve any inflation rate the central bank desired, the fourth-year forecast could be construed as a target without being called one.

A shortcoming of this approach is that if a big shock, such as a jump in energy prices, drove inflation up sharply, it could take more than four years to get it back to the target, unless the Fed was willing to drive unemployment sharply higher. Another is that the forecast would include unemployment, and Congress might see that as an implicit target for which the Fed should be held accountable.

Another approach would be to poll all FOMC members on what constituted price stability, and to publish the results. The Bank of Japan adopted a similar approach last year and announced that its nine policy board members' views ranged from zero to 2% inflation.

But officials say that despite the appeal of the approaches, both are flawed and thus may not be much better than the status quo. If the FOMC claims its target is only a forecast, it would be less accountable for missing it, and that means the public, and investors, would be less likely to incorporate it into their own behavior.

The polling approach suffers from the fact the target could change every year with the composition and inclination of the FOMC's members. Without agreement on a single target, policy makers could respond differently to the same inflation picture.

Dow, Russell 2000 Close At New Highs As Economic Data Bolster Confidence (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 1 -- Stocks climbed for the third straight day Thursday as an already buoyant Wall Street embraced robust consumer spending figures and largely overcame disappointment over Google's earnings report. Both the Dow Jones industrial average and the Russell 2000 index of smaller companies closed at new highs.

The Dow advanced 51.99, or 0.41 percent, to 12,673.68. That marks the blue-chip average's 27th record close since October. It came in well above the record of 12,621.77 set Jan. 24. A new trading high of 12,682.57 topped a day-old record of 12,657.02.

DOJ_NMG_0126057

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 7.70, or 0.54 percent, to 1445.94, and the Nasdaq composite index was up 4.45, or 0.18 percent, at 2468.38.

The Russell 2000 rose 7.43, or 0.93 percent, to 807.77. The index first broke the 800 mark Wednesday.

The gains followed Wall Street's best day of the year on Wednesday, when it advanced sharply after the Federal Reserve signaled that the economy remained solid and that inflation was mostly in check. The central bank's comments, which followed its decision to leave short-term interest rates unchanged, injected a bit of confidence into an uncertain market.

Economic data continued to play a big role in trading, as it has all week. As expected, consumer spending in December showed its biggest increase in five months, rising 0.7 percent.

The Labor Department reported the number of newly laid off workers seeking unemployment benefits fell by 20,000 last week, to 307,000.Movers

Google fell $19.75, to $481.75. Though it posted a sharp increase in profit, investors accustomed to outsized gains were not wowed.

Exxon rose 98 cents, to $75.08, after announcing a 2006 profit of $39.5 billion, the largest ever for a U.S. company.

Archer Daniels Midland rose $3.47, to $35.47, after it said profit jumped 20 percent.

Comcast fell $1.43, to $42.92, after its fourth-quarter profit came up short of Wall Street's forecast.

Boeing reached a record high of $92.24 before closing up $1.49, at $91.05, after reporting strong results Wednesday.

Dow Rises 51.99 To A Record On Exxon Mobil's Results (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose for a fourth straight day, hitting a new record, aided by strong earnings from Exxon Mobil.

The Dow climbed 51.99 points, or 0.4%, to 12673.68, its 27th record finish since October. So far this year, the Dow is up 1.7%.

Shares of Exxon Mobil, a Dow component, gained 1.3% after the energy giant announced that fourth-quarter net income fell 4.3% from a year earlier but still beat analysts' expectations. For all of 2006, Exxon Mobil posted the biggest annual profit in U.S. history, $39.5 billion, up 9.3% from 2005.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rallied 0.5%, or 7.70 points, to 1445.94, up 1.9% on the year. The technology-stock-led Nasdaq Composite Index edged up 0.2%, or 4.45 points, to 2468.38, up 2.2% on the year.

Economic data were mixed, which reinforced many investors' impression of a relatively benign slowdown in U.S. economic growth. Many investing pros have been saying lately that conflicting data allow them to rule out two dire, but very different, scenarios: inflation and recession.

"A lot of people are thinking we're back to a Goldilocks economy," neither too hot nor too cold, said strategist Mark Keller, of A.G. Edwards & Sons.

Mr. Keller said his firm expects the U.S. economy to grow about 2.2% this year. That's a modest pace in historic terms, but still enough to sustain growth in corporate profits, which in turn should help the stock market.

The Commerce Department reported its measure of prices for consumer goods, excluding volatile food and energy, rose 0.1% in December, up 2.2% from a year earlier.

Most analysts believe the Federal Reserve views this index of personal consumption expenditures as a key inflation indicator, with annual growth above 2% less than ideal.

The higher December reading normally might signal risk of a Fed interest-rate increase. Luckily for stock investors, fresh manufacturing data signaled just the opposite.

The Institute for Supply Management's manufacturing index, a broad measure of activity in the sector, fell to 49.3 in January, contrary to economists' expectation for a reading of 52. Any reading below 50 signals contraction in the manufacturing sector.

In energy trading, crude-oil futures contracts for March delivery slid 84 cents, or 1.4%, to $57.30 a barrel, off 6.1% so far this year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1. Total trading volume for stocks on the NYSE was 2.89 billion shares; 2,454 issues rose and 889 fell.

Bond prices fell2. The 10-year note slipped 3/32 point, or 93.75 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.837%.

DOJ_NMG_0126058

The dollar strengthened3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 120.71 yen, compared with 120.67 yen. The euro fell to $1.3020, compared with $1.3034.

Manufacturing Activity Drops (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Dogged by excess inventory, the nation's manufacturers cut back production in January, suggesting the sector will continue to weigh on economic growth a while longer.

The Institute for Supply Management, a trade group representing corporate purchasing managers, said yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity fell to 49.3 last month from 51.4 in December.

Figures below 50 indicate a contraction; for the past four months the index has averaged 50.5. The recent readings have pointed to a stagnating manufacturing sector that continues to be held back by weakness in the housing and automobile industries.

The slowdown follows a four-year growth spurt in the manufacturing sector. Consumers began to scale back their purchases of homes and American-made cars last year, but many manufacturers have been slow to recognize the need to reduce inventories, according to Norbert Ore, who oversees the ISM survey.

Fear of a Surge

"Everybody's afraid to pull the trigger and cut inventories because they're afraid there will be another surge, and they'll be caught short," said Mr. Ore, who is also Georgia-Pacific Corp.'s procurement director. He said the manufacturing sector will remain sluggish over the next few months as businesses draw down their stockpiles of unsold goods.

Meantime, large inventories continued to take a toll on manufacturers' results. Late Wednesday, Pulte Homes Inc., Bloomfield Hills, Mich., reported a fourth-quarter loss, with the home builder citing an inventory charge and a high cancellation rate as contributing factors. Volterra Semiconductor Corp., Fremont, Calif., warned its first-quarter revenue would fall from fourth-quarter levels because of a customer's excess inventory.

Last month, however, there were signs manufacturers were getting serious about reducing inventories. The ISM reading on inventories plunged to 39.9 in January from 48.5 in December. Mr. Ore said it was the biggest monthly drop in more than 20 years. Readings on new orders and production also fell. The employment index in the sector remained in negative territory, and the measure of prices paid rose.

Beyond the soft manufacturing sector, though, the economy still is growing, thanks in large part to a strong labor market that is supporting consumer spending. More evidence of this came in a separate Commerce Department report that showed personal income rose 0.5% in December, following a 0.3% gain in November. Spending climbed 0.7% in December, following a 0.5% gain the previous month.

American consumers showed a willingness to spend beyond their immediate means, as the nation's savings rate -- or personal savings as a percentage of after-tax income -- fell to negative 1.2% in December from negative 1.0% in November.

Many Take On Debt

Economists often warn that consumers should save more, particularly with baby boomers approaching retirement, but many remain willing to take on credit-card debt or tap investment gains. The savings rate for all of 2006 was negative 1.0%, the lowest annual rate since 1933.

The index of personal-consumption expenditures, excluding food and energy -- the Federal Reserve's preferred inflation measure -- rose 0.1% in December, suggesting price gains continue to moderate, and the Fed will leave interest rates steady for now.

The National Association of Realtors said pending home sales rose 4.9% in December after four straight months of declines in another sign of stabilization.

Separately, the Labor Department said 307,000 people filed initial claims for unemployment benefits last week, down 20,000 from the week before and indicative of solid job creation.

US Manufacturing 'on Brink Of Recession' (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, February 2, 2007

The US manufacturing sector contracted unexpectedly this month as factory activity fell to its slowest pace in nearly three years, according to a fresh survey.

DOJ_NMG_0126059

The Institute for Supply Management said its manufacturing index fell into negative territory in January as it slipped below the 50 mark to 49.3.

The poor performance underlined economists' fears that the sector could be sliding into recession.

Industry leaders have been predicting a recovery this year after a weak performance in recent months. But a fall in new orders in January suggests further weakness ahead, economists said.

Richard Iley, an economist at BNP Paribas, said: "The ISM manufacturing index was weaker than expected and dovetails with our assessment that the manufacturing sector is really very weak and on the brink of recession."

Investors largely shrugged off the poor factory performance as US stock markets touched new highs, sustaining a rally that began this week after the Federal Reserve expressed increasing confidence in the economy.

Investors were encouraged by separate data released on Thursday that showed personal incomes rose 0.5 per cent last month.

The gain adds to recent increases in Americans' disposable income, which has lifted consumer spending and was the main driver of economic growth of 3.5 per cent in the fourth quarter.

The government figures also showed inflation pressures remained "moderate", according to Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at JPMorgan.

The core price index rose 0.1 per cent, following an unchanged reading in November and a 0.2 per cent rise in October.

Some Lawmakers Shun Big Game Pass (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

ETHICS RULES HAVE fewer lawmakers doing the Super Bowl shuffle.

Most lawmakers from Illinois and Indiana, fearing adverse publicity and new rules, shun Bears-Colts clash in Miami. Politicians and aides can accept tickets from corporations for face-value price, but Chicago-area Reps. Emanuel and Kirk opt to remain home.

"Folks are real wary," a Democratic aide says. A senior Republican strategist predicts new rules will eventually escalate stadium contacts between politicians and donors, since lawmakers can visit skyboxes free for fund-raising events.

Miami Democratic Rep. Meek's fund-raiser, $5,000 a head, includes game tickets.

DEMOCRATS ALLIED with auto makers shift trade debate to Japan.

While most manufacturers blast China for keeping the yuan weak against the dollar, Rep. Dingell of Michigan presses Treasury on yen values. Japan has kept currency weak "to gain an advantage with the U.S. market," the Energy and Commerce chairman writes Paulson.

Though the yen has weakened against the dollar, Treasury Secretary sees no evidence Japanese officials are trying to soften the currency; he notes absence of intervention in foreign-exchange markets since 2004. It is weak, Paulson says, because of Japanese economic problems.

ADMINISTRATION FACES skeptics at home and abroad about farm-subsidy cuts.

Agriculture Secretary Johanns travels to push administration proposal in Mississippi, Iowa, California and Tennessee. Trade expert Susan Sechler praises plan for allowing U.S. to resume Doha trade talks "with a straight face."

"The question really becomes....how far the U.S. will go," adds former Agriculture Secretary and trade representative Yeutter. Much further, says European Union, demanding "more ambitious cuts." But the White House plan squeezes 2008 Republican presidential candidates seeking Iowa support.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Romney is noncommittal and keeping "an open mind," a spokesman says.

NEW BOSSES? Former Democratic congressional aides form lobby group with connections to Baucus of Montana and Rangel of New York, now presiding over Senate and House tax-writing committees. Their firm, Capitol Counsel, including five Democratic alumni of tax panels, will give corporations "the best opportunity to present their case," says principal John Raffaelli.

NEW EXPERTISE: Reshuffle of House appropriations panel, creating financial services subcommittee, elevates lawmaker from the Bronx to chairmanship with clout over SEC and issues affecting Wall Street. "I'm looking forward to ringing the bell" on the New York Stock Exchange," says Rep. Serrano, a native of Puerto Rico.

ENVIRONMENTALISTS press Bush administration to back ban on trade in mercury at global diplomatic gathering in Nairobi next week. EU seeks to stop sale of the toxic pollutant, and Democratic presidential hopeful Obama has raised the subject. State Department says it is still mulling the issue.

BEAR MARKET: Fund raising for Bush's party slows after elections, complicating efforts to retire House Republicans' $14.4 million debt. Senate Republican committee -- criticized within the party for lackluster campaign -- has $1.3 million debt. Republican National Committee ends 2006 with $3.1 million cash, compared with Democrats' $3.7 million.

DOJ_NMG_0126060

BUSH'S BUDGET faces push-back from Congress.

Some lawmakers fear State Department's plan for $86 million to help Palestinian Authority security forces could aid Israel's enemies. Lt. Gen. Keith Dayton, top U.S. adviser to Palestinian military, assures congressional staffers of safeguards; money wouldn't go for guns or lethal assistance.

Lobbyists expect Bush to propose a five-year reduction in Medicare spending of $65 billion to $70 billion. That includes reducing the premium Medicare pays for drugs administered by physicians to 4% above the sales price, from 6%.

Pharmaceutical cuts are expected to draw opposition from oncologists, since cancer drugs often are administered by doctors.

MINOR MEMOS: Costly Christmas: Ex-House Majority Leader DeLay, facing Texas money-laundering charges, spent $454,000 on legal fees in final two months of 2006....New White House executive pastry chef William Yosses, as co-author of "Desserts for Dummies," included chapter called "A Real Cake Walk."

Sharpton Takes Biden To Task On Remarks (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, February 2, 2007

Civil rights activist Al Sharpton on Thursday took Sen. Joe Biden to task for calling Democratic rival Sen. Barack Obama "articulate" and "clean," questioning how the description reflects on other blacks.

Biden, still trying to deal with the fallout from his remarks, spoke by telephone on Sharpton's radio show. The Delaware lawmaker spent his first day as an official presidential candidate Wednesday explaining his statement that Obama is "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean."

Biden told Sharpton he regretted the comments and said he hadn't meant to disparage other blacks who had run for president in the past, including Sharpton, Jesse Jackson and the late New York Rep. Shirley Chisholm, who sought the Democratic presidential nomination in 1972.

But Sharpton told Biden: "A lot of people took it from you that because (Obama) is Harvard-trained, that people don't see someone as good and clean unless they are less connected to the struggle of the African-American community."

Sharpton also compared the gaffe to former Virginia Sen. George Allen's use of a racial slur against an Indian-American man last summer — a controversy that was widely believed to have cost Allen re-election.

"George Allen got 'macaca' — this might be a step past that," Sharpton warned.

Biden responded by lavishing praise on Sharpton, saying he and Jackson were the most articulate people in the country.

"I have overwhelming respect for what you did. I have an overwhelming respect for what Jesse did, and what Shirley Chisholm did," Biden told Sharpton. "I didn't know anyone tougher or straighter than Shirley Chisholm. I worked with her, I knew her."

The two men agreed that the best way for Biden to make up for his remarks was to stress issues of concern to the black community in his campaign, such as poverty eradication and speeding up the rebuilding of storm-ravaged New Orleans.

Sharpton, who ran a long-shot but spirited campaign for the Democratic nomination in 2004, is considering running again this time. He met last week in Washington with Biden and several other candidates, including Obama, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Sen. Chris Dodd, to determine whether they would sufficiently commit to urban issues.

Biden's interview was reminiscent of Sen. Trent Lott's 2002 appearance on Black Entertainment Television, where he apologized for praising Sen. Strom Thurmond, who ran for president in 1948 as a segregationist. Lott subsequently stepped down from Senate leadership.

An Inarticulate Kickoff (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

What is it, exactly, that white people mean when they call a black person "articulate"?

I'll leave it to Joe Biden to explain (or figure out) why he used "clean" as one of a logorrheic string of adjectives describing his Senate colleague Barack Obama. I'm not sure his initial revision and extension of his remarks -- that he meant "clean as a whistle" -- get him off the hook. Just a suggestion, but Biden might fall back to "clean as the Board of Health," meaning sharply dressed; the last time I saw Obama he was, indeed, wearing an impeccable navy suit.

For anyone who missed it, Biden explained Obama's appeal as a presidential candidate by calling him "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy." He was talking to a reporter for the New York Observer, who recorded the interview; an audio clip was soon posted on the Internet.

DOJ_NMG_0126061

There was a sharp reaction, mostly focused on Biden's incomprehensible reference to personal hygiene. The Rev. Al Sharpton, a one-time presidential candidate, said that when Biden called him to apologize, " I told him I take a bath every day."

For my part, I never made it past "articulate," a word that's like fingernails on a blackboard to my ear. As it happens, President Bush used that same word Wednesday to describe Obama. "He's an attractive guy. He's articulate," Bush told Fox News.

Will wonders never cease? Here we have a man who graduated from Columbia University, who was president of the Harvard Law Review, who serves in the U.S. Senate and is the author of two best-selling books, who's a leading contender for the Democratic presidential nomination, and what do you know, he turns out to be articulate. Stop the presses.

It's interesting that Obama's reaction dealt solely with the A-word. "I didn't take Senator Biden's comments personally, but obviously they were historically inaccurate," he said in a statement. "African-American presidential candidates like Jesse Jackson, Shirley Chisholm, Carol Moseley Braun and Al Sharpton gave a voice to many important issues through their campaigns, and no one would call them inarticulate."

Maybe he heard the screech on the blackboard, too.

Yes, I'm ranting a bit. But before you accuse me of being hypersensitive, try to think of the last time you heard a white public figure described as articulate. Acclaimed white orators such as Bill Clinton and John Edwards are more often described as eloquent.

What's intriguing is that Jackson and Sharpton are praised as eloquent, too -- both men are captivating speakers who calibrate their words with great precision. But neither is often described as, quote, articulate. Apparently, something disqualifies them.

Condi Rice is another story. Regular readers know that I think this administration's foreign policy is wrongheaded and dangerous. But I leap to Rice's defense when I hear people say, in the most patronizing tone, that she's soooooo articulate. What on earth do they expect? The woman has served as provost of Stanford University, national security adviser and secretary of state. Think maybe she ought to be able to speak in complete sentences?

I realize the word is intended as a compliment, but it's being used to connote a lot more than the ability to express one's thoughts clearly. It's being used to say more, even, than "here's a black person who speaks standard English without a trace of Ebonics."

The word articulate is being used to encompass not just speech but a whole range of cultural cues -- dress, bearing, education, golf handicap. It's being used to describe a black person around whom white people can be comfortable, a black person who not only speaks white America's language but is fluent in its body language as well.

And the word is often pronounced with an air of surprise, as if it's an improbable and wondrous thing that a black person has somehow cracked the code. I can't help but think of the famous quote from Samuel Johnson: "Sir, a woman preaching is like a dog's walking on his hind legs. It is not done well; but you are surprised to find it done at all."

Articulate is really a shorthand way of describing a black person who isn't too black -- or, rather, who comports with white America's notion of how a black person should come across.

Whatever the intention, expressing one's astonishment that such individuals exist is no compliment. Just come out and say it: Gee, he doesn't sound black at all.

So Far, Obama Can't Take Black Vote For Granted (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — He is hailed by his supporters as the hope of an increasingly multicultural nation, a political phenomenon who can wow white voters while carrying the aspirations of African-Americans all the way to the White House.

So why are some black voters so uneasy about Senator Barack Obama?

The black author and essayist Debra J. Dickerson recently declared that "Obama isn't black" in an American racial context. Some polls suggest that Mr. Obama trails one of his rivals for the Democratic nomination, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, in the battle for African-American support.

And at the Shepherd Park Barber Shop here, where the hair clippers hummed and the television blared, Calvin Lanier summed up the simmering ambivalence. Mr. Lanier pointed to Mr. Obama's heritage — he is the American-born son of a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas — and the fact that he did not embody the experiences of most African-Americans whose ancestors endured slavery, segregation and the bitter struggle for civil rights.

DOJ_NMG_0126062

"When you think of a president, you think of an American," said Mr. Lanier, a 58-year-old barber who is still considering whether to support Mr. Obama. "We've been taught that a president should come from right here, born, raised, bred, fed in America. To go outside and bring somebody in from another nationality, now that doesn't feel right to some people."

On Wednesday, the question of race took center stage in the presidential campaign because of remarks that Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, made about Mr. Obama. Mr. Biden characterized Mr. Obama as "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy" and then spent the day — his first as an official presidential candidate, explaining and apologizing for his remarks.

But among many blacks, the awkward and painful debate about race, immigrant heritage and the presidency has been bubbling for months.

Mr. Obama certainly has prominent black supporters and many shake their heads with exasperation at such talk about a man they see as the first African-American with a real shot at the presidency.

His supporters say his background only enhances his appeal as someone who has addressed the concerns of black Americans as a community organizer in Chicago, a state legislator in Illinois and a senator in Washington.

"He has a track record for being concerned about people who are poor, and it seems to be genuine," said Carol M. Swain, a black professor of political science at Vanderbilt University who has written about black politics. "Not only do I think that black Americans will embrace Barack Obama, but I think they will do it with enthusiasm."

Indeed, many pollsters and analysts believe Mr. Obama's life story of growing up in Hawaii and Indonesia with his mother and his maternal grandparents and of his struggle to define his own racial identity will resonate with voters across ethnic and color lines.

But while many whites embrace Mr. Obama's melting pot background, it remains profoundly unsettling for some blacks who argue that he is distant from the struggles and cultural identities of most black Americans. The black columnist Stanley Crouch has said, "When black Americans refer to Obama as 'one of us,' I do not know what they are talking about."

Ms. Dickerson echoed that sentiment.

"I've got nothing but love for the brother, but we don't have anything in common," said Ms. Dickerson, who wrote recently about Mr. Obama in Salon, the online magazine. "His father was African. His mother was a white woman. He grew up with white grandparents.

"Now, I'm willing to adopt him," Ms. Dickerson continued. "He married black. He acts black. But there's a lot of distance between black Africans and African-Americans."

Mr. Obama's strategists are keenly aware of the gap and are trying to address it. On Martin Luther King's Birthday, he spoke at a scholarship breakfast alongside the Rev. Jesse Jackson. Mr. Jackson introduced him by saying, a "new president is in the house."

Mr. Obama and his wife, Michelle, who is an African-American, were also on the February cover of Ebony.

Mr. Jackson and the Rev. Al Sharpton, both former black presidential candidates, have declined to formally endorse Mr. Obama so far.

But Julian Bond, the chairman of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, has described him as "tremendously appealing." Several black Democrats in Congress, including Representatives John Lewis, the civil rights pioneer from Georgia; Jesse L. Jackson Jr. of Illinois, the son of Jesse Jackson, and Artur Davis of Alabama, have supported his presidential bid.

His supporters, who note that he carried the black vote in his Senate race, say they are unperturbed by a recent Washington Post-ABC News poll that found that 20 percent of black voters surveyed supported Mr. Obama while 60 percent supported Ms. Clinton. The survey had a margin of sampling error of plus or minus nine percentage points.

Emil Jones Jr., the president of the Illinois state senate and one of Mr. Obama's early mentors, says he is frustrated by black voters who question Mr. Obama's Kenyan heritage. As a state legislator, Mr. Obama had the support of voters in his district, which is 67 percent black.

"He doesn't share the same kind of background as most African-Americans, but he's addressed those issues that related to underprivileged communities throughout Illinois," said Mr. Jones, who is black.

Mr. Obama describes himself as an African-American, and as a young man, he has said, he yearned to be accepted by black Americans.

Mr. Obama declined to be interviewed, but in his memoir, published in 1995, he acknowledged being dogged by "the constant, crippling fear that I didn't belong somehow, that unless I dodged and hid and pretended to be something I wasn't, I would forever remain an outsider, with the rest of the world, black and white, always standing in judgment."

DOJ_NMG_0126063

Still, Mr. Biden's remarks this week only heightened concerns among some blacks who believe that Mr. Obama, as the son of a black Kenyan, is more politically palatable to white voters because he is viewed as less confrontational and less focused on redress for past racial injustices than many black Americans descended from slaves. In that context, he resembles the last black man deemed to be a powerful presidential contender, Colin L. Powell, who flirted with a White House bid in 1995.

Discussing his appeal to white voters at the time, Mr. Powell, the light-skinned son of Jamaican parents, noted that he spoke English well and was not confrontational. He concluded by saying, "I ain't that black."

Philip Kasinitz, a sociologist at the City University Graduate Center, said such a description might as easily apply to Mr. Obama. "He's identifiably black, but in many ways he's outside of normal race relations," said Mr. Kasinitz, who has studied black immigrants in New York City politics. "He's a black politician for whom whites don't have to feel guilty."

Ronald Walters, who advised Mr. Jackson's presidential campaigns, said Mr. Obama's campaign "evokes something which is very much in vogue, this notion of diversity that is not rooted in a compensatory concept."

"He's going to have to win over some African-Americans," said Mr. Walters, who is black and heads the African-American Leadership Institute at the University of Maryland. "They have a right to be somewhat suspicious of people who come into the country and don't share their experience."

In the 1990s, the number of blacks with recent roots in sub-Saharan Africa nearly tripled while the number of blacks with origins in the Caribbean grew by more than 60 percent, according to the State University of New York at Albany. By 2000, foreign-born blacks constituted 30 percent of the blacks in New York City and 28 percent of the blacks in Boston, according to demographers at Queens College.

Several leaders of the civil rights era had immigrant roots, including Stokely Carmichael, who was born in Trinidad; and Shirley Chisholm, the former presidential candidate and the first black woman to be elected to Congress. Her father was born in Guyana and her mother in Barbados.

Donna Brazile, who ran Al Gore's presidential campaign, said she believed that Mr. Obama could woo black voters.

"Barack will tell us that we don't have to go back to being just a white America or a black America, that we can now become something else, together," said Ms. Brazile, who is unaffiliated with any presidential candidate.

"That's the promise of his campaign," she said, "and his challenge."

Clinton Setting A $1 Million Goal For Donors (NYT)

By Patrick Healy And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is establishing record-setting goals for presidential campaign fund-raising, her advisers say, asking donors to raise at least $1 million for the honor of being in her top echelon of supporters.

That million-dollar benchmark is 10 times the amount that President Bush's "Pioneers" were expected to raise in his 2000 race; at that time, the Pioneers' $100,000 goal was considered sizable.

Clinton advisers said the new fund-raising levels, laid out in meetings of finance team members this week, would help achieve their goal of raising $75 million in 2007. At least $15 million is expected from New York, Mrs. Clinton's home base, the advisers said.

Precise fund-raising goals and numbers of donors are not yet known by the campaign, with the major meeting of the finance team planned for next Wednesday.

Several Clinton fund-raisers said in interviews that they expected dozens of donors to reach the tier of $500,000 — in part because of the star power at their disposal. The campaign has lined up surrogates for Mrs. Clinton at Democratic fund-raisers around the country; among them are former President Bill Clinton and a senior campaign adviser, Ann Lewis.

"It will be almost impossible for any other candidate to raise the money that the Clintons can raise," said John Catsimatidis, a New York fund-raiser for Mrs. Clinton.

The names for each category are under discussion, advisers said, but designations like "Hillraisers" and "Pathfinders" have been proposed.

On Wednesday, a leading Clinton supporter in New York, Alan Patricof, convened a meeting of about 15 donors with Mrs. Clinton's finance director, Jonathan Mantz. Attendees described it as a "talk to the troops" session, with fund-raising dates being worked out. A major New York gala is tentatively set for March 18.

Other Democratic candidates are also moving to post significant fund-raising numbers for the first quarter of 2007, which ends March 31. Former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina has scheduled 24 fund-raisers over 19 days in February.

As a lawyer, too, he is reaching out to fellow trial lawyers — as he did when he ran for president in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0126064

“Fund-raising has been a lot easier than we thought it would be,” said Jennifer Palmieri, an Edwards spokeswoman. She predicted that he would raise more than $7.4 million in this quarter — more than he took in during the first quarter of 2003.

“We fully expect that Hillary and Obama will raise more — her a lot more, and him certainly more,” she added.

Howard Wolfson, a spokesman for the Clinton campaign, responded: “No one plays the expectations game better than the Edwards team. For two years, they have been telling their extensive network of donors to hold off giving him money so they could collect at least $20 million in the first filing period. And Senator Obama might well double that. They will have all they need.”

Senator Barack Obama of Illinois has not yet established fund-raising tiers, though he has said he will not raise money or accept bundled contributions from registered federal lobbyists.

He accepted about $125,000 from lobbyists last year. He has no plans to return that money, a spokesman said, nor does he plan to transfer money from his 2006 federal Senate account to his presidential explor atory committee account.

Advisers say the Clinton campaign has no plans to adopt a similar prohibition on money from lobbyists.

McCain, Giuliani Skipping Some Conservative Events (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, February 2, 2007

A speech given by former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney before a National Review-sponsored conference last week may have been panned as unfocused, but in the eyes of those who attended, he at least had one thing going for him: He showed up.

Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, both of whom face serious skepticism from many conservatives, skipped the National Review event, and neither plans to attend a gathering of the Republican Study Committee, a group of conservative House members, this weekend in Baltimore.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling of Texas, the RSC chairman, is "looking forward to hearing Mitt Romney and believes that the RSC retreat offers a unique opportunity for some of the top minds in the conservative movement to come together to strategize, discuss and be heard," said Brad Dayspring, a spokesman for the group.

Romney, who is aggressively seeking the favor of conservative leaders, is on the schedule to address the RSC on Friday. In March, he is scheduled to speak at the Club for Growth's winter conference in Florida and to appear before the annual Conservative Political Action Conference in Washington.

David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union and one of the chief organizers of CPAC, said his group hadn't heard back yet from either McCain or Giuliani about whether they'll be at the three-day meeting, which starts March 1. "I frankly don't get it," Keene shrugged in an interview Wednesday. "On the one hand," he said, McCain has been "trying to court the right, but on the other, he seems to be dissing them."

Keene, who has not picked a candidate, readily admits that he has his differences with the maverick senator, but suggested that McCain has pluses that would resonate before a conservative audience, notably his hawkish stance on government spending and the Iraq war.

Asked to explain why they would pass on an opportunity to make their case before such influential audiences, members of McCain's camp said they don't have as much to prove.

"It's important to keep in mind that the senator has served as a conservative for over 20 years in Congress," said campaign spokesman Danny Diaz. "These people know him, they know his pro-life record, his fiscal conservatism, his stance on the war on terror. The same can't be said for others in the race."

When McCain cannot attend an event, he has sent surrogates, Diaz said. Conservative activist Bob Heckman was at the National Review conference, and former Sen. Phil Gramm is standing in for him at the RSC meeting in Baltimore. As for the CPAC gathering in March, Diaz said a decision would be made in the "coming days and weeks."

Giuliani's team excuses his absence from National Review and RSC by pointing out that he is speaking to conservative audiences in places that will have considerable sway in deciding the next nominee. The former mayor was in New Hampshire last weekend addressing the Republican convention, said Giuliani spokeswoman Katie Levinson. "This weekend he's down in South Carolina at the invitation of the state party." He'll also speak to the state party's executive committee.

Reaching out to Republicans across the board is important to Giuliani, she said, and is something he'll continue to do aggressively.

A decision has not been made on if Giuliani will attend CPAC, but he plans to speak before the board of the conservative Hoover Institution when it meets for a conference next month in Washington.

As with McCain, ACU's Keene predicts Giuliani would get a decent reaction should he also make it to CPAC in part because he's a celebrity of sorts. "Many conservatives admire his performance in NYC on crime, taxes and after 9/11," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0126065

To Romney's camp, there is truth to Woody Allen's maxim about the importance of just showing up.

"As the old saying goes, a true friend is the person who walks into the room when all the others get up and walk out," quipped Kevin Madden, a spokesman for the former governor. "As a conservative Republican who wants to lead our party to victory and champion our ideals, Governor Romney prefers to reach out to these important groups as opposed to ignoring them."

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by edofarrell on 02.01.2007 at 03:13 PM

Bush has been the worst president we've ever had in this country. In 2000 or 2004 we could have (and actually did in 200) elected better people to the White House. Now, with six years of corruption, ineptitude, lying and plain stupidity the Republicans still want to whine. You had your chance to make all the changes you could ever have wanted to make with control of the House, the Senate and the WH. Instead you were corrupt, ran up a huge deficit and got us involved in another Vietnam. Take your medicine boys, it's only going to get worse as the truth starts to filter out of the congressional hearins now underway.

by Kearney on 02.01.2007 at 01:26 PM

As far as deficits, we're in a WAR. We've never fought a war without running them, and frankly we'd be foolish if we ever did. We didn't ask for this war (not even Iraq, contrary to myth), but since we're in it, we'd better be serious about funding it. I agree with your implicit criticism that Bush hasn't cut government enough, and believe especially that a lot of spending and agencies should be eliminated as a war economy measure, but that's not Bush's style and never was.

As for "taxing health plans", Bush's proposal is the most profoundly free-market reform idea for health care in decades. It seeks to cut the tie between employment and health insurance, and give individuals a huge tax CUT if they buy their own health insurance. Nobody gets their auto insurance or homeowner's insurance through their employer; why health insurance? Because during World War 2, government freezes on salary levels (mistakenly thought to be an effective inflation-fighting mechanism) caused employers, desperate to attract talent in an extremely tight job market (with 11 million men in uniform), to pile on fringe benefits like health insurance. That distortion is still going on via inertia and tax code disparities to this day, and because nobody pays attention to the cost of health care and doesn't shop intelligently for it, has contributed mightily to exploding health costs.

by Kearney on 02.01.2007 at 01:18 PM

Bush never campaigned as a movement conservative in 2000; he was the leftmost candidate in the GOP field, not counting quick flameouts like Liddy Dole and Orrin hatch. With his talk of "compassionate conservatism" and his condemnation of a technical change in EITC benefits championed by DeLay as "balancing the budget on the backs of the poor," Bush made it clear he wanted distance between him and the conservative core. Although the frontrunner and winner of pluralities, he was overwhelmingly rejected by the majority of straw poll attendees, caucus voters, and primary goers until the field shook out later in the campaign, due almost solely to being not trusted to be conservative enough.

His general election campaign hinged almost solely on the notion that the Clinton years were wasted frivolity and that a serious effort to help the poor was necessary, especially helping black and Hispanic children get a good education. While Bush has an overall conservative lean, he is not, and never ha been, interested in cutting government, certainly not as an end in itself, and never sold himself as such.

Point being, it's not like conservative can complain about being 'betrayed' or 'sold a bill of goods'. The right went with Bush in 2000 as the better of two options, and especially out of fear and loathing of Al Gore. After 9/11, and after the Democrats nominated a man the right saw (correctly) as someone who would be less forceful on terror at home or abroad if, say, the French or Hollywood disapproved, the Right went with Bush again, almost overwhelmingly on national security grounds.

by B Frank on 02.01.2007 at 11:52 AM

Conservatives, look what you've done to yourselves by giving Bush a blank check and the republican congress taking the last 6 years off while Bush and his cronies run things. Now, all you have for frontrunners are Rockefeller republicans. Anyone to the right of them like Brownback will never be able to get elected. The American people have had enough rightwing selfrighteousness. For people who supposedly want smaller government we have bigger deficits, more spending and nation building. Almost sounds like the Democrats doesn't it? Not Bush is talking about raising taxes by taxing health plans. This is conservative? Look like all you rightwingers have been had.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

Pawlenty Boosts McCain (POL)

By Jeff Patch

DOJ_NMG_0126066

The Politico, February 2, 2007

Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty said Thursday that his fellow partisans must regroup after a bruising 2006 election cycle and decide between ideological purity and electability in the 2008 contest -- a not-so-veiled plea for conservatives to take a fresh look at Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

"The marketplace just told Republicans something," said Pawlenty, who will take the reigns of the Republican Governors Association this summer. "It told them that we are choosing for now to select the products and services of your opponent."

In a session with reporters at the Washington offices of lobbying firm Clark & Weinstock, Pawlenty outlined his position and legislative outlook on several topics, including the economy, energy, health care and immigration. But the buzz of the conversation, hosted by former Minnesota Republican congressman Vin Weber, centered on Pawlenty's role as Minnesota co-chair of the exploratory committee of McCain,. Weber supports former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, who Pawlenty will replace at the RGA.

Pawlenty took pains to avoid negative comments about fellow Republicans and focus the conversations on what he views as McCain's pluses.

"I believe he's in a league of his own," he said, also dismissing concerns that McCain will lose credibility by supporting President Bush's troop boost in Iraq.

Pawlenty acknowledged that there are concerns among conservatives about whether McCain's record is "sufficiently conservative." Pawlenty's comeback: "If you hold any of these candidates to a purity litmus test, with the possible exception of (Kansas Sen.) Sam Brownback, we'll have nobody left," Pawlenty said.

"Senator Brownback also fails, too" chimed in Kate O'Beirne, the Washington editor of the National Review, a conservative weekly.

Minnesota's chief executive also had a simple, if glib, answer for what President Bush should do now that the Democrats gained power in Congress, similar to Democratic gains in Minnesota.

"Pray."

The second-term governor, who pledged to focus on Minnesota and eschew higher office during the 2008 cycle, also took a shot at Democratic Senate hopeful Al Franken, the liberal comedian.

"I don't think he'd be right for Minnesota," Pawlenty said, nonetheless conceding Minnesota's penchant for oddball elections. "You'd be hard-pressed to point to what he's done that would lead you to the conclusion that he should be helping -- be in the United States Senate at this time."

California Primary Shift Seen Hindering McCain (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

Arizona Sen. John McCain's presidential aspirations stand to suffer a stunning setback if California Republicans carry out a plan to move part of their nomination process up from June to Feb. 5 next year.

"If the California Republican Party approves this idea, it may benefit candidates other than Senator John McCain," Orange County state Assemblyman Chuck DeVore told The Washington Times.

The proposal backed by Mr. DeVore, an influential conservative activist, calls for the 1,600 members of the state Republican Central Committee to select at least 53 of their 165 delegates to the 2008 Republican National Convention at the California party's regularly scheduled February convention in Sacramento.

An alternative plan being negotiated by Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Democrat-controlled state Assembly would move the 2008 presidential primary election up from its traditional June date -- where it has in recent years had no effect on the selection of the party's presidential nominee -- to Feb. 5.

Florida is also expected to move its Republican primary to Feb. 5. Florida Gov. Charlie Crist, a Republican, is expected to put his statewide campaign machinery at the disposal of Mr. McCain for the presidential primary in that delegate-rich state.

Several other states are also planning to move up their primaries to early 2008, which political analysts predict would mean that nominees of both parties will be known after the votes are counted on Feb. 5.

California officials say moving the presidential primaries up to February -- while leaving the primary elections for other offices as scheduled for June -- will cost state taxpayers an extra $90 million.

"DeVore's plan would save taxpayers $90 million and give the Republican Party here a big say in who our presidential nominee is and do it without an unneeded primary election in February," said Republican state Assemblyman Doug LaMalfa.

The real reason the Legislature wants to change the primary date, Mr. DeVore said, is to get on the ballot an extension of term limits, adding six more years for Assembly members and four more years for state Senate members.

DOJ_NMG_0126067

"This election has two purposes: To impact the presidential nomination process and to place a term-limit extension initiative on the ballot in time for some lawmakers to run for re-election during the regularly scheduled June 2008 primary," Mr. DeVore said.

Mr. LaMalfa said he is "inclined to help" get the DeVore plan taken up by the state party convention meeting less than two weeks from now.

Mr. McCain is widely viewed as the 2008 Republican presidential nomination front-runner nationally. In California, he is expected to benefit from the tacit support and perhaps formal endorsement of Mr. Schwarzenegger. But many Republican leaders in the state -- who would vote in the February convention under Mr. DeVore's plan -- oppose Mr. McCain.

"The activists on the state central committee here have still not forgiven him for the McCain-Feingold assault on the First Amendment nor do they appear comfortable with his incoherent philosophical agenda," Mr. DeVore said. "Senator McCain seems to be more a product of the New York Times than of the party of Ronald Reagan."

California Republicans note that several top Schwarzenegger operatives -- including Steve Schmidt, a former spokesman for the Bush-Cheney 2004 campaign and most recently campaign manager of Mr. Schwarzenegger's successful re-election bid -- have joined Mr. McCain's operation as senior advisers.

Hunter Out To Capture White House (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, February 2, 2007

LOS ANGELES — Rep. Duncan Hunter sees his opening in the race for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination as the conservative's conservative.

"I believe strongly in this nation that we can have a new American sunrise of opportunity, faith and freedom," he says. "I think this is a time for the type of leadership I can offer."

Hunter, 58, is a veteran congressman from eastern San Diego County who chaired the House Armed Services Committee for the last four of the dozen years that Republicans controlled the House of Representatives.

That job made him well-known to Capitol insiders and a favorite of defense contractors, who found in him a staunch supporter of the Pentagon and of high-tech weapons systems.

He lost his chairmanship when Democrats won control of the House in November. He made his presidential candidacy official last month, basing it on three principles:

•A hard line on illegal immigration.

•Cracking down on countries, mainly China, that he says are killing American manufacturing with unfair trade policies.

•Unwavering support for a strong military and for the war in Iraq, including President Bush's addition of more than 20,000 U.S. troops.

"Over the next five to 10 years, clearly national security is going to be a major focus for our country," Hunter says after being asked why he is running. "I've concentrated on that function of government for the last 26 years in the House of Representatives."

Hunter announced his candidacy last week in South Carolina, one of the earliest primary states. With a big military presence and an apparel and textile industry hit hard by foreign competition, South Carolina will probably be a place where Hunter must do well to gain entry to the top tier of GOP hopefuls.

"He's very much a long shot," says Jack Pitney, professor of government at Claremont McKenna College in California and former head of research for the Republican National Committee. "He sees a niche for a social conservative with a strong defense background," he says. "He's putting a steel beam on the beach and hoping lightning will strike."

Hunter has solid claim to his conservative credentials. He was one of the sponsors of a law Congress passed last year authorizing construction of 700 miles of fencing along much of the U.S.-Mexican border, and he claims credit for fencing already in place along the border at San Diego. He says the millions of immigrants in the USA illegally should be sent home and told to apply for visas if they want to come back.

"As president, I will complete the border fence in six months," he says.

On trade, he accuses China of devaluing its currency to make its goods cheaper in the USA. He says he would tear up trade deals with China and demand more favorable ones. He sees China as a security threat, too.

"China is arming, and they're doing it with American trade dollars," he says.

On Iraq, he firmly supports Bush's decision to go to war. "I think going in was the right thing to do," he says.

Hunter grew up in Riverside, Calif., the son of a conservative activist and home builder who worked for Barry Goldwater's and Richard Nixon's campaigns and lost his own race for Congress in 1968.

DOJ_NMG_0126068

In 1980, at age 32, Hunter defeated a Democratic House incumbent as the GOP picked up more than 30 House seats in the election that put Ronald Reagan in the White House.

Hunter dropped out of high school to join the Marines and earned a Bronze Star as helicopter pilot in the Vietnam War. He became a lawyer after leaving the service. A son, Marine 1st Lt. Duncan Duane Hunter, recently returned from a second tour of duty in Iraq.

Al Gore Nominated For Nobel Peace Prize (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

Oslo, Norway — Former Vice President Al Gore was nominated for the 2007 Nobel Peace Prize for his wide-reaching efforts to draw the world's attention to the dangers of global warming, a Norwegian lawmaker said Thursday.

"A prerequisite for winning the Nobel Peace Prize is making a difference, and Al Gore has made a difference," Conservative Member of Parliament Boerge Brende, a former minister of environment and then of trade, told The Associated Press.

Brende said he joined political opponent Heidi Soerensen of the Socialist Left Party to nominate Gore as well as Canadian Inuit activist Sheila Watt-Cloutier before the nomination deadline expired Thursday.

"Al Gore, like no other, has put climate change on the agenda. Gore uses his position to get politicians to understand, while Sheila works from the ground up," Brende said.

During eight years as Bill Clinton's vice president, Gore pushed for climate measures, including for the Kyoto Treaty. Since leaving office in 2001 he has campaigned worldwide, including with his Oscar-nominated documentary on climate change called "An Inconvenient Truth."

Norwegian lawmakers are among the thousands of people and groups with rights to nominate Nobel candidates. Others include members of national governments, past laureates, members of the awards committee and its staff, and many university professors.

The winner is traditionally announced in mid-October, with the prize always presented on the Dec. 10 anniversary of the death of its creator, Swedish industrialist Alfred Nobel.

Praying At The Pump (NYT)

By Ronald E. Minsk

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

Washington

ONCE again, the price of oil is making Americans nervous. After falling by more than one-third since peaking above $75 per barrel last summer, the price has rebounded to $58 with the re-emergence of cold weather and news of a production cut by OPEC. As Congress and President Bush face off over energy policy, we should reaffirm a few basic principles. A very important one is that our most critical goal in enhancing our energy security is to maintain a stable price for oil.

When we talk about energy “dependence” or “security,” we really mean oil. We do not import coal or wind or the sun or geothermal steam, and we import only a tiny percentage of the natural gas we consume from anywhere other than Canada. Thus there is virtually no geopolitical risk in using any of these sources.

This is why energy policy statements frequently begin with the goal of “eliminating the import of Middle East oil.” Such aims presume that our insecurity derives from oil imports, and reflect our distaste of being beholden to autocratic regimes in the Middle East and elsewhere that we perceive as sharing neither our interests nor our values. This presumption, however, is wrong.

Simply put, our oil addiction undermines our well-being because the volatility of oil prices threatens our economy. Because we spend so much on oil and there are no short-term substitutes, price spikes wreck household, business and government budgets alike. Our sense of insecurity is magnified because volatility is both unpredictable and generally beyond our control.

If we could predict future oil prices, we could plan for them. But few people can adjust their lifestyles to reduce their oil consumption significantly in response to price spikes. Likewise, businesses may be reluctant to invest in efficiency or alternative fuels because the higher oil prices that make such investments cost-effective could collapse virtually overnight.

It is important to remember that our insecurity is related to price volatility and not to the source of the oil. If OPEC members suspended exports but the price of oil mysteriously did not rise, we would not care about the interruption. It is only because a supply interruption always affects price that we care about oil’s uninterrupted flow.

Yes, the oil market does care where oil comes from, because the political and economic stability of the supplier informs the market about its reliability as a producer. And because there is a world market for oil, supply interruptions anywhere affect the price of oil everywhere. Even if we imported oil only from the most stable countries (or eliminated imports altogether), so long as unstable countries and regions supply the world market, we would be exposed to the risks of a volatile market. It is precisely the economic risk posed by price fluctuations that forces us to spend diplomatic and military capital in oil-producing regions.

DOJ_NMG_0126069

This means that the percentage of oil we import is relatively unimportant. Even the use of alternative liquid fuel instead of oil-derived gasoline will not allow us to escape this volatility, because as direct substitutes for each other, gasoline and alternative fuels will be similarly priced, just as gasoline sold by different oil companies or at different gas stations is similarly priced today.

Accordingly, while the domestic production of oil or alternative liquid fuels may be critically important for other reasons — it can create jobs, stimulate development of new technology, reduce the trade deficit, protect our environment and lower the baseline price of oil — it won't do much to end oil price fluctuations.

It's true that we can help mitigate the effects of oil price volatility by increasing fuel economy standards on cars and trucks. In fact, the more efficient use we make of oil today as opposed to 25 years ago has certainly reduced some of the effects of recent price fluctuations. But tighter fuel standards cannot eliminate the effects of volatility, because new business and governmental budgets already assume increased efficiency; nor would they protect us from price spikes brought on by, say, a new military conflict in the Middle East.

The only way to truly address price instability is to find ways to, in a crisis, quickly and substantially increase fuel production, or to develop some means by which consumers could quickly switch from liquid transportation fuels to other fuels. Not only would it be remarkably difficult to develop these new abilities to such an extent that they could offset the effects of the largest foreseeable supply interruption, but achieving them might have an unexpectedly negative effect: undermining incentives to increase oil production and decrease demand.

In the short term, technology like plug-in hybrid cars could help with volatility, because it allows consumers to choose day to day whether to power their cars with oil or with the sources their utilities use. In the long term, however, if we cannot find a way to increase production and inoculate ourselves from oil-supply interruptions, we are either going to have to develop cars that need no oil, or learn to live with the risks of the global market.

When Americans fill up the tank, they do not care where their gasoline comes from — they just want a stable price. And the fact that we import so much oil does not, in itself, cause its price to fluctuate so wildly or promote inflation. There are many paths to take as we seek to improve our energy security, but all should be based on one principle: real security can come only through finding a way to keep prices stable.

Abrogating Workers' Rights (WSJ)

By Lawrence B. Lindsey

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Why is the new Congress in such a hurry to take away workers' right to vote? It seems extraordinary, but the so-called "Employee Free Choice Act" is right there near the top of the Democrats' agenda. This legislation replaces government-sponsored secret ballot elections for union representation with a public card-signing system.

Under the act, once a union gets a majority of the workers to sign a card expressing a desire for a union, that union is automatically certified as the bargaining representative of, and empowered to negotiate on behalf of, all workers. In the 28 states that do not have right-to-work laws, all employees would typically end up having to join the union or pay the equivalent of union dues whether or not they signed the card. Moreover, under the act, the bargaining process would be shortened, with mandatory use of the Federal Mediation Service after 90 days and an imposed contract through binding arbitration 30 days after that.

I am sympathetic to the argument that strengthening the negotiating position of workers is good public policy, and that expanding the choices available to them is the best way to accomplish that. So, for example, pension portability unlocks the golden handcuffs that financially bind workers to jobs they may become dissatisfied with after they have become vested. Health savings accounts are an important first step to liberating people from jobs they put up with only because they fear a disruption in health-care coverage.

When it comes to unions, it doesn't take a very deep appreciation of game theory to understand that a worker's best position comes when a nonunion company has a union knocking on the door. Indeed, one allegation about "union busting" by supporters of the bill is that, during union certification elections, one employer in five "gave illegal previously unscheduled wage increases while a similar number made some kind of illegal unilateral change in benefits or working conditions."

In other words, they made workers better off. But, never fear, the Employee Free Choice Act will limit these unconscionable increases in pay, benefits and working conditions by imposing fines of up to $20,000 against employers who make such "unilateral changes." Similar penalties will be assessed against employers who caution that unionization may cause them to shut down or move production elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0126070

Sometimes the interests of workers and unions coincide, sometimes they do not. The chief complaint by the bill's sponsors is that unions only win secret-ballot elections half of the time. Apparently workers, after they think things over and when neither the union nor the company knows how they vote, often decide they are better-off without the union. The solution of the Employee Free Choice Act is to do away with such elections. It is hard to see how that "empowers" workers. And it is hard not to conclude that this bill has little to do with employee choice or maximizing employee leverage, and everything to do with empowering union bosses and organizers.

The unions allege that companies use unfair election campaign tactics and that a pro-employer National Labor Relations Board doesn't punish them. But statistics cited by the leftwing Web site, Daily Kos, on behalf of this allegation come from 1998 and 1999 -- when the entire NLRB had been appointed by President Clinton. In any event, roughly half the injunctions brought against companies by the NLRB were overturned by federal courts: This does not suggest under-enforcement of the law by the NLRB.

All of this does not mean that there are no legitimate complaints about the union certification process. Companies have been found that fired workers for union organizing activities. One careful examination of NLRB data found that there were 62 such cases in fiscal 2005. This is not a large number in a work force of 140 million, or in a year where there were more than 2,300 certification elections. But it is 62 too many, and it would be reasonable to stiffen the penalties for employers who break the law. But it is hard to think of offering more pay or better worker conditions as something that should be punished with draconian penalties, as the Employee Free Choice Act does.

Most important, it is totally unreasonable to deny all 140 million American workers the right to a secret ballot election because some employers break the law. Not only is such a remedy disproportionate, it is counterproductive -- if one's goal is worker empowerment. How can a worker be better off if both his employer and his prospective union boss know his views on the union when the secret ballot is replaced with a public card signing? For the worker it is the ultimate example of being caught between a rock and a hard place.

The political rhetoric in support of this bill is a willful exercise in obfuscation. For example, on the presidential campaign stump John Edwards says, "if you can join the Republican Party by just signing a card, you should be able to join a union by just signing a card." The fact is, you -- and everyone else -- can join any union you want by just signing a card, and paying union dues and meeting any other obligations imposed by the union. But, under this bill, contrary to Mr. Edwards's false analogy, signing a card to join the Republican Party does not oblige you to vote for the Republican ticket in a secret ballot election. The Employee Free Choice Act would take care of that by abolishing such elections. If the Edwards principle was applied to the political process in the 28 non-right-to-work states, Karl Rove and Republican Party organizers could force all Democrats and independents to become Republicans and pay dues to the party if a majority of voters signed Republican Party cards. That is free choice?

The final proof that this bill is about union power, and not worker choice, is revealed by its treatment of the flip side of unionization: decertification elections. These are secret ballot elections in which workers get to decide that they have had enough of the union. So under the Employee Free Choice Act can a majority of workers decertify the union by signing a card? Not on your life. Here unions want the chance to engage in a campaign to give workers both sides of the story -- and maybe do a better job of representing them -- before the union's fate is decided, by a secret-ballot vote.

No one has ever argued that secret-ballot elections are a perfect mechanism, either in politics or in deciding unionization. But they are far and away the best mechanism we have devised to minimize intimidation and maximize the power of the people who really matter, whether citizen or worker. Congress should think a lot harder before it decides to do away with workers' right to vote.

Mr. Lindsey is president and CEO of the Lindsey Group.

Is $34.06 Per Hour 'Underpaid'? (WSJ)

By Jay P. Greene And Marcus A. Winters

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Who, on average, is better paid -- public school teachers or architects? How about teachers or economists? You might be surprised to learn that public school teachers are better paid than these and many other professionals. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, public school teachers earned $34.06 per hour in 2005, 36% more than the hourly wage of the average white-collar worker and 11% more than the average professional specialty or technical worker.

In the popular imagination, however, public school teachers are underpaid. "Salaries are too low. We all know that," noted First Lady Laura Bush, expressing the consensus view. "We need to figure out a way to pay teachers more." Indeed, our efforts to hire more teachers and raise their salaries account for the bulk of public school spending increases over the last four decades.

DOJ_NMG_0126071

During that time per-pupil spending, adjusted for inflation, has more than doubled; overall we now annually spend more than $500 billion on public education.

The perception that we underpay teachers is likely to play a significant role in the debate to reauthorize No Child Left Behind. The new Democratic majority intends to push for greater education funding, much of which would likely go toward increasing teacher compensation. It would be beneficial if the debate focused on the actual salaries teachers are already paid.

It would also be beneficial if the debate touched on the correlation between teacher pay and actual results. To wit, higher teacher pay seems to have no effect on raising student achievement. Metropolitan areas with higher teacher pay do not graduate a higher percentage of their students than areas with lower teacher pay.

In fact, the urban areas with the highest teacher pay are famous for their abysmal outcomes. Metro Detroit leads the nation, paying its public school teachers, on average, $47.28 per hour. That's 61% more than the average white-collar worker in the Detroit area and 36% more than the average professional worker. In metro New York, public school teachers make $45.79 per hour, 20% more than the average professional worker in that area. And in Los Angeles teachers earn $44.03 per hour, 23% higher than other professionals in the area.

Evidence suggests that the way we pay teachers is more important than simply what they take home. Currently salaries are determined almost entirely by seniority -- the number of years in the classroom -- and the number of advanced degrees accumulated. Neither has much to do with student improvement.

There is evidence that providing bonuses to teachers who improve the performance of their students does raise academic proficiency. With our colleagues at the University of Arkansas we found that a Little Rock program providing bonuses to teachers based on student gains on standardized tests substantially increased math proficiency. Researchers at the University of Florida recently found similar results in a nationwide evaluation.

Of course, public school teacher earnings look less impressive when viewed on an annual basis than on an hourly basis. This is because teachers tend to work fewer hours per year, with breaks during the summer, winter and spring. But comparing earnings on an annual basis would be inappropriate when teachers work significantly fewer hours than do other workers. Teachers can use that time to be with family, to engage in activities that they enjoy, or to earn additional money from other employment. That time off is worth money and cannot simply be ignored when comparing earnings. The appropriate way to compare earnings in this circumstance is to focus on hourly rates.

Moreover, the earnings data reported here, which are taken directly from the National Compensation Survey conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, do not include retirement and health benefits, which tend to be quite generous for public school teachers relative to other workers. Nor do they include the nonmonetary benefit of greater job security due to the tenure that most public school teachers enjoy.

Educators sometimes object that hourly earnings calculations do not capture the additional hours they work outside of school, but this objection is not very compelling. First, the National Compensation Survey is designed to capture all hours actually worked. And teachers are hardly the only wage earners who take work home with them.

The fact is that teachers are better paid than most other professionals. What matters is the way that we pay public school teachers, not the amount. The next time politicians call for tax increases to address the problem of terribly underpaid public school teachers, they might be reminded of these facts.

Jay P. Greene holds the endowed chair of education reform at the University of Arkansas and is a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, where Marcus A. Winters is a senior research associate. Their report, "How Much Are Public School Teachers Paid?," was released this week.

A Bipartisan Trade Policy (NYT)

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

The newest Democratic members of Congress have arrived in Washington with an important message from the voters: American workers are feeling economically insecure, and globalization and trade are heightening their fears. The White House and the new Congress still have a chance to create a bipartisan consensus on trade. They should seize it, for the good of the American economy, and for the good of the world's poorest nations, which need freer trade to pull themselves out of poverty.

There are some quick steps the White House and Congress should be able to agree on. To reassure workers at home, they could expand federal assistance to anyone thrown out of a job because of trade. At the same time, new tariff benefits for the least-developed countries, like Bangladesh and Cambodia, would send a positive signal to the rest of the world.

Over all, trade has been very good to the United States, which is still the world's largest exporter of goods and services. The trade liberalization measures put in place after World War II produce now, by one estimate, an additional $1 trillion in income for Americans annually, and millions of new jobs. The inexpensive foreign goods that arrive here because of free trade keep prices down. Low prices are good for consumers, and by keeping inflation and interest rates in check, they encourage economic growth and job creation.

DOJ_NMG_0126072

Still, there is no question that the hundreds of thousands of workers who lose their jobs to trade-related dislocations each year are paying the price. The government has not done enough to take care of these displaced workers, and much of the blame lies with the economic policies of the White House and the last Congress, which was led by Republicans.

Now that the Democrats control Congress, they can champion both free trade and the rights of American workers. They should push to improve the social safety net, especially access to health insurance. And they should promote increased retraining and wage assistance for displaced workers.

To win Democrats' support, the White House will have to accept some of their demands for stronger labor provisions in future trade accords. Bans on forced labor and child labor, and similar mandates, are laudable goals. But Democrats who propose minimum-wage rules have to recognize that what is low pay for Americans may pull a family out of poverty in a less-developed country.

The administration's proposed farm legislation looks like a decent first step toward reducing subsidies and bringing American agricultural policy into line with our trade commitments. Now, if the administration can put together a solid plan for proceeding with negotiations for the Doha round of global trade talks, Congress should renew the president's fast-track negotiating authority. But if the global talks cannot be jump-started, the White House and Congress should move ahead with bilateral agreements with Peru, Panama and Korea.

Democrats are right to insist that the trade agenda advance the interests of all Americans, not just large corporations. But they need to acknowledge that putting the brakes on global growth is still the surest path to losing American jobs.

Free To Choose In Utah (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Another brick could soon fall from the Berlin Wall that surrounds America's failing public schools, as Utah's legislature considers what would be the first universally available statewide voucher program in America.

The voucher bill passed out of committee earlier this week and is backed by Governor Jon Huntsman. It would offer students who attend private K-12 schools from $500 to $3,000 in tuition reimbursement based on family income. While Utah is known for its Mormon population, the biggest winners under the plan would be the state's growing Hispanic population, who haven't done well in general in Utah public schools.

As usual, local school boards and the state teachers union (the Utah Education Association) are fighting the idea, claiming that it will "drain" money from public schools. This hardly seems likely because the $9 million cost of the program is about 0.5% of total school spending. And the voucher maximum of $3,000 is less than half the state per child public-school spending average of $6,325. The voucher bill also allows Utah public schools to keep the difference between the voucher amount paid out to students who leave and the $6,325 per pupil average.

Vouchers are working in a handful of cities, such as Cleveland, Milwaukee, and Washington, D.C. Former Florida Governor Jeb Bush also promoted a statewide plan, until a liberal state court invented constitutional objections. The evidence on student performance has mostly been favorable in these schools, and research by Harvard economist Carolyn Hoxby has found that the presence of vouchers has caused the public schools to improve their performance as well.

So let's hope Utah lawmakers stare down the opposition and give this statewide experiment a try. "For the unions, this vote is about protecting their monopoly," House Speaker Greg Curtis says. "They don't like vouchers for the same reason blacksmiths didn't welcome the Model T."

Rice To Seek Support For Mideast Effort (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will launch a new effort to forge a Palestinian state by seeking an endorsement today from a rare Washington meeting of a high-level group that monitors Middle East peace.

The Quartet, made up of the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations, has played a largely backstage role in the long-stalled peace process. But Germany, which currently holds the rotating presidency of the E.U., has pressed to revive the role of the international group -- and U.S. officials decided that an endorsement would help bolster Rice's planned return to the region this month to host a meeting between Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0126073

European officials say that Rice's decision to hold the meeting in Washington signals the administration's determination to make progress with just two years left in President Bush's term. "This sends a clear message that the United States is reengaged," one European official said yesterday.

Rice maintains that the prospects for peace have suddenly turned brighter, even though Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has dwindling support among Israelis and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has struggled against the Hamas-led legislature. In a series of recent trips to the region, Rice has tried to unite what she calls "mainstream" Arabs against extremist forces that she says include Iran, Hamas and Hezbollah. She suggests that the strategic interests of Israel and its neighbors have begun to overlap, making it easier to win Arab support for and interest in a peace deal.

Accepting an approach long urged by Europeans and Palestinians, Rice will push Olmert and Abbas to discuss the contours of a final peace deal, even though they have made little progress in implementing the initial steps of a peace plan promoted by the administration for the past four years.

Previously, the administration argued that such negotiations would be premature until the Palestinians met basic security requirements and Israel ended its settlement expansion. Now, Rice suggests that sketching a "political horizon" will boost the confidence of the two sides to take those initial steps -- and to ultimately give Abbas the leverage to defeat Hamas.

But turmoil in the Palestinian territories has increased in recent days. A tentative cease-fire collapsed yesterday as Hamas and forces loyal to Abbas's Fatah party engaged in an intense gunfight in the Gaza Strip that killed six people and wounded at least 50. The administration is pressing a $100 million plan to bolster and train Abbas's security forces.

Behind the scenes, there are tensions in the Quartet group over the administration's determination to maintain an economic embargo on the Palestinian government led by Hamas, which the State Department considers a terrorist organization. The Russians, in particular, have pressed for an end to the embargo. The Europeans last year won approval for a temporary -- now largely permanent -- aid program that directly benefits the Palestinian people, bypassing Hamas institutions. The aid ban, however, has allowed Iran to gain a greater role in Palestinian affairs as it provides huge amounts of smuggled cash to Hamas.

A senior administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the group's communique was still being drafted, said that "we need to review the mechanisms in place" for aiding the Palestinians. He said the administration views the aid ban on Hamas to be "a relative success," but he acknowledged that others might argue that it has not succeeded because Hamas still refuses to recognize Israel.

He noted that overall aid to the Palestinians has increased in the past year, and that "apocalyptical visions" of Palestinian suffering because of the aid ban have not materialized.

Over the past six years, the administration has promoted several peace initiatives, only to back off in the face of setbacks. One senior European official who recently met with Rice said he is impressed by her apparent determination to achieve a breakthrough. Asked why he believes this time is different, he smiled and said: "One must always be an optimist."

UN Chief Wants More Energetic Mideast Peace Quartet (AFP)

AFP, February 2, 2007

UN chief Ban Ki-moon wants the international Quartet for Middle East peace meeting Friday to strive for progress on the ground rather than merely making statements, his spokeswoman said.

Ban, who took office on January 1, will attend his first meeting of the diplomatic Quartet -- which includes the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia -- in Washington Friday.

"He hopes that the Quartet will seriously engage with the key issues that have a direct impact on the situation on the ground, going beyond mere statements," his spokeswoman, Michele Montas, told reporters Thursday.

"He is fully aware that within the region and beyond, many are looking at the Quartet to be more energetic in its efforts than it has been at times to break the current impasse in the peace process," Montas said.

She added that Ban "believes the Quartet should reach out to the parties and also all the key regional partners for a more systematic dialogue and involvement in the Quartet's deliberations."

In an AFP interview Wednesday in Nairobi, Ban expressed hope that Friday's meeting will yield a detailed agreement on how to implement the Quartet's blueprint for the creation of a viable Palestinian state.

"It's encouraging that we are now able to re-energize this Quartet process," Ban told AFP before traveling to Washington.

"The Middle East question has been too long unresolved, which has been having a negative impact on this regional situation," he said. "I hope we will be able to agree in a detailed manner on the implementation of the roadmap."

The Quartet, which has not met formally since September, issued a "roadmap" for achieving Israeli-Palestinian peace in 2003, but the three-stage plan that should have led to the creation of a Palestinian state by 2005 has since languished.

DOJ_NMG_0126074

The plan's phased implementation meant crucial "final status" issues like the borders and powers of a Palestinian state and the fate of Palestinian refugees could not be tackled until Israel's security was guaranteed -- allowing militants to stymie progress with continued attacks.

Friday's gathering will include Ban, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana.

Shootout In Gaza Deepens Bitter Split (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 1 — A fragile truce between Palestinian factions in Gaza broke down Thursday when Hamas members fired on a convoy from the rival Fatah group, touching off an intense gun battle that killed six people and wounded at least 50.

In the West Bank on Thursday, Israeli troops shot dead four Palestinians in three confrontations.

In the Gaza episode, Hamas members of the Palestinian security forces shot at what Hamas said was a truck convoy delivering weapons to the Presidential Guard, a security force that protects the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, who is a member of Fatah.

The trucks entered Gaza from Israel at the Kerem Shalom crossing, near the spot where the borders of Gaza, Israel and Egypt converge.

The convoy reached central Gaza before it was stopped by the Executive Force, a security agency made up mostly of Hamas supporters, said Islam Shahwan, a spokesman for the force. The Fatah men refused to allow any searches, and the shooting soon erupted, he said.

Mr. Shahwan said the convoy was stopped because “we have witnessed Fatah using new weapons and believe they were bringing in more.”

Fatah officials said the convoy was hauling generators, medical equipment and tents, and accused Hamas of violating the latest truce, which took effect on Tuesday and had brought relative calm for two days.

But Thursday’s shootout, near the Bureij refugee camp, claimed six lives, and at least four of them were security force members. Also, about 50 people were injured in central Gaza and in fighting elsewhere, according to doctors at Shifa Hospital in Gaza City.

Hamas, the radical Islamic group, controls most of the Palestinian government and the Executive Force, which Hamas established after coming to power last year. But Mr. Abbas also has a range of powers, and most members of the security forces are considered supporters of Fatah.

More than 60 Palestinians have died in the internal Gaza fighting over the past two months, and talks to establish a national unity government have again collapsed.

In the West Bank violence, the Israeli troops shot and killed three militants in clashes in Nablus and Tulkarm, the military and Palestinian residents said.

The Israelis also shot and killed a 17-year-old Palestinian who was trying to cut through a fence that is part of Israel’s separation barrier near Ramallah.

In another development on Thursday, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert testified for five hours before a commission investigating how Israel conducted its war last summer against Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Mr. Olmert was the last of dozens of political and military figures to give testimony at the closed-door sessions.

An Israeli official, who spoke on condition of anonymity but was briefed on the testimony, said Mr. Olmert gave a detailed explanation of the entire conflict and did not seek to assign blame. The commission questioned Mr. Olmert at some length about the ground offensive in the final days of the fighting, which resulted in heavy Israeli casualties.

Many Israelis feel the inconclusive war was mismanaged, and Mr. Olmert’s popularity fell sharply after the war. The commission is expected to issue an interim report in March.

Also, Defense Minister Amir Peretz selected the Israeli arms maker Rafael to develop a missile defense system designed to shoot down the short-range rockets that Palestinian militants and Hezbollah have directed at Israel.

Mr. Peretz chose Rafael’s “iron dome” system over a number of competitors, including the Lockheed Martin Corporation, the big American military contractor. The Rafael system will provide an answer to rockets with a range of several dozen kilometers, Mr. Peretz’s office said in a statement, and is expected to be ready for deployment in about two years.

6 Dead In Gaza After Renewed Palestinian In-fighting (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

DOJ_NMG_0126075

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

JERUSALEM — Renewed violence between rival Palestinian factions in the Gaza Strip left at least six people dead today, despite a three-day-old cease-fire agreement.

Clashes broke out around the coastal strip after gunmen from the ruling Hamas movement ambushed a convoy of trucks they said were carrying arms from Egypt destined for its main rival, Fatah. Four members of Palestinian security forces and two bystanders died in the fighting and more than 40 others were injured.

Egyptian officials in Gaza and a spokesman for the presidential guard of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who belongs to Fatah, denied the trucks were carrying arms. They said the cargo was supplies for a presidential guard compound in Gaza.

The two sides called the truce following clashes that killed about 30 people last week. On-and-off again violence kicked up in December after Abbas called for new elections to break a political deadlock.

Hamas, which unseated Fatah in parliamentary elections a year ago, sees early elections as part of a coup attempt and accuses the United States of backing Fatah in the escalating violence.

The Bush administration plans to provide $86 million in what it describes as nonlethal aid to Abbas' security forces. Egypt has shipped weapons to bolster his forces in Gaza, with what Israeli officials say is their permission.

Hamas and Fatah have negotiated for months over terms of a coalition government aimed at breaking an international aid embargo against Hamas. But the talks have repeatedly faltered, mainly over the distribution of Cabinet portfolios and Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel.

Western nations cut aid because they consider Hamas a terrorist group, and set three conditions for a renewal: the Palestinian government must recognize Israel, renounce violence and agree to abide by past agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

How Lebanon's Army Could Hold Key To Peace (WSJ)

By Cam Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- For almost six months, Lebanese Army soldiers have helped control one of the world's most volatile flashpoints, patrolling near Lebanon's 49-mile border with Israel. Now, its troops are shouldering an even more urgent, and in many ways more difficult, task: standing between fellow citizens from rival groups on the same Beirut streets where the civil war that still haunts Lebanon raged two decades ago.

The job is severely testing what may be the last Lebanese institution that still holds public confidence, and perhaps the only one keeping the deeply fractured society intact. Yet without a quick settlement to the political crisis that has paralyzed the government since November, current and former army leaders warn, street violence like last week's could spiral beyond the military's ability to contain it.

"The unity of the army is the only thing that keeps this country from meeting the definition of a 'failed state,' " says Elias Hanna, a retired general in the Lebanese army and a strategic analyst.

About 6,000 soldiers have been patrolling the capital since December. That is when government opponents, led by Hezbollah, the Shiite Muslim political, social and militia group, flooded downtown Beirut in an effort to topple the U.S.-backed government. They contend it lacks constitutional legitimacy given the resignations of six ministers, including five Shiites, in November.

Tensions peaked last week when Hezbollah called a general strike, and its supporters burned tires and blocked roads to Beirut's airport. Although some members of the current government wanted the army to break through the barricades, commanders decided to let the protests play out, hoping they would relieve pressure, according to current and former senior officers.

By Jan. 25, the wisdom of that strategy was clouded by doubt, as a cafeteria brawl between Shiite and Sunni Muslims at a Beirut university spilled into the streets. Ensuing violence spread, leaving four dead and about 200 wounded. Clashes flared across the city and beyond in scenes reminiscent of Lebanon's civil war, complete with rooftop snipers.

About 20 soldiers, including three officers, were among the wounded, according to a senior commander who isn't authorized to speak officially. With perhaps one exception, soldiers helped contain the violence by not returning fire; they were under strict orders to avoid actions that could cause the fighting to escalate, the senior commander said. In the days that followed last week's clashes, all sides seemed to breathe easier.

Many fear the calm is temporary. They say the army's ability to maintain order can't last forever, making a political resolution urgent. Nizar Abdel-Kader, a retired senior army general, and others close to the current army leadership say senior officers warned rival political factions last week that soldiers couldn't keep the peace on Beirut's sidewalks forever. "The tension was raised to a degree where it is now too risky to believe that the army can continue with the same effectiveness in quelling these clashes," says Mr. Abdel-Kader, who is a columnist for the Lebanese Arabic-language newspaper Ad-Diar.

DOJ_NMG_0126076

Since last week's violence, the army's efforts on Beirut's streets seem to be most intense after sunset. Soldiers man mobile checkpoints, often stopping each passing car. Some are waved through quickly, while others are closely screened to be certain they aren't ferrying armed men -- another echo of Lebanon's past.

In the tent city near Martyrs Square, where government opponents have camped for weeks, protesters are nervous about who may be plotting against them -- but thankful for the presence of soldiers throughout the city. "We will lift our hats and bow in front of them," says Mohammad Kawar, a 46-year-old cab driver and Hezbollah supporter. The group's leader, Hassan Nasrallah, has pledged that his followers won't push Lebanon into civil war even if 1,000 of them are killed.

If street violence does resume, there are other factors that could make it difficult for the army to minimize. The soldiers in Beirut include members of special-forces and "intervention" units, men trained to respond aggressively to any threat. (Members of Lebanon's Internal Security Force, who are better prepared for a mission of this type, remained in their barracks last week. Their participation might prove combustible, since their leaders are viewed by some as being too close to the government.) The soldiers also are drawn from the same ethnic and religious groups now in conflict.

"The army reflects the fabric of this society," Gen. Hanna says. He and others also note that the integration since the early 1990s of each unit -- Sunnis, Shiites, Christians and others serve side by side -- is a major benefit.

The entire 60,000-man force also has endured the physical stress of a high alert for months, since the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah. And under the United Nations Security Council resolution that ended that conflict, the Lebanese Army, in tandem with a beefed-up U.N. force, is responsible for patrolling Hezbollah's stronghold in the south to deter renewed fighting.

Mr. Abdel-Kader says the Beirut mission is the most physically, psychologically and emotionally draining for any soldier. "After all," he says, "you are facing your own people."

U.S. Eyes Re-establishing Relations (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

The State Department said yesterday it is considering re-establishing a diplomatic presence in Somalia for the first time since U.S. troops withdrew from the African country in 1994 after an unsuccessful U.N. humanitarian operation amid a bloody civil war.

Even if the department determines that the political and security conditions on the ground have improved sufficiently, it will not reopen the U.S. Embassy, which has been closed since 1991, but will most likely set up a small presence post, officials said.

"It's something that's being actively examined right now," department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters. "We are going to take a look, obviously, at what is appropriate in terms of security [and] political presence ... in Somalia."

Although the United States never formally severed diplomatic relations with a Somali nation that dissolved into near anarchy from 1991 on, it closed its embassy there.

About a month ago, Somalia's weak transitional government, backed by troops and weapons from Ethiopia, drove out Islamists who had controlled the capital, Mogadishu, and much of the country's south for six months.

Since then, the security situation has improved, although there have been attacks in Mogadishu.

"There aren't any final decisions" about sending U.S. diplomats to Somalia, Mr. McCormack said. However, he added that if the situation continues to improve, the department could send diplomats.

Jendayi Frazer, assistant secretary of state for African affairs, considered visiting Somalia during a trip to the region early last month, but the State Department's Diplomatic Security Service decided it was not safe, a senior official said.

The U.S. Embassy in Kenya is responsible for watching developments in Somalia, but the lack of diplomatic presence on the ground limits the knowledge and potential influence of the United States, officials said.

In Mogadishu yesterday, mortar bombs and rockets killed at least three persons, wire reports quoted witnesses as saying. It was not immediately clear who was behind the attack. On Tuesday, a series of blasts rocked the capital's northern part, in an area where Ethiopian troops were based before they began a pullback withdrawal last month.

Officials have blamed remnants of the Islamist movement, who fled to the south after their defeat, for some of the attacks.

Miss Frazer pledged $40 million in financial assistance for Somalia during her trip.

She said the United States was trying to "mobilize international support to help build the governance capacity" of the transitional authorities and to "move forward with the deployment of an African stabilization force."

DOJ_NMG_0126077

"It is very important that the peacekeeping force is led by Africans, especially participation by Muslim countries," she said in a Jan. 17 speech at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

In 1993, Somali clan militiamen shot down two Black Hawk helicopters and killed 18 U.S. soldiers. The bodies of two of them were dragged through the streets of Mogadishu.

Shiite-Sunni Conflict Rises In Pakistan (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, February 2, 2007

MULTAN, PAKISTAN

In this Punjabi city of shrines, Shiites and Sunnis prayed side by side during Ashura this week, the holiest holiday for the world's 150 million Shiite Muslims. But a province away, suicide bombers attempted to strike Shiite processions throughout Pakistan's Northwest Frontier Province, leaving as many as 21 dead and more than 40 injured in three separate incidents, including two suicide attacks.

The violence, the latest in a sharp uptick against Pakistan's Shiite minority, has heightened concerns that Iraq's conflict may be feeding sectarian violence here. Whether the conflict in Iraq is capable of igniting Pakistan's simmering sectarian tensions raises questions about a growing global sectarian war.

The answer is important, analysts say, because Pakistan's 30 million Shiites – numbering more than Iraq's – could become a flash point if sectarian violence spreads.

"In Pakistan, it is not a battle like in Iraq. But in Pakistan, you have the same violence ... driving the conflict," says Vali Nasr, author of The Shia Revivial, a study of global Sunni-Shiite conflicts. "We are going to see increasing occurrences of the bombings like we've seen over the weekend." [Editor's note: The original version incorrectly titled Vali Nasr's book.]

It is said that Shiite Islam in Pakistan began here, in this dusty corner of Punjab, more than 200 years ago. Shiites, who constitute only 20 percent of Pakistan's 165 million people, have found themselves beleaguered ever since. As many as 4,000 people are estimated to have died in sectarian fighting in Pakistan in the last two decades, 300 in the last year alone. One of the largest attacks took place here in Multan, when a car bomb killed 40 members of an extremist Sunni organization in 2004. A Shiite militant was later tried and sentenced to death for the attack.

Multan's discord closely mirrors the age-old schisms in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, and elsewhere which, taken together, constitute a Shiite-belt stretching from the Gulf to Pakistan.

"Will the newly empowered Shiite majority in Iraq use its power to tame its sectarian radicals like Moqtada al-Sadr and make an accommodation with the Sunni minority, or will it pursue a politics of resentment and revenge and try to impose sectarian dominance? The outcome will profoundly affect the actions of other governments and of oppressed Shiites in Pakistan and elsewhere," writes John Brenkman, an international affairs analyst at the City University of New York, in an e-mail.

Many disagree, however, saying that what happens in Iraq will hardly convulse the community in Pakistan, more concerned as it is with its own troubles.

"When you ask Pakistanis about Iraq, they identify with Iraqis – not with Shiites or Sunnis," says Samina Ahmed, the South Asia Project Director of the International Crisis Group (ICG), a Brussels-based think tank.

That is certainly the feeling of Shiites in Multan, who make up 40 percent of the city's roughly 4 million people. Sitting around plates of food together, Sunnis and Shiites insist there is no conflict among them, and that foreign powers both here and in Iraq are trying to sow discord.

Even without Iraq, though, some fear Pakistan is particularly vulnerable because of the Taliban resurgence in its backyard. "We tend only to think of [the Taliban] in terms of Afghan politics. We don't think of it as being a resurgence of a Salafi extremist force in Afghanistan. The ideological implications fall on the Shiites," says Mr. Nasr.

For some, Al Qaeda's war against Shiites has already ignited tensions in Pakistan. Editorials in leading newspapers – particularly after this week's suicide bombings – speak of a "new anti-Shiite wave that is radiating from Iraq ..." and President Pervez Musharraf has warned of the need to diffuse sectarianism "not just for the country's security, but for the entire Muslim world."

Such fears may be well grounded, even though the number of sectarian killings is down when compared with the past. In January, police investigators in Karachi announced that Al Qaeda worked with local sectarian groups to carry out some of the largest suicide attacks against sectarian targets last year, which left more than 60 dead, according to local news reports. And this past week's suicide attacks bore the signature of Al Qaeda in Iraq and Afghanistan, observers say.

Whether or not it spells a war emanating from Iraq, the West should pay heed, say analysts.

DOJ_NMG_0126078

"People tend to dismiss the sectarian groups ... because they're not targeting you. But they always could," says Christine Fair, a South Asia counterterrorism expert at the US Institute of Peace, a Congressionally funded think tank in Washington, D.C.

Ms. Fair and others point out that extremist groups cross-pollinate: Those who attack Shiites today are the ones who attack Western targets tomorrow.

In January, Karachi investigators determined just that: A suicide attack last March, which killed an American diplomat, was carried out by Lashkar-i-Jhangvi, a sectarian group working with Al Qaeda.

"They have multiple goals. It's an external jihad. It's an internal jihad," says Ahmed of ICG, adding that Pakistan and the West have to address both sides of the coin.

But, say residents in Multan, Sunnis and Shiites enjoy strong family-to-family bonds for the most part, and interfaith boards and education have helped blunt sectarianism's impact.

If there is a growing global conflict, Malik Naseem Labar, a local Sunni politician, could not see it through the throngs during Ashura this week.

"We respect [Ashura]. All these young boys – they are all Sunnis," says Mr. Labar, gesturing toward swaths of young men mingling freely with Shiites. "I am Sunni, but I am here."

U.S. Hopes For Progress On N. Korea Deal (AP)

AP, February 2, 2007

The top U.S. negotiator on North Korea's nuclear program said Thursday he hopes six nations meeting in China next week will be able to take the first concrete steps toward eventual dismantling of the communist nation's nuclear weapons.

The comments by Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill could mean that North Korea might begin the process of denuclearization while receiving economic benefits from other countries participating in the talks.

This would be a significant breakthrough for a bargaining process that has achieved little since it began in August 2003.

Meeting with reporters on the eve of his departure for South Korea, Hill declined to say what specific actions he expects when the six nations convene for their sixth round of talks in 3 1/2 years. Participants are the United States, the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia.

"We will not achieve full denuclearization but we hope get a substantial start," Hill said.

A December meeting of the six made little headway but the State Department has been hinting for days that the next round should be different.

A Colossal Leap Of Faith In Fight Against Famine (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

EBERSWALDE, Germany -- Few people raise bigger bunny rabbits than Karl Szmolinsky, who has been producing long-eared whoppers since 1964. His favorite breed, German gray giants, are the size of a full-grown beagle and so fat they can barely hop.

Last year, after the retired chauffeur entered some of his monsters in an agricultural fair, word of his breeding skills spread to the North Korean Embassy in Berlin. Diplomats looked past the cute, furry faces with the twitching noses and saw a possible solution to their nation's endemic food shortage: an enormous bunny in every Korean pot.

The North Koreans approached Szmolinsky in November and asked whether he'd advise them on how to start a rabbit breeding program to help "feed the population," the 67-year-old pensioner recalled in an interview at his home in Eberswalde, an eastern German town a few miles from the Polish border. Sympathetic to the Koreans' plight, he agreed to sell some of his best stock at a steep discount and volunteered to travel to the hermetic nation as a consultant.

"They liked what they saw, and they liked how big they were," he said, as he showed off other bunnies that he raises in weathered hutches in his back yard. "It's harder than you think to raise them. They need a varied diet, but they have to be fed like pigs, basically, to get that big."

In December, Szmolinsky stuffed six of his rabbits into modified dog carriers and took them to the airport in Berlin, where they boarded a flight for Pyongyang, via Frankfurt, Germany, and Beijing. Robert, a 23-pounder, was the largest of the bunch, which included four female rabbits and one other male carefully selected for their breeding potential.

How, exactly, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea intends to parlay the small herd of German Flopsies into hunger relief for its 23 million citizens is unclear.

An official at the North Korean Embassy in Berlin, who would not give his name, confirmed that the Asian nation coveted the German bunnies for their gigantism. But he refused to answer any other questions about the breeding program.

DOJ_NMG_0126079

In the hands of a skilled butcher, a German gray giant can yield up to 15 pounds of meat, according to Szmolinsky. "There's not much fat, and it's very tender." Their gray-and-white pelts are soft and supple but are generally worthless on the European market, he said.

The breeder said he was notified by an attache at the North Korean Embassy that Robert and the other rabbits from Eberswalde had arrived safely at their destination. But he allowed that he was a little concerned their new masters might not know how to care for them properly. He said he hopes to travel to North Korea in April to inspect their living conditions.

"If they aren't able to feed them the way I do here, I won't send them any more," he said. "I don't want them to be half-starved."

The Koreans' choice of rabbits has other German breeders scratching their heads.

Karl-Heinz Heitz, chairman of the State Association of Rabbit Breeders in Berlin-Brandenburg, said that German gray giants are hard to beat for size but that they aren't cheap to fatten up. It takes wheelbarrow-loads of hay, vegetables and rabbit chow to bring them to maturity.

"Let me say this: There are certainly breeds that are more economically profitable; I do not know why the North Koreans wanted this one," said Heitz, who introduced the Korean officials to Szmolinsky.

Breeds such as New Zealand red or big light silver or Vienna blue are only half as big but are more cost-effective to raise. "You do not have to put in as much to get out a fair amount of meat," Heitz said.

For whatever reason, the German gray giants appear to hold a special allure in Asia.

A North Korean television crew visited Eberswalde last year to film Szmolinsky's rabbits for a children's program. And a couple of Chinese visitors showed up unannounced at his doorstep the other day, asking if they could buy some of his critters.

"I had to get rid of them," he said of the Chinese. He's not parting with any of his 14 remaining adult rabbits until he can breed some more.

Special correspondent Shannon Smiley contributed to this report.

N Korea Leader Finds Life's Luxuries In Gibraltar (FT)

By George Parker And Mark Mulligan

Financial Times, February 2, 2007

Kim Jong-il, North Korea's idiosyncratic leader, may be dispensing Hennessy cognac and Cartier watches to his cronies for a little while longer, thanks to a 300-year-old territorial dispute between the UK and Spain.

The precise status of Gibraltar, a hunk of British-owned rock at the mouth of the Mediterranean, has caused a new row between London and Madrid that is delaying a European Union ban on luxury goods sales to Pyongyang.

The ban was agreed by the United Nations last October as one of a number of sanctions against North Korea, following its testing of a nuclear device.

The aim was to deprive Mr Kim and his supporters of some of the finer things in life, including thoroughbred horses, luxury vehicles, watches, pearls and musical instruments.

The sanctions were adopted by EU foreign ministers in November, but they are still not in force across the bloc.

If Mr Kim is wondering why, he need look no further than the War of the Spanish Succession and the 1713 Treaty of Utrecht that ended it – handing Gibraltar to Britain.

Problems arose when Madrid spotted that the EU regulation needed to implement the sanctions contained a reference to the "competent authorities" responsible for enforcing them: listed in the small print was Gibraltar.

Spain's foreign ministry wants the reference to Gibraltar deleted before the EU regulation can come into force. "We do not recognise Gibraltar's authority in international policy," it said. "The UK is the only competent authority in this respect."

British diplomats say there would be a legal hole in the sanctions if Gibraltar was not included. Both sides are trying to resolve the dispute and insist it is a hiccup in improving relations over the colony.

In September the two countries, along with Gibraltar, signed an agreement on airport access, telecoms and border controls, hailed as the beginning of a new era of co-operation.

While the wrangling continues, European countries can apply the sanctions unilaterally, but Brussels diplomats say the matter must be dealt with at an EU level to ensure they are applied uniformly and enforced.

U.S. Halts China Space Ventures (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0126080

The Bush administration has suspended plans to develop space ventures with China, including joint exploration of the moon, in reaction to Beijing's Jan. 11 test of an anti-satellite weapon that left orbiting debris threatening U.S. and foreign satellites.

National Aeronautics and Space Administration spokesman Jason Sharp said the weapon test undermined an agreement reached between President Bush and Chinese President Hu Jintao during an April summit.

"We believe China's development and testing of such weapons is inconsistent with the constructive relationship that our presidents have outlined, including on civil space cooperation," Mr. Sharp said.

He said there were "some initial discussions looking at where there were mutual interests where we could cooperate with the Chinese," but there are no plans for future discussions. The two presidents had hoped to work on joint moon exploration and space-debris avoidance.

Bush administration officials said the suspension is meant to signal U.S. displeasure with the anti-satellite weapon (ASAT) test, as well as Beijing's failure to provide an explanation for its space arms program.

"Clearly it makes it more difficult to go down the path of cooperation when they're testing ASAT weapons," one official said.

China fired a missile on Jan. 11 that released a nonexplosive warhead that destroyed a Chinese weather satellite 530 miles above the Earth by ramming it at high speed. Thousands of pieces of the destroyed satellite are in orbit and could damage or destroy some of the hundreds of U.S. and foreign satellites, U.S. officials said.

In Beijing yesterday, amid growing criticism over the ASAT test, a Chinese spokesman repeated Beijing's past call for an agreement banning space weapons, a proposal that has been rejected by the Bush administration.

"Since other countries care about this question and are opposed to weaponization of space and an arms race in space, then let us join hands to realize this goal," said Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Jiang Yu when asked about U.S. and Japanese criticism of the test.

Both China and Russia in 2002 proposed adopting a treaty to ban deployment of space weapons during a session of the U.N. Conference on Disarmament in Geneva. Until last year, U.S. space cooperation with China was curbed over China's human rights abuses, including the 1989 Tiananmen massacre, and national security worries in the Pentagon that space technology transfers would boost China's military.

Robert Joseph, undersecretary of state for arms control and the administration's point man for space security policy, said yesterday that the space weapons test was a shock. It shows space is a "contested environment" and that "countries are developing capabilities to put at risk our assets for which we are dependent," he said.

"This is a wake-up call," Mr. Joseph said, noting that the United States needs "to ensure that we take the steps necessary to protect the space assets and the right to unfettered access to space."

Also, the space arms test should be viewed in the context of China's large-scale buildup of both strategic and conventional forces, not just their space weapons, he said.

Mr. Joseph said he is surprised by the muted international response to the test. "I think there has been very little outrage expressed," he said. "Just imagine the international reaction if the U.S. had conducted such a test."

On Capitol Hill, Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher, California Democrat and chairman of the House Armed Services strategic forces subcommittee, said China's action poses a "major problem and something the world community needs to address."

"We're now stuck with hundreds of pieces of this Chinese satellite for a hundred years, and it's having an impact on the entire global commons," she said, noting that there needs to be "common norms and acceptable rules of behavior in space."

Mrs. Tauscher called for engaging the Chinese and others in talks on space weapons, saying that while Beijing's ASAT test was "irresponsible and unacceptable ... sticking our heads in the sand isn't going to make it better; it will only make it worse."

U.S. intelligence officials said China has sought to obtain U.S. military space technology through espionage and other covert means but has been curbed by U.S. security measures.

"They've had trouble getting it through the back door so they decided to come in through the front," a defense official said.

Among the technologies sought by the Chinese are dual-use civilian and military goods used in maneuvering spacecraft, including propulsion and battery know-how, which have applications for anti-satellite guidance systems, the defense official said.

Joint U.S.-China space cooperation was first raised last spring by China's deputy space agency administrator, Luo Ge, shortly before the summit. He said China wanted to take part in the International Space Station, including making modifications on the orbiting station that would allow Chinese spacecraft to dock.

China launched its first manned spacecraft last year and has embarked on a major space program, that, unlike the NASA's program, is run entirely by the Chinese military.

U.N. Hopes China Pushes For Darfur End (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0126081

By Alfred De Montesquiou
AP, February 2, 2007

The United Nations hopes the Chinese president will push for a solution to the Darfur crisis during his landmark visit to Sudan on Friday. But Khartoum expects its staunchest diplomatic ally to stick to boosting commercial ties, particularly those assuring its access to Sudan's oil.

The road to Khartoum's airport was lined with the red banners of communist China and the flag of Sudan's Muslim fundamentalist regime on Thursday ahead of Hu Jintao's two-day visit, the first by a Chinese president to Sudan.

China, which is the biggest foreign investor in Sudan and buys two-thirds of the country's oil exports, has used its veto-wielding status at the U.N. Security Council to prevent harsh measures against Sudan over the Darfur conflict.

But Beijing has raised expectations that Hu may pressure Khartoum to show flexibility in ending Darfur's bloodshed.

In an unusual foray into the field of human rights, Chinese officials have called on Sudan to cooperate with the United Nations in finding a solution in Darfur. China usually avoids such public pronouncements under its proclaimed policy of refusing to interfere in what it considers other countries' internal affairs.

More than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million chased from their homes in Sudan's remote western region since 2003, when ethnic African rebels rose up against the central government. On Thursday, an African Union peacekeeper was killed by unidentified gunmen in a Darfur refugee camp, the 11th peacekeeper to be slain in the conflict.

Sudan has resisted demands that it allow U.N. peacekeepers into the region, calling the deployment "neocolonial."

Khartoum has sought to keep the focus of Hu's visit on the two nations' booming economic ties. "This visit is going to be a great boost for the distinguished Sudanese-Chinese relations in various fields," Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir said, according to the official SUNA news agency.

Al-Bashir "commended the various Chinese investments in the Sudan, particularly in the domains of oil, agriculture and dams," said SUNA after the president met Thursday with the Chinese National Petroleum Corp.'s head of operations in Sudan.

The Sudanese economy grew by 12 percent last year according to the International Monetary Fund. Chinese investment has helped boost production of the country's prime resource — oil — which has risen to an output of 500,000 barrels a day.

China is also funding large projects such as the $1.8 billion Merowe hydroelectric complex. Hundreds of Chinese engineers and workers are believed to be living in Sudan, though no one at China's embassy was available to confirm figures.

"We like it here, it's promising for business," said Daisy Wan Chu, an employee at Mr. Wang, one of the flourishing Chinese restaurants that offer a rare alternative to Sudanese cuisine in Khartoum.

Hu's visit came amid signs that the Sudanese leadership was grudgingly moving toward acceptance of a compromise deal for U.N. troops to merge with the African Union force and form a joint peacekeeping mission.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon urged China to help persuade Sudan to accept U.N. peacekeepers during a meeting with Chinese U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya last week.

"We certainly hope Hu will deploy his substantial influence in order for Khartoum to have a more constructive approach to international efforts," said Lawrence Rossin of the Save Darfur Coalition, a grouping of humanitarian and rights organizations.

Khartoum is accused of responding to the insurgency with indiscriminate killings, and by unleashing the janjaweed militias of Arab nomads. The janjaweed are blamed for the worst atrocities in the conflict, which the White House and others have labeled genocide.

The government denies these charges, and denounces as neocolonial the U.N. Security Council plan to replace an overwhelmed African Union force in the region with some 22,000 U.N. peacekeepers.

In a phone interview, Rossin pointed to Chinese officials' recent comments on Darfur and to the fact that news about the crisis are now regularly allowed to appear in China's government-controlled media as signs that Beijing may be willing to press Sudan on the issue.

Diplomatic circles also sense that China's patience "is growing thin" with Khartoum on the Darfur issue, said Sudan expert Colin Thomas-Jensen of the International Crisis Group, a New York-based think tank.

He said China gave the impression it wants to become "part of the solution" to the crisis.

"But if Sudan follows its usual pattern of saying 'yes' to the international community and then doing 'no,' we don't know how China will react," he said.

Pressure On China As President Heads To Sudan (AFP)

By Mohammed Ali Saeed
AFP, February 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0126082

International pressure was on China to try its hand at peace diplomacy as Chinese President Hu Jintao headed to war-racked Sudan, the highlight of an eight-nation tour of Africa.

China's energy-hungry economy -- the fourth largest in the world -- is badly in need of Sudan and other African countries' resources and Beijing is for the first time showing willingness to use its influence to solve the Darfur crisis.

During his two-day visit to Khartoum, Hu was expected to hold talks with President Omar al-Beshir on the situation in the western region of Darfur, where a conflict between the government and rebels has been raging unabated.

"I believe this visit will not only boost bilateral ties, but also peace and stability in this region," Assistant Foreign Minister Zhai Jun told journalists before Hu set off on his tour.

No other country has more clout on the Khartoum government than China, which absorbs 60 percent of Sudan's total oil output and has repeatedly used its UN Security Council veto power to block further sanctions on the regime.

Led by Washington, the international community has been pressing Khartoum to accept the deployment of UN peacekeepers in Darfur, where African Union troops have failed to quell the bloodshed.

But Beshir has consistently rejected such a move, accusing the United Nations and western powers of seeking to invade his country and plunder its resources.

"If the Chinese put some pressure on Khartoum, it might have some potential," said the Save Darfur coalition's Larry Rossin, who recently travelled to Khartoum with US envoy Bill Richardson.

"I hope they can use their influence... to press President Omar al-Beshir to implement in good faith the hybrid peacekeeping agreement," Rossin told AFP.

Khartoum has yet to approve the final phase of a three-stage plan for UN forces to supplement the African contingent.

"It is encouraging that the Chinese government has been trying to have a very cooperative partnership and relationship with all African countries," UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said, according to the Chinese agency Xinhua.

At least 200,000 people have been killed and more than two million displaced in Darfur since fighting broke out four years ago.

China has had deep economic ties with Sudan since the 1990s, when other foreign companies pulled out because of the raging north-south civil war.

The China National Petroleum Corporation has huge stakes in Sudan's oil industry, producing around 500,000 barrels per day. China is also building a dam on the Nile, which is currently Africa's largest hydro-electric project.

Trade deals are expected to be signed during Hu's visit, further boosting bilateral trade that reached 2.9 billion dollars in the first 11 months of 2006.

Hu received a warm welcome Thursday in Liberia, the second leg of his tour of the continent.

He began his tour Tuesday in Cameroon, where he approved grants and loans worth more than 54 million dollars, signing a draft agreement on scrapping Cameroon's debt to China and a series of health and educational accords.

Emphasising its commitment to Africa, China said this week it would write off debts owed by 33 African countries as part of a multi-billion-dollar pledge made last year.

Hu's Trip To Sudan Tests China-Africa Ties (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, February 2, 2007

KHARTOUM, SUDAN

Chinese President Hu Jintao's arrival in Sudan Friday could well mark a turning point in China's growing relationship with Africa.

If Mr. Hu announces more investment and development projects, as promised at Beijing's summit of 43 African heads of state this past November, then China will cement its position as the continent's new business partner of choice. If he buckles to pressure from Western governments, and makes future aid dependent on Sudan's actions to halt the brutal civil war in Darfur, then African leaders will see that even China's aid comes with strings attached.

Whatever happens, Hu's visit to Sudan will be historic.

"It is a true partnership, and the Chinese are probably not getting the biggest share of it," says Abdul Rahim Ali Mohammad Ibrahim, a pro-Sudanese government analyst and director of the Institute of Arabic Language Study in Khartoum. "The Chinese are using it as a showpiece. It would be easy for China to tell other African countries, 'Come see what we've done in Sudan.' "

With the global race for African resources well under way, Mr. Hu's eight-nation Africa tour caps a portentous week, coming on the heels of the African Union summit in Ethiopia, and new UN Secretary-General Ban Ki Moon's five-day Africa visit.

DOJ_NMG_0126083

Chinese investment has become the new driving force for economic development in Africa – with African-Chinese trade reaching $40 billion and Chinese aid expected to reach $10 billion in 2009 – and many African countries see China as their ticket to prosperity. Chinese aid is especially attractive, because it comes without all the troublesome conditions that Western donors tend to place on clean governance and human rights.

Nowhere is this more true than in Sudan. As a recipient of Chinese aid since 1959, and a close trading partner since Chinese investment jumpstarted Sudan's dormant oil industry in the late 1990s, Sudan has always felt that its friendship with China extended beyond economics.

Pressure over Darfur

Now with the UN pushing Sudan to halt the humanitarian crisis in its Darfur region – a three-year civil conflict that has claimed the lives of more than 200,000 civilians and displaced 2.5 million more – and to accept UN peacekeepers, Sudan looks to China for high-level diplomatic support.

It's an expectation that Sudanese observers say may be increasingly hard to match.

"I don't think Sudan will benefit from the visit of the Chinese president," says Khalid Tijani El-Nour, a political commentator and editor in chief of the Sudanese business weekly Elaff. "China has huge economic relations with the United States ... so China is not supporting Sudan 100 percent. China has never promised to use its veto [to block UN action against Sudan over Darfur]. They have advised the Sudan government to be flexible, to find a political solution for Darfur."

The best China can do is "bridge the gap and minimize pressure on Sudan," adds Mr. Tijani. "China is a very important power, so this trip gives us some relief, but on the other hand, Sudan is facing a challenge in its relations with China. There are other African countries asking China to come in. Nigeria and Angola are also producing oil. We have to wake up. We are not the only players on the ground."

Lure of oil trumps stability concerns

Despite Sudan's political turmoil, and history of decades of civil war, the lure of oil and other natural resources, and access to the third largest country in Africa, has proved irresistible for China. In addition to Chinese investment in Sudan's oil industry, which supplied China with 7 percent of its energy needs last year, China has also invested $2 billion in the Merowe hydropower dam project. When it opens in 2008, the Merowe will meet Sudan's entire demand for electricity, and allow it to sell the excess to other African neighbors.

Sudan's oil fields, mainly in the southern region, today produce an estimated 500,000 barrels a day, up from 300,000 barrels last year. But that same southern oil belt is a land where a 50-year civil war between the Arab-dominated Sudanese government and Christian and animist black African minorities ended two years ago with a peace agreement.

Almost immediately after the North-South war ended, the conflict in the western region of Darfur began.

"China was more interested in doing business with the government of Sudan, to the detriment of the people of Darfur," writes Ali Trayo the spokesman for the Darfur rebel group, the Sudanese Liberation Army, in an e-mail. "It is in the general interest of the people of Sudan, and Darfur in particular, and that of China itself to exert pressure on the government of Sudan."

While Darfur rebel groups welcome the world's attention, one senior opposition leader says that the West's preoccupation with Darfur could be counterproductive, and even dangerous.

"I consider the West naive," says the opposition leader, speaking on the condition of anonymity from his home in Khartoum. "Instead of being involved in the oil business, and putting pressure on the dictator of the day, they have abandoned us. And believe me, when you abandon us to the hands of the Chinese, you are leaving Sudan quite naked."

The more the West pushes Sudan into a corner over Darfur, the more the Sudanese people will learn to hate the West, says Professor Ibrahim. "In my opinion, neither the US nor the Europeans can compete with China on its trade and development policies, so they want to push China out."

But that's not likely to happen any time soon. China's famous reluctance to intrude on other countries' sovereignty and its long-term investment approach allows it to overlook disagreements with the current government, says Ibrahim.

"China is very farsighted. Nothing is lost because of their cooperation with one regime. If that regime is overthrown, they work with the next government, too. They may offer advice, but they continue to invest, and this sustainability is the result."

In Africa, China's Expansion Begins To Stir Resentment (WSJ)

By Yaroslav Trofimov

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

CHAMBISHI, Zambia -- Chinese President Hu Jintao embarked on an upbeat tour of Africa this week, doling out aid and lauding China's growing economic and political ties with the continent.

DOJ_NMG_0126084

But there is little love for China in this ramshackle township, which had to be dropped from the agenda of President Hu's weekend visit to Zambia because of likely unrest.

Set amid rolling hills in Zambia's copper belt, Chambishi was supposed to be a showcase of Sino-African friendship. China's state metals conglomerate, China Non-Ferrous Metal Mining (Group) Co., bought the mothballed copper mine here in 1998, bringing plenty of jobs and investments. Initial gratitude, however, quickly turned into seething discontent, as the new Chinese owners banned union activity and cut corners on safety. In 2005, dozens of locals were killed in a blast at the Chinese explosives facility serving the mine -- the worst industrial disaster in Zambia's history. Then, the following year, protesting Zambian employees were sprayed with gunfire. "The Chinese, they don't even consider us to be human beings," complains Albert Mwanaumo, a former Chambishi miner who says he was shot by a Chinese supervisor. "They think they have the right to rule us."

Similar feelings of resentment about China's unfolding scramble for influence in Africa are beginning to bubble up across the continent. African leaders still hail China's burgeoning involvement as a solution to Africa's woes and a welcome alternative to the West. But among ordinary Africans, appreciation of this unprecedented influx of Chinese investments, products and settlers isn't nearly as uniform. Recognizing this opinion shift, South African President Thabo Mbeki has repeatedly cautioned in recent weeks that China risks replicating in Africa a "colonial relationship" of the kind that existed under white rule.

These concerns testify to China's maturing as a global economic and political superpower, a force that's beginning to challenge world-wide influence of the U.S. and Europe. That's especially true here in Africa, a continent dismissed by many Westerners as a hopeless case, and treated by Beijing as a high-priority area of national interest.

Nowhere has this grass-roots backlash been stronger than in Zambia. In elections last fall, opposition leader Michael Sata ran for president on a platform of outright China-bashing, unleashing against Beijing the same kind of fury that populist radicals in Latin America or the Middle East direct at the U.S. "Zambia is becoming a province -- no, a district -- of China," he thundered. "We've removed one foreign power and we don't want another foreign power here, especially one that is not a democracy."

Widespread Support

Though Mr. Sata failed to dislodge the China-backed incumbent, his Patriotic Front movement secured widespread support: It now controls Zambia's capital city Lusaka and most municipal governments in the nation's copper-rich mining areas. Following the Zambian campaign, similar political sentiments came to the open in neighboring countries, such as Namibia, Zimbabwe, Angola and Lesotho.

"Among ordinary people, a very strong resentment, bordering on racism, is emerging against the Chinese," says Henning Melber, a former activist in Namibia's struggle for majority rule who now heads the Dag Hammarskjöld Foundation think tank in Sweden. "It's because the Chinese are seen as backing the [African] governments in oppressing their own people."

China's hunger for raw materials is the main reason why it's become so involved in African affairs. Sino-African trade in 2006 more than quadrupled to more than $55 billion since 2002, and is expected to hit $100 billion by 2010. Angola has overtaken Saudi Arabia as China's main source of oil, with large-scale supplies also flowing from Sudan and Nigeria. Chinese companies have sought Guinea's bauxite, Namibia's uranium, and the assortment of rare metals that are found in the Congo, formerly known as Zaire.

In Zambia, a landlocked country of 11.5 million, the main draw for China is copper -- and the recent outcry is rooted in the tragic events that followed China's investment at the mine in Chambishi. China Non-Ferrous Metal Mining purchased the mine, which had been shuttered since 1987, for $20 million. It stepped forward after a Canadian company that had initially won the tender pulled out of the deal. Investing more than $100 million in the property, the Chinese conglomerate's Zambian unit, called NFC Africa Mining PLC, restarted production in late 2001, ramping up output to reach 50,000 metric tons of copper concentrate last year.

Dozens of Chinese managers and supervisors settled in the township, a maze of trash-strewn dirt alleys set across the paved road from the mine. Inside the mine itself, a red Chinese flag was hoisted above a wall covered with inspirational words of Wu Bangguo, chairman of the standing committee of the National People's Congress: "To Rouse Yourself in Vigorous Efforts to Make the Company Prosperous!"

As part of its prosperity plan, the mine's management paid Zambian employees less than the minimum wage, currently $67 a month, and strictly prohibited union activity, according to employees and union officials. A 2004 memo to staff, which still hangs inside NFC Africa offices, warned of "severe punishment" for anyone attending meetings of the "so-called action group [of union organizers], which is illegal." People suspected of union involvement were fired on the spot, says Gillian Mubanga, the current union leader at the mine.

To drive up production and save on costs, NFC also established on the Chambishi property a joint venture with the Beijing General Research Institute of Mining and Metallurgy. Dubbed BGRIMM Explosives Ltd., it set out to manufacture cheap explosives for the region's mining industry. "BGRIMM -- Turning Your Rocks Into Gold," boasted advertisement billboards that still dot the roadsides across Zambia's Copper Belt region.

DOJ_NMG_0126085

Then, one sunny morning in April 2005, Chambishi was rocked by a huge blast. Earth shook and windowpanes broke in nearby houses. A runaway chemical reaction turned the BGRIMM facility into a giant fireball, pulverizing the entire structure. A total of 46 Zambian employees of BGRIMM were killed, their charred body parts strewn around the smoldering crater. Eyewitnesses say the Chinese staff had hurriedly driven away from the site shortly before this explosion occurred. Local residents theorize that the Chinese realized something was about to happen and didn't bother warning African employees before fleeing themselves.

Anger Intensifies

Unable to identify individual remains, the victims' families have had to bury plastic bags packed with flesh randomly collected at the site. Anger against the Chinese was intensified by widespread belief that safety rules had been flouted in pursuit of profit at the plant. "The Chinese didn't care about our children -- they just sacrificed them," said Iris Chibuye, a grieving mother whose 24-year-old son Sledge and 27-year-old daughter Vennie, a computer technician educated in Britain, both died in the BGRIMM disaster.

Though the Chinese government sent condolences to victims' families, and eventually paid compensation of about $10,000 per killed employee, the anger didn't abate. As the Zambian government began an inquiry into the accident, the absence of union oversight was cited as the key cause of safety failures at BGRIMM. Public pressure made it impossible for the mine's management to continue prohibiting union activity any longer.

In November 2005, NFC Africa deputy CEO Wang Xiaowei shook hands with Zambia's National Union of Miners and Allied Workers leader Albert Mando, and signed a collective agreement that finally installed new safety measures and promised a salary increase. Assuring that the company treats its Zambian workers as "family members," Mr. Wang also urged the union "to understand that the high operational costs may often compromise the working conditions of employees," according to NFC Africa's in-house newsletter.

After drawn-out negotiations with the unions, NFC Africa set July 25, 2006, as the date for giving its workers back pay, in accordance with the new agreements. Miners had been expecting payments of as much as $500 each -- but were told on payday that they would receive only a few dollars, and in some cases even owe money to the company. On the evening of July 24, night-shift miners, stunned to hear that they wouldn't be getting the expected cash, stopped work, vandalized equipment and beat up a Chinese supervisor. The following day, furious morning-shift employees blocked the main road in Chambishi with tree trunks and stones, marching toward the mine.

As a scuffle broke out at the gate, mine security fired at one of the protesters, wounding him. According to witnesses, as false rumors that he had been killed spread across Chambishi, another group of about 40 NFC Africa miners from a later shift rushed toward the residential compound of Chinese employees, set on a winding road inside the township.

At the white-and-blue gate into the walled compound, a Chinese supervisor, known to the Zambian miners simply as Mr. Qui, took out a shotgun and opened fire as the crowd approached, according to witness accounts. Hit by the shots, three demonstrators collapsed on the ground, blood gushing out. Mr. Mwanaumo, a 34-year-old jackhammer operator who says he didn't take part in the initial protest, ran to the site after hearing that a close friend had been shot. As Mr. Mwanaumo pulled his injured comrade away, a new volley of fire burrowed into his back. According to his medical report, two lead fragments are still lodged in his body, too close to the vital organs to be safely extracted in the local hospital.

A day after these shootings, Mr. Qui hastily left Chambishi. Mr. Mwanaumo, like the other wounded workers, was fired. Feeling too sick to work, he spends his days in a tiny, dark hut set amid sewage-soaked mud, hoping that relatives and friends will collect enough money to file a compensation lawsuit.

Investigation Continues

The Zambian government investigation into the incident is still continuing, as is the inquiry into the 2005 BGRIMM disaster. Xu Riyong, NFC Africa's company secretary and manager of administration, declined to discuss the details of these events, or elaborate on Mr. Qui's status, saying that the company has already made a comprehensive report to the Zambian government on the matter.

"By complying with the laws of Zambia, we are confident that no problems will come to us," said Mr. Xu, the only NFC Africa official who agreed to be interviewed for this story. "We will do our best to run this mine successfully. We have to keep quiet and to keep working. Why should we fear?"

The Zambian government has so far apportioned no blame for the Chambishi tragedy. In an interview, Zambia's minister of mines, Kalombo Mwansa, declined to forecast when the investigations into the explosion and the shootings at the mine might be concluded, when the report will be released, and whether any penalties might be levied against the Chinese company. In the meantime, he said, NFC Africa's BGRIMM affiliate has been allowed to rebuild and reopen an explosives factory at the site of the 2005 tragedy. NFC Africa has also announced that it will invest $220 million into a crude-copper smelting plant in Chambishi. President Hu was scheduled to visit Chambishi this weekend to lay the cornerstone for the smelter -- but, according to Zambian officials, this part of his schedule was called off because of planned protests by miners and families of BGRIMM explosion victims.

DOJ_NMG_0126086

The risks in Chambishi are real. Sitting next to Mr. Mwanaumo, the worker who was shot in July, a friend currently employed by NFC Africa warned of even bloodier unrest to come at the mine. "There will be a strike soon if they don't improve our salary, and a lot of people will die," he said. "This time the police won't be able to contain us." The management seems to be getting the message. On a recent afternoon, workers were busy at the Chinese staff's Chambishi residential compound. Perched on the perimeter wall, they reinforced fortifications, installing a new row of high-voltage fencing atop an existing layer of spiky glass shards.

China Gets Cold Feet For Foreign Investment (WP)

By Ariana Eunjung Cha

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

SHANGHAI -- "I know you don't know that you don't know."

Those insulting words, thrown out by a Chinese man to a Westerner, are the punchline of an Internet commercial that ends with a beautiful Chinese bride jilting her confused Western fiance for the Chinese hero.

The wildly popular video was created by Baidu, a Chinese search engine, to poke fun at its U.S. competitor, Google. It is but one of the growing signs that China is rethinking its stance on foreign companies and investment within its borders.

Since the mid-1990s, China has aggressively courted foreign investment, crediting capital from abroad with helping it become a world economic power. In recent months, however, the Chinese government, saying it needs to protect homegrown companies from unfair competition, has thrown a multitude of new regulations at foreign firms seeking to do business in China.

While some believe the new restrictions -- which affect several sectors, including real estate, retailing, shipbuilding, banking and insurance -- may be only temporary measures to control growth, others worry that there's a larger political issue: that economic nationalism or even protectionism is rising.

"A mood of self-questioning has swept over China," said Barry Naughton, an economist at the University of California at San Diego. In a report published in the China Leadership Monitor, Naughton said he believes the regulations are a response to government fears of a "loss of economic sovereignty."

China's shifting policies on foreign companies have prompted several U.S. firms, which complain that the new rules are too restrictive and overly complex, to reassess their plans in China.

Last month, eBay said it would close its Web site in China, saying it was facing difficulties because Chinese regulations limit the types of financial transactions foreign companies can conduct. In November, Warner Bros. International Cinemas, part of Time Warner, which had been planning a massive expansion in China, abruptly announced plans to close operations in the country. It cited a recent policy change that no longer allowed foreign companies to control domestic theaters except in a handful of large cities.

The Chinese government steadfastly maintains that it still embraces the policy known as gaige kaifang-- literally, reform and opening up -- initiated by Deng Xiaoping in 1979. However, several Chinese officials have in recent months called foreign investment "malicious" and promised "severe measures to curb and punish hostile takeovers aiming to monopolize the Chinese market."

China remains the largest recipient of foreign direct investment among developing economies. But after a decade when heavy capital flows from abroad were credited with bringing the country out of poverty, that investment is leveling off.

According to the Commerce Ministry, foreign investment in 2006 decreased 4 percent from the year before, to $69.5 billion. The United States' piece of that dropped 6.4 percent, to $2.87 billion. (China receives additional investment from American companies that, for tax purposes, have their headquarters in places like the Virgin Islands.)

The significance of the new regulations has been debated at the highest levels -- U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez said it was a key subject of the Cabinet-level talks with Beijing in November -- and on Internet bulletin boards where the Baidu-Google video has been distributed under the headline "economic nationalism."

Negative publicity on blogs and chat rooms linked to by popular Chinese portals Sina.com and Sohu.com is credited with fueling criticism of several high-profile deals.

For instance, the District's Carlyle Group tried in 2005 to buy an 85 percent stake in Xugong Construction Machinery, a market leader. Xiang Wenbo, chief executive of a state-owned rival company, wrote on his personal blog that the government shouldn't permit the sale of valuable strategic assets like Xugong. After he and other opponents waged a months-long online campaign against the deal, Carlyle scaled back its offer, taking a 50 percent stake.

DOJ_NMG_0126087

Albert Keidel, a former U.S. Treasury official now at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, said there seemed to be a sense among ordinary Chinese citizens of "how much are we going to allow foreign companies to continue to take advantage of us?"

Egged on by a public concerned about the growing influence of foreign companies, the Chinese government in July placed restrictions on the purchase of real estate by foreign individuals and institutions. The next month, it put a moratorium on foreign acquisitions of brokerages and limited the competitiveness of foreign-funded retail companies.

In November, the government issued new guidelines for cross-border mergers and acquisitions, making it more difficult for foreign companies to be involved in deals with companies related to "national economic security" or those that have a "famous trademark" or "traditional brand."

In a report issued last month, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development complained that the new regulations were so vague that they "may have a serious unintended discouraging effect on investments."

Some economists, however, say fears about Chinese nationalism and protectionism are overblown. Zhao Xijun, a professor of economics at Renmin University, said that rather than being seen as a hostile move against foreigners, the restrictions should be seen as "progress to a mature market."

Kenneth Louie, a visiting professor of economics at the Johns Hopkins-Nanjing University Center for Chinese and American Studies, points out that the United States limits technology transfers to China and restricts foreign purchases in defense industries.

"There are certain sectors China believes are vital to economic security, and there is a fear of a high level of foreign intrusion. The United States also has similar fears," he said.

Keidel said China has in a short period moved from a closed economy where foreign capital was not allowed to one that welcomes it, particularly in such areas as financial services, one of the key conditions China agreed to when it acceded to the World Trade Organization.

The conditions China ratified were quite specific and provided an industry-by-industry timetable. The new foreign-investment regulations do not seem to violate the letter of these conditions, Keidel said, though some parties have complained that they go against the spirit of the WTO agreement.

Richard Ji of Morgan Stanley Hong Kong said some companies have used China's new rules as an excuse for their own marketing or strategic shortcomings. He said that in the cases of Google and eBay, the companies' challenges have had more to do with failure to tailor the content of their Web sites to Chinese tastes and needs.

In the Baidu commercial about Google, the Western man begins by saying "I know" repeatedly as he stands, smirking confidently, next to his bride-to-be. But after the Chinese man bursts on the scene and the two get into a war of words, the Westerner becomes confused. By mistake, he says, "I know I don't know that I don't know" -- at which point the disgusted bride runs away.

So the commercial is "not about nationalism and protectionism," Ji said. "It says that it's localization that gives success. If you localize services, it means you understand the people you are selling to."

Russian TV Shines Warmly On A Likely Successor To Putin (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 1 -- Every Sunday morning, two favorites of President Vladimir Putin play prominent supporting roles on a television game show called "Happy Bus." In sunny clips spliced into the show's airtime, Dmitri Medvedev and Sergei Ivanov hand out awards and urge young people in general to live healthy lives.

Ostensibly, the two men have perfectly straightforward reasons for appearing on the show: Each week, one team of contestants is sponsored by Gazprom, the state-controlled energy giant chaired by Medvedev. The opposing team is sponsored by the New Generation Foundation, headed by Ivanov, who is also defense minister.

But "Happy Bus" is widely viewed here as proof of the Kremlin's ability to commandeer the airwaves -- even the most trifling show -- to aid Putin in anointing a successor. By most accounts, the president has narrowed his choice to Medvedev or Ivanov, and over the last year each man's image, particularly Medvedev's, has been rigorously burnished. "Happy Bus" debuted in May on NTV, a network owned by a Gazprom subsidiary.

DOJ_NMG_0126088

With the centralization of power in the Kremlin, Russian politics has become ever more tightly scripted, and genuine electoral competition has withered. Whoever turns out to be Putin's nominee will dominate television and almost certainly ride unimpeded through the presidential elections in early 2008, analysts said.

"Putin, Medvedev and Ivanov are the three main heroes, the three main characters on the news," said Anna Kachkayeva, a professor of broadcast journalism at Moscow State University. "It's a command from the administration."

Producers at Russian television stations, including the makers of "Happy Bus," declined to discuss coverage of Ivanov and Medvedev.

In presidential politics, Russia has an electoral college of one -- Putin. When Vladimir Ustinov, the former prosecutor general and a perceived favorite of the security services, started making some very president-in-waiting noises last year, Putin fired him. He was rehired as justice minister, a much less influential position.

Putin himself denies he is the decider. "There will be no successors. There will be candidates for the post of president of Russia," he said Thursday at his annual news conference, which this year ran to three hours and 30 minutes and was attended by about 1,200 journalists. "I reserve the right to express my preference. But I will only do it once the election campaign begins."

Since the reelection of Boris Yeltsin in 1996, when a group of media tycoons threw the full weight of their television stations behind his faltering candidacy and demonized his Communist opponent, tight management of broadcast journalism has been a critical instrument in Russian presidential elections, including Putin's two campaigns.

But unlike in 1996, when the power of television was wielded by wealthy businessmen, today those media assets are controlled by the state or companies loyal to the Kremlin.

Ivanov, 54, has long been well known both at home and abroad as minister of defense. Medvedev, 41, was an obscure figure until 15 months ago.

In November 2005, Medvedev and Ivanov were simultaneously made first deputy prime ministers, in addition to their other titles. Since then, Medvedev's public image, down to his haircut (shorter and more stylish), weight (he's clearly lost a few pounds) and choice of clothes (more casual), has been carefully refashioned.

The makeover has become the talk of the town. The wooden, cautious and loyal official of a year ago has become a self-confident and assertive politician tinged with some very Putinesque characteristics -- in particular, his occasionally brusque scoldings, sometimes directed at other ministers, delivered with the colloquial phrases and tightly coiled physicality that many Russians love in their president.

Speaking in November about improving health care and access to drugs, Medvedev said: "There are swindlers who manufacture pharmaceuticals. Then there are other swindlers who sell those pharmaceuticals, and there are still other swindlers who act as intermediaries using state funds. The situation in the pharmaceutical industry is disgusting."

Medvedev, who is married and has one child, is a lawyer by training and first worked with Putin in the city administration of St. Petersburg in the 1990s. Putin brought him to the Kremlin, where he became chief of staff in the presidential administration. He is regarded as a relatively liberal counterweight to the staffers around Putin who served in the security services. Medvedev has no background in the KGB or its successor agencies.

He never publicly criticizes Putin, however. And he defends Gazprom, where the Kremlin placed him in charge in 2002, from charges that it is secretive, bloated and inefficient, and is used by the state as a political weapon to punish neighboring countries. On television recently, he called Gazprom a "crucial Russian company" and noted that its capitalization has jumped from $10 billion to $225 billion under state control.

Increasingly, Medvedev speaks of his modest background. "Just like everyone else, I lived in the kinds of apartments that used to be given to Soviet citizens, first a communal one and later a cramped apartment in St. Petersburg," he said in a television interview in November. "And like everyone else, I went, and still go, to a polyclinic," the state-run outpatient facilities that many Russians avoid.

For all the campaign-style insights he offers into his background, Medvedev remains studiously ambiguous about his ambitions. "I find it distressing that I have been made a participant in some sort of race," he said.

Nonetheless, he is now the second-most-popular politician in Russia after Putin, according to opinion polls and analysts.

In a poll conducted in November by the independent Levada Center, 38 percent of respondents said they would vote for Medvedev for president, making him the leading candidate. Ivanov trailed with 23 percent. Little more than a year ago, Medvedev's rating was barely above zero.

While image-building is not unique to Russia, and Medvedev's new position in government ensured he would get more news coverage, the almost universally friendly treatment he has received on Russian television has been striking.

Among 2,064 news stories on Medvedev in 2006, there was not a single negative report on the news broadcasts of six television channels, including the three major national stations, according to a survey by Medialogia, an analytical group in

DOJ_NMG_0126089

Moscow. There were 17 negative reports on Ivanov, most of them centered on a brutal hazing incident in the military to which he was slow to respond, according to Medialogia.

Other potential candidates are not treated so kindly. In the same period, there was not a single positive report on Mikhail Kasyanov, a former prime minister and Putin critic who has said he may seek the presidency. Of the 40 stories in which Kasyanov was the main subject, 60 percent were negative and the balance neutral, according to Medialogia statistics.

The Kremlin declined a request to allow a Washington Post reporter to accompany Medvedev on a typical daily event; he is normally covered by a small pool of reporters.

Assigned as a frontman for the government's spending priorities -- generous social programs to revamp health care, education and housing and reverse a population decline -- Medvedev has been transformed into Santa Claus in the public mind, according to Vyacheslav Nikonov, a political analyst with close ties to the Kremlin.

"He has good PR, doing good, practical things for the country," Nikonov said. "Every image is deliberately cultivated, but that is not different than what goes on at the White House."

Last week was typical. Three of the national channels, ORT, RTR and NTV, ran expansive reports Wednesday night on a meeting chaired by Medvedev in which he talked about raising the birthrate and other projects. Medvedev held up a certificate that will guarantee cash payments to women who have a second child, and his remarks were spliced with images of cooing babies in maternity wards.

No critic of the management of the so-called National Projects was quoted on any of those news reports.

"The National Projects are an imitation of activity," Ivan Melnikov, deputy chairman of the Communist Party, said in parliament last month. "Upbeat TV pictures that we see practically every day have nothing to do with the real state of things."

"He is being built up, and he is changing himself," said Igor Bunin, head of the Center for Political Technologies in Moscow, referring to Medvedev. "The first task was to get people to recognize him. . . . The next task was to associate him with most pleasant things from the state. He cuts all the ribbons now.

"At the beginning, he was soft, like a teddy bear, but now he seems much stronger. Like Putin, he can summon up some thunder and lightning when he criticizes incompetent officials."

Bunin added, "There may be no final decision, but he is candidate number one, with Ivanov in reserve."

Putin Denies Using Energy As A Weapon (FT)

By Neil Buckley

Financial Times, February 2, 2007

Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, on Thursday hit back at accusations that the country was using energy as a weapon, saying critics were deliberately distorting its policy of moving to market prices for oil and gas supplies to former Soviet neighbours.

In a three-and-a-half hour annual press conference – much of it on live television – Mr Putin insisted Russia had helped safeguard the sovereignty of newly-independent states after the collapse of the Soviet Union. But he said subsidies could not go on for ever.

"We must not subsidise the economies of other countries in large amounts, comparable with their budgets. No one else does that. Why do they demand that we should do it?" he said.

He added that new pricing and tariff arrangements agreed with transit countries such as Belarus and Ukraine were aimed "precisely at ensuring the interests of key consumers" in western Europe, despite temporary disruptions to supplies last month and in January 2006.

He said "experts" understood what Russia was doing, and should be thankful to Moscow.

"But instead, we can see unfair attitudes to interpretation of those events. Naturally, this has been done by those who are not well disposed to Russia. I am not saying that this has been done on a national scale, but there are such forces. Those who write about it, they are the ill-wishers," the Russian president said.

Mr Putin also insisted the transition to his successor, when he stands down as president in 2008, would be democratic and not orchestrated. He stressed several times during the press conference that "the Russian people will make their choice".

He hinted he would indicate which candidate he favoured as a successor – but only after the presidential campaign had begun.

"I reserve the right to express my preferences. But I will do it only once the election campaign starts," Mr Putin said.

Dmitry Medvedev and Sergei Ivanov, both promoted to the rank of first deputy prime minister in late 2005, are seen as vying to be the favoured candidate to succeed Mr Putin. But speculation has been intensifying about how and when the Russian president will mark out his choice.

DOJ_NMG_0126090

Any successor, he added, would face the task of maintaining rapid economic growth, which Mr Putin said was expected to come out at 6.7 to 6.9 per cent last year, and which delivered 13 per cent increases in average wages and retail sales. But other big challenges were to narrow the yawning gap between the richest and poorest Russians, and diversify the economy away from reliance on natural resources.

Asked about the murder of Alexander Litvinenko, the former KGB officer, Mr Putin said only the courts and investigators could determine who was responsible. But he reiterated comments by other senior officials that Mr Litvinenko had been an insignificant figure not considered a threat by the Russian authorities.

"He was not privy to any secrets, he had been convicted in the Russian Federation for abuse of office, specifically, for beating people when arresting them when he was a security man and for stealing explosives," Mr Putin said. "All the negative things he could have said about his previous employer, he had already said a long time ago."

Blair Gives 2nd Interview In Inquiry About Graft (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 1 — After a news blackout lasting six days, the British police acknowledged Thursday that officers interviewed Prime Minister Tony Blair a second time last Friday over allegations that high honors had been traded for campaign contributions.

The interview itself was unusual, as was the decision to cloak it in secrecy. Mr. Blair is said by British political analysts to be the first prime minister to be interviewed by the police while still in office. Only on Wednesday, Mr. Blair's official spokesman was asked at a routine briefing for reporters whether the prime minister had been approached by the police a second time and he replied that "nothing had changed," according to the prime minister's Web site (www.pm.gov.uk).

But the broader impact of the development was to cast an ever darker shadow over the closing days of Mr. Blair's almost 10 years in office — a period that began with his promises that the Labor administration, in contrast to its Conservative predecessor, would be "purer than pure."

Mr. Blair has been questioned by the police as a witness, not as a suspect. The first interview was in December. After that a senior aide, Ruth Turner, was formally arrested and questioned not only in the honors inquiry but also on suspicion of failing to cooperate with or trying to frustrate the investigation.

Then, earlier this week, Lord Levy, the prime minister's chief fund-raiser, Middle East envoy and tennis partner, was arrested for a second time to be questioned in relation to the same offense, known in Britain as perverting the course of justice.

Around 90 people have been questioned in the inquiry, which concerns payments equivalent to $27 million made as loans to the Labor Party before the May 2005 national election. At that time, campaign financing arrangements offered as loans did not require public disclosure. Mr. Blair's critics have charged that the money was made available in return for promises of knighthoods or seats in the unelected and prestigious House of Lords.

The prime minister's office said in a statement on Thursday that Mr. Blair had been "briefly interviewed by the police as a witness. At the request of the police this was kept utterly confidential and, as a result, the press and communications team in Downing Street were not informed. As far as they were concerned nothing had changed."

In a separate statement, the police said that they had requested secrecy for unspecified operational reasons, and that the meeting with the prime minister had been sought "to clarify points emerging from the ongoing investigation." All of the politicians drawn into the inquiry have denied wrongdoing.

Mr. Blair was interviewed shortly before he flew to Davos, Switzerland, to attend the World Economic Forum, where he seemed untroubled by events back home as he rubbed shoulders with the rich, the powerful and the famous. For all that, his adversaries pounced on Thursday's announcement as evidence that the emerging scandal could stain Mr. Blair's final months in office before he redeems a pledge made last fall to relinquish power this year. "It is clear that this inquiry is going to haunt Tony Blair throughout his last months in office and beyond," said Sir Menzies Campbell, leader of the smaller opposition Liberal Democrats.

For Blair, Round 2 Of Police Questions (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 1 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair has been interviewed for a second time by police investigating allegations that his Labor Party offered seats in the House of Lords and other government honors in exchange for cash, police and Blair's office said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0126091

Police interviewed Blair for about 45 minutes last Friday but asked Blair's office "for operational reasons" to keep the meeting secret until Thursday, police and Blair's office said in statements. Police said Blair was "interviewed as a witness, not as a suspect and cooperated fully" in an inquiry in which the prime minister's top fundraiser and a top adviser have been arrested on suspicion of hampering the investigation into the widening scandal.

Known here as the "cash-for-honors" probe, it has further damaged a leader whose approval ratings have been badly hurt by his enthusiastic support of the U.S.-led wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Blair was first questioned by police in December at his 10 Downing Street office, the first time a sitting British prime minister had been questioned by police in a criminal inquiry.

"Blair's position is looking more and more difficult as each day goes by," said Iain McLean, professor of politics at Oxford University.

Blair, who took office in May 1997, announced last year that he will step down before his party's annual conference in September. But as the scandal widens, political opponents are increasingly calling for Blair to resign sooner.

David Cameron, leader of the opposition Conservative Party, directly challenged Blair in Parliament on Wednesday at the weekly Prime Minister's Questions session when he said that Blair's authority to lead was "draining away" and that he should resign immediately "in the national interest."

"When is Mr. Blair going to realize it is all over?" Cameron asked.

Since at least last April, police have been investigating allegations that Blair's government has enticed political donors with promises of appointments to the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament. Blair and other Labor officials have denied those allegations, but four people have been arrested either on suspicion of offering honors for cash or for "perverting the course of justice" -- which has led political opponents to allege a coverup.

No one has been charged with a crime, and police have stressed that the investigation is a "cross-party" probe into campaign finance irregularities.

But only Labor supporters have been arrested. Blair's chief fundraiser, Michael Levy, has been detained twice. A top Downing Street aide, Ruth Turner, has also been arrested, as have Christopher Evans, an entrepreneur and major Labor Party donor, and Des Smith, a Labor government adviser. All were later released and have denied wrongdoing.

Chancellor Gordon Brown, Blair's presumed successor, this week urged people not to rush to judgment about allegations of wrongdoing or coverup. "I believe when people see the full facts, then they will be satisfied," Brown said.

Official Says U.S. Willing To Help Cuba (AP)

By Traci Carl

AP, February 2, 2007

U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said Thursday that Washington is willing to help Cuba make the transition to a more open, democratic society.

Speaking to reporters during a one-day visit to Mexico, Gutierrez said the U.S. supports a "peaceful transition to democracy."

Ailing Cuban leader Fidel Castro has been seen only in government-released videos and photos since ceded power to his brother Raul in late July while he recovers from intestinal surgery.

On Tuesday, Cuban state television released images of a stronger-looking Castro meeting with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, a close ally.

Gutierrez, who was born in Cuba, said the United States does not plan to meddle in Cuban politics but wants to see the country make the transition to democracy.

"The future of Cuba is in Cuba," he said, but added that "if we can be of help, we are ready to help in that transition."

Gutierrez did not elaborate, but last September he suggested that Cubans could work with the Organization of American States and other groups to hold a referendum on whether they want to live in democracy.

Gutierrez also said Thursday that President Bush's administration is working to pass an immigration reform that would allow the United States to protect its borders while recognizing the millions of people who already work illegally in the country.

"Unless we tackle the problem in a comprehensive fashion, it is just going to get worse," he said.

He said the U.S. must find a middle ground between "amnesty" and "animosity" and he spoke out against mass deportations, saying: "That's not humane or moral."

Gutierrez also praised a recent anti-drug crackdown launched by new President Felipe Calderon and said he expects Calderon to take action against Mexican industries that have been accused of monopolistic practices, such as telecommunications and television.

"We believe President Calderon is off to a strong start, and he'll need time to do what he needs to do," Gutierrez said.

Europe Faults U.S. Farm Proposal (WSJ)

By Juliane Von Reppert-bismarck

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

BRUSSELS -- The European Commission expressed disappointment at a U.S. plan to overhaul subsidies to its farmers, saying "more ambitious cuts" are required to relaunch a stalled round of global trade talks.

The White House's proposal to Congress on how to overhaul the U.S. Farm Bill will make "extremely modest" cuts to loan-deficiency payments and keep payments to dairy and sugar farmers "virtually untouched," said EU farm spokesman Michael Mann.

The U.S. initiative, presented to Congress Wednesday, foresees cutting total farm spending to $87 billion over the next five years, down $18 billion from the total spent by the U.S. on basic programs and disaster assistance during the past five years.

Much of this is based on the assumption that farm prices remain at their current high levels, Mr. Mann said. A reversal of price trends will see trade-distorting farm support rise once again, he said.

"The U.S. will need to propose more ambitious cuts and disciplines," Mr. Mann said. "We had hoped the administration's proposal for the new farm bill would signal this more clearly," he said.

Global trade talks at the World Trade Organization ground to a halt in the summer, largely over the unwillingness of wealthy countries to cut protective measures for their farmers. Most trading nations now say it is up to the U.S. to revive the talks with a promise of deep and lasting subsidy cuts.

WTO spokesman Keith Rockwell said officials were still studying the 183-page document, but added, "it is a positive first step."

The plan, announced by U.S. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, still needs approval by Congress. Analysts expect key aspects to come under attack, notably a $360,000 subsidy ceiling for U.S. farmers.

EU officials and diplomats warned an overhaul that makes limited cuts to market-distorting payouts sends a bad signal to negotiators at the WTO. Yet Washington has pointed out that if a palatable deal can be struck at the WTO, commitments made there will override any domestic farm plan.

Farm products account for less than 7% of world trade, and for 4.5% of U.S. exports. Political sensitivities over the sector in rich countries, and dependence on the sector in the developing world, have nonetheless placed it at the heart of a global trade round expected to tear down trade barriers and boost global wealth.

EU farmers slammed the plan, which they said paves the way for farm supports to increase.

"Either the U.S. is simply not serious about wanting a WTO agreement or it wants one at the expense of all farmers in the world except its own," Rudolf Schwarzboeck and Donal Cashman, presidents of Europe's leading farm lobby, said in a joint statement.

The White House plan would increase spending on farm projects that boost conservation and the environment -- a method of cutting direct production subsidies employed by the EU in its own farm-payment cuts. It would also put more emphasis on making payments to farmers that aren't tied to production.

Trade and development advocacy group Oxfam Wednesday praised the Bush administration for attempting to steer U.S. farm policy "in a new direction." The farm plan also foresees allowing farmers to grow fruit and vegetables on land eligible for subsidies.

The plan, which underlines an increasing desire in Washington to cut U.S. dependence on fossil fuels and simultaneously guarantee farmer income, reserves $2.1 billion in loan guarantees for plants that make ethanol fuel from wood chips, grasses and feed stocks other than corn and provides $1.6 billion to research noncorn sources of ethanol.

Solution For Kosovo (WP)

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

TODAY U.N. envoy Martti Ahtisaari is due to travel to the Balkans to kick off what should be the final resolution of Serbia's conflict with the province of Kosovo. It's been eight years since the United States led a NATO military operation to stop an ethnic cleansing campaign by Serbia against Kosovo's Albanian majority; since then the Connecticut-size territory of 2 million has been governed by the United Nations. NATO troops, including Americans, are still there.

All along it's been obvious what the permanent solution must be: the recognition of Kosovo as an independent nation, with protections for its Serb minority. The question has been whether that outcome can be arranged without a diplomatic or even military blowup -- between Kosovo and a Serbia still infected by belligerent nationalism, or between the West and an increasingly troublesome Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0126093

The Bush administration is cautiously optimistic that the transition can be pulled off in the next several months. But it will take some deft Western diplomacy and, in the end, probably some American toughness.

A measure of the deftness has already been supplied by Mr. Ahtisaari, a former Finnish president who has been working on the issue for more than a year. Recognizing that Serbia and its ally Russia would strongly oppose a U.N. resolution explicitly granting Kosovo full independence, the envoy will propose that the Security Council adopt a measure ending the current U.N. regime but not mentioning independence.

The province would continue under international supervision, with the European Union to be given a major role, but would be allowed to join the United Nations and other international organizations. Once the Security Council approved these terms, Kosovo's Albanian-led government could declare independence and would win quick recognition from the United States and most European countries. Serbia could object but not stop the new arrangement.

The pitfalls along this winding course are easily spotted. Serb militants in Kosovo could respond violently to an independence declaration, as could Albanian nationalists disappointed that independence is not complete. Would-be Serb splinter states could appear in northern Kosovo or neighboring Bosnia. Russian President Vladimir Putin could trigger a crisis by vetoing the U.N. resolution. Or he could accept the resolution and cynically use it as a precedent to recognize the independence of Moscow-backed separatist regions in pro-Western Georgia or Moldova.

That's where U.S. firmness might be needed. The Bush administration has avoided responding to multiple Russian provocations in recent months, the most recent being Moscow's sale of antiaircraft missiles to Iran.

If Mr. Putin decides to make trouble over Kosovo, the United States will either have to push back or abandon allies it has supported against aggression: the Kosovo Albanians, or Georgia's liberal democratic government. The administration ought to make clear now that it will not go wobbly.

Ulster's Last Holdout (NYT)

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

Northern Ireland has lost thousands of lives, billions of dollars in economic opportunity and decades of democratic self-rule to what its people euphemistically call "the troubles." One man now has it in his power to help this British-ruled province finally put this lamentable era behind it and move on to a brighter future — or to stand in the way. That man is the Rev. Ian Paisley, the fiery Protestant preacher, now 80 years old, who leads the province's largest party, the Democratic Unionists. Mr. Paisley, though, has yet to rise to the moment and acknowledge that the times have changed and his former foes have changed with them.

To say that Mr. Paisley has not built his long career on compromise would be a breathtaking understatement. But in the past he could point to the maddeningly ambiguous declarations of his foes — the Irish Republican Army and its political arm, Sinn Fein — to justify his unyielding stubbornness. Not any more. Over the past two years, the republican side has taken the decisive steps it had long dodged.

The I.R.A. has destroyed its weapons. According to the independent commission set up to monitor Northern Ireland's paramilitary groups, it has followed through on its commitments to dismantle its clandestine apparatus and end all organizational involvement in criminal activities. This week, Sinn Fein voted to cooperate with Northern Ireland's reformed police service, a historic turnabout for a movement that once considered itself at war with the old Protestant-dominated police force.

Yet Mr. Paisley has so far seemed unable to acknowledge these historic changes. He needs to state plainly that his party's conditions for forming a power-sharing cabinet with Sinn Fein, as called for by the 1998 Northern Ireland peace agreement, have now been met. In the hope that Mr. Paisley will eventually do the right thing, Britain's prime minister, Tony Blair, has called new Northern Ireland elections for next month.

This is Mr. Paisley's last chance to leave a constructive, forward-looking legacy. If he continues to live in the past, the promise of self-rule will be postponed indefinitely. And one man will be to blame.

DOJ_NMG_0126094

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Judges Pose Questions On Bush Detainee Policy (NYT) 4
Detainee Rights At Center Of Fight (WP) 5
Bush's War Powers Further Scrutinised (FT) 5
Two Men Acquitted Of Conspiracy To Fund Hamas Activities In Israel (WP) 6
Two Found Not Guilty Of Supporting Hamas (CHIT) 7
2 Men Cleared Of Charges Of Aiding Hamas Violence (NYT) 9
Federal Jury In Chicago Acquits 2 Men Of Racketeering Conspiracy In Hamas Trial (FINDLAW/AP) 9
U.S. Senators Briefed On Arar But Say They Have A Lot More Questions (CP) 10
Chinese Official Publishes Rebuke Of Bush (NYT) 10
Poster Of Hussein At Guantánamo Draws Detainee Complaints (NYT) 11
Travel Logs Aid Germans' Kidnap Probe (WP) 11
Neighbors Of British Terror Suspects Skeptical Of Charges (NYT) 12
Bank Group Is Told To Halt Flow Of Data To U.S. Officials (NYT) 14
No More Renditions (LAT) 14

Homeland Response:

Intelligence Pick Says He'd Fight Manipulation (USAT) 15
Judge Explains His Dismissal Of Scientist's Suit Against Times (NYT) 15
Judge Explains Tossing Out Suit Against N.Y. Times (WP) 16
Homeland Security Moves To Increase Armed Pilots (WT) 16
Little Progress Seen For Poorest After Hurricane (NYT) 17
Robin Hoods (commentary) (WSJ) 18
Off Guard (WP) 19

War News:

Senate Talks On Iraq Take A New Form (LAT) 19
Bush Senate Allies To Seek Iraq Benchmarks (WSJ) 20
Compromise Senate Measure Rebuffing Bush's Iraq Buildup Gathers Support (NYT) 21
Senate Prepares To Debate Opposition To Bush's Iraq Policy (MCT) 22
Senate Democrats Split On Measure Opposing Bush (WP) 23
Majority In Senate Support 'Stay The Course' Resolution (WT) . 25
Is Iran Fighting Proxy War With U.S. In Iraq?; Interview With Howard Dean (CNN) 25
Will Politicians Unite Against Troop Build Up?; Interview With Carl Levin; Sex And Scandal In San Francisco; Mary Cheney Reacts To Political Fallout (CNN) 36
Troop Increase Is A Tough Sale For GOP Senators On '08 Ballot (USAT) 46
Troop Surge Could Be Up To 48,000 (CQ) 47
Surge Could Cost Triple Bush Projection, CBO Says (MCT) 48
Iraq At Risk Of Further Strife, Intelligence Report Warns (WP) ... 49
Potomac Watch Senator Feingold's Sin (WSJ) 50
Casey: Only Half Of Troop Boost Needed (AP) 51
Casey: Fewer Troops Can Do Baghdad Job (USAT) 53
Casey Defends Iraq War Effort (MCT) 54
Casey Refutes Iraq Pessimism (WT) 54
Senators Challenge Gen. Casey On Iraq War (WP) 56
War Supporter McCain Laments 'Missteps' In Iraq (WP) 56
General Parries Senate Attacks On Iraq Record (NYT) 57
Casey's Iraq Leadership Is Criticized At Hearing (LAT) 58
Suicide Bombers Attack Busy Market, Killing 45 (USAT/AP) 59
Fleeing One Bomb, Iraqi Shoppers Die In Blast Of Another (WP)60
Iraq Suicide Bombers Kill 60 And Wound 150 In Market In Southern City (NYT) 61
Huge Force Readying Crackdown In Baghdad (AP) 62
Marines Battle Their Past In An Iraqi City (LAT) 63
Who's To Blame For The Killing (WP) 65
U.S. Says Iran Meddles In Iraq But Is Delaying Release Of Data (NYT) 66
Curbing Iran In Iraq Gets Trickier (WSJ) 67
Iraq Fears Being Caught In Middle Of U.S.-Iran Tensions (CHIT)68
Iraq Plans Summit With Iran And Syria (LAT) 69
Ex-advisers Offer Revised Iraq Plans (AP) 71
Inside The Ring (WT) 71
Iran Leader Calls Nuclear Sanctions Ineffective (NYT) 73
Iran President Vows To Push Nuke Program (AP) 73
Iran Has Begun Assembling Centrifuges At Natanz Site: Diplomats (AFP) 74
Russia Supports A Break For Iran (WSJ/AP) 75
Moscow May Seek Accord With Tehran On Gas Supply (NYT) . 75
Russia And Iran Discuss A Cartel For Natural Gas (WSJ) 76
In Uproar, Chirac Again Retracts Remarks On Nuclear Iran (NYT) 78
Chirac Assertions On Iran Force Retraction (WT/AP) 79
Bombing In Paris (WSJ) 79

Between State And Revolution (WSJ) 80
The Oil-Addicted Ayatollahs (NYT) 81
Afghans Urge Legal Amnesty For Those Involved In Wars (NYT)82
U.S. Donates Vehicles, Arms To Afghan Army (AP) 83
An Afghan's Path From Ally Of U.S. To Drug Suspect (NYT) 84
U.S. Reconfigures The Way Casualty Totals Are Given (NYT) .. 86

DOJ:

US Admits Misconduct In Mob Slaying Case (BOS) 86
Top Fed Heads To Duty In D.C. (WT&G) 87

Corporate Scandals:

Senate Report Says S.E.C. Botched Hedge Fund Inquiry (NYT) 88
Dell's Woes Mount As Investors File Improper-Accounting Suit (WSJ) 89
US Probes Siemens Bribery Scandal (FT) 90
Long-Running AOL Trial Heads To Jury (WP) 91
CEO Whack-a-mole (LAT) 92

Criminal Law:

FBI Agent Shows Doubts For Libby's Story (NSDY/AP) 92
Libby Left Out Some Facts In Interviews, FBI Agent Says (WP) 93
F.B.I. Agent Says Libby Denied Being Leak Source (NYT) 94
Portions Of White House Briefing Tapes Played At Libby Trial (USAT) 95
Video Undercuts Libby's Defense (LAT) 96
A Failed Cover-Up (WP) 97
Net-betting Crackdown Freezes Funds (USAT) 98
Notorious NYC Crack Kingpin Convicted Of Murder For Paying To Have Rivals Killed (FINDLAW/AP) 98
Man Convicted In 2 Killings; U.S. To Pursue The Death Penalty (NYT) 99
Ex-U.N. Official Jailed Pending Trial (AP) 100
Hung Jury In Coca-Cola Conspiracy Trial (NSDY/AP) 100
Camden Redevelopment Corp. Records Subpoenaed (CAMCP)101
More Subpoenas Focus On Camden Redevelopment (PHI) 102
Mafia Boss Pleads Guilty To Racketeering (NSDY/AP) 102
Suspect Pleads Guilty To Racketeering (FLSUNSEN) 103
Priest Suspected In Attack Arrested (NSDY/AP) 103
Hoosier Admits Katrina Fund Fraud (FWNS) 104
2 Saucier Women Arrested In Katrina Fraud Cases (BSH) 104
Man Sentenced In Cisco Scam (BOSH) 104
Man Sentenced In Military Contract Fraud (BOS) 105
Woman's Bail Revoked In Child Pornography Case (PHI) 105
Journalists Pay Deadly Toll In Reporting News (AP) 106
Inmate Who Fled With Official's Wife Is Sentenced For Escape (NYT) 106
Abducted Boy, Mom Reunited (WT) 107
Transit Police Try To Crack Down On Robbers (WP) 108
Late For Court: Connecticut Case Draws Scrutiny (NYT) 109
Kaine Dubious On Death Penalty Expansion (WP) 111

Civil Law:

FEC To Police '527' Groups' Campaign Activities (WP) 112

Civil Rights:

Lawsuit Says Apartments' No-dog Policy Biased Against The Blind (AP) 112
Justice Department Settles Cibola County Voting Rights Claim (AP) 113
Miss. Voting Rights Trial On Break, Resumes Feb. 15 (AP) 113
State Appeals Justice Ruling On Chastang (MR) 114
Texas Deputy To Pay Price For Defending Self (WT) 115
Hairdresser To The Elite Faces New Lawsuit (WP/AP) 116
Florida Shifting To Voting System With Paper Trail (NYT) 117
Gays Should Be Allowed To Serve Openly In Military, Poll Finds (WSJ) 118

Antitrust:

Municipal Broker Receives Subpoenas In U.S. Probe (Update3) (BLOOM) 118
Microsoft Plans To License Instructions (AP) 119
United CEO Says Mergers Still Viable (USAT) 120

Environment:

U.N. Report Adds Pressure To Global-Warming Fight (WSJ)... 120
Political Climate Shifts As Verdict On Warming Arrives (USAT)121
Live With Climate Change (USAT) 122
Judge Looking To Release Material From Rocky Flats Grand Jury (AP) 123
CDC Issues Guidelines For Battling Flu Pandemic (WP) 124
Flu Advice Would Vary Under U.S. Plan (WP/AP) 125
Closings And Cancellations Top Advice On Flu Outbreak (NYT)126
Sites Of Risky Levees Listed (USAT) 127
Engineers Say 120 Levees Are Flood Risk (NYT) 127

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Drug Kingpin Sentenced To 40 Years In Prison (AP)128
20 Members Of Violent Street Gang Arrested In New Jersey Raids (NYT) 128
State, Federal Authorities Round Up Suspected Bloods Gang Members (NSDY/AP) 129
Bloods Targeted In Series Of Raids (PHI) 130
Gang Probe Brings Arrests (TTNJ) 130
17 Arrested In Bloods Gang Sweep (APP) 132
Suspected Bloods Rounded Up In Pa., N.J. (CHCP) 132
Troopers Arrest 17 In Effort To Dismantle A Violent Gang (NSL)132
State Police Arrest 25 Suspected Gang Members (WPVI) 133
Major Gang Crackdown In The Garden State (WABC) 134
'BOBO' GETS 11 YEARS ... Kittitian Man Put Away In US Jail (SKN) 134
Georgia Man Arrested For Attempted Murder In Drug Raid In New York (AP) 134
Former River Hill Teacher Sentenced In Drug Case (COLFL) .. 135
Similar Bombs In KC, Chicago (KCS) 137
Gang Members, Others Arrested On Gun Violations (SDUT)... 137
Gun Dealer Pleads Guilty To Violation (CTPOST) 138
Feds Investigate Gang, Charge Two For Cocaine (SEAPI) 139

Immigration:

Judge Nixes Louisiana State Law Banning Illegal Immigrants From Driving (FINDLAW/AP) 139

DOJ_NMG_0126096

Immigration Raid Nets 53 In Texas (FINDLAW/AP)..... 139
New RNC Chief Backs Bill With Guest-worker Plan (WT) 140
Border Policy's Success Strains Resources (WP)..... 141

Tax:

Protective Order Granted (NPLATTET)..... 143
Court Rejects Tax Shelter Once Sold By KPMG (NYT)..... 143

Congress-Administration:

Bush Seeks Big Medicare And Medicaid Saving (NYT)..... 144
Bush's 2008 Budget Calls For Boost To Pell Grant (WP) 146
Bush To Seek Record Boost To Pell Grants (WT) 146
Bush Budget Calls For Pell Grant Boost (AP) 147
A Realistic Budget (1 Letter) (NYT) 148
In The Loop: Aide At Labor Found Budget's Weaknesses, So Democrats Don't Have To (WP) 148
Soaring War Funding Raises Concerns About Scope Of Spending (USAT)..... 149
How Democrats Work With Tight Purse (CSM)..... 150
White House Welcomes Tougher Oversight (AP) 151
FEDERAL DIARY: A Tale Of Mice Illustrates How To Save Money (WP)..... 152
Senate OKs Higher Minimum-wage Bill (USAT) 153
Senate's Minimum-Wage Rise To Face Test In House (WSJ) . 153
Senate Passes Wage Bill, But Obstacles Await (NYT) 154
Senate Ups Wage To $7.25 Over Two Years (AP)..... 155
Senate Adds Tax Breaks To Minimum Wage Bill (WP) 156
Senate Votes To Raise Minimum Wage (MCT) 157
Senate Passes Wage Bill; House To Fight Tax Relief (WT) 158
How To Really Help Low-Wage Workers (WP)..... 159
Bush Urges Stepped-Up Campaign Against Childhood Obesity (WP)..... 160
Bush Urges Parents To Get Kids Outdoors To Fight Childhood Obesity (USAT/AP)..... 160
Bush Urges Parents To Get Kids Outdoors (NYT/AP)..... 161
Bush Gets Aid Of Democrats In Fighting Pandemics (NYT)..... 162
Vaccine Firms Get Immunity From The U.S. (WSJ)..... 162
Drug Industry Faces Bitter Pill (WSJ) 163
Lawmakers Eye Child Insurance Program (AP)..... 164
Senate Democrats Warn F.C.C. Of Tough New Oversight (NYT)165
Democrats Urge Tighter FCC Rules (WP) 166
Senators Bristle At FCC Chief's Enforcement Of AT&T-BellSouth Merger (USAT)..... 167
FCC Told To Focus On Public Interest (WT)..... 168
Data Privacy Bill Expected To Target Retailers, Banks (WP) ... 168
Sanchez Quits Hispanic Caucus (LAT) 169
Breaking News: Two More Reps. Complain About Treatment Of Women In Hispanic Caucus (POL) 170
Hispanic Caucus Members Toil Over Insult (AP) 172
Better Security For Judges (NYT)..... 172

Other News:

Bush, Dems Have Different Economic Views (AP) 173
Job Market Was A Key To Fed's Call (WSJ)..... 174
Fed's Inflation Dilemma (WSJ) 175
Dow, Russell 2000 Close At New Highs As Economic Data Bolster Confidence (WP/AP) 176
Dow Rises 51.99 To A Record On Exxon Mobil's Results (WSJ)176
Manufacturing Activity Drops (WSJ) 177
US Manufacturing 'on Brink Of Recession' (FT)..... 178
Some Lawmakers Shun Big Game Pass (WSJ) 178
Sharpton Takes Biden To Task On Remarks (AP) 179
An Inarticulate Kickoff (WP) 180
So Far, Obama Can't Take Black Vote For Granted (NYT) 180
Clinton Setting A $1 Million Goal For Donors (NYT)..... 182
McCain, Giuliani Skipping Some Conservative Events (POL) .. 183
Pawlenty Boosts McCain (POL) 185
California Primary Shift Seen Hindering McCain (WT)..... 185
Hunter Out To Capture White House (USAT) 186
Al Gore Nominated For Nobel Peace Prize (LAT/AP)..... 187
Praying At The Pump (NYT) 187
Abrogating Workers' Rights (WSJ) 188
Is $34.06 Per Hour 'Underpaid'? (WSJ)..... 189
A Bipartisan Trade Policy (NYT) 190
Free To Choose In Utah (WSJ) 191
Rice To Seek Support For Mideast Effort (WP)..... 191
UN Chief Wants More Energetic Mideast Peace Quartet (AFP)192
Shootout In Gaza Deepens Bitter Split (NYT) 193
6 Dead In Gaza After Renewed Palestinian In-fighting (LAT) ... 193
How Lebanon's Army Could Hold Key To Peace (WSJ)..... 194
U.S. Eyes Re-establishing Relations (WT) 195
Shiite-Sunni Conflict Rises In Pakistan (CSM) 196
U.S. Hopes For Progress On N. Korea Deal (AP)..... 197
A Colossal Leap Of Faith In Fight Against Famine (WP) 197
N Korea Leader Finds Life's Luxuries In Gibraltar (FT)..... 198
U.S. Halts China Space Ventures (WT)..... 198
U.N. Hopes China Pushes For Darfur End (AP)..... 199
Pressure On China As President Heads To Sudan (AFP)..... 200
Hu's Trip To Sudan Tests China-Africa Ties (CSM)..... 201
In Africa, China's Expansion Begins To Stir Resentment (WSJ)202
China Gets Cold Feet For Foreign Investment (WP)..... 205
Russian TV Shines Warmly On A Likely Successor To Putin (WP)..... 206
Putin Denies Using Energy As A Weapon (FT)..... 208
Blair Gives 2nd Interview In Inquiry About Graft (NYT)..... 208
For Blair, Round 2 Of Police Questions (WP)..... 209
Official Says U.S. Willing To Help Cuba (AP)..... 210
Europe Faults U.S. Farm Proposal (WSJ)..... 210
Solution For Kosovo (WP) 211
Ulster's Last Holdout (NYT) 212

DOJ_NMG_0126097

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judges Pose Questions On Bush Detainee Policy (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

RICHMOND, Va., Feb. 1 — In a series of probing and sometimes testy exchanges with a government lawyer, two of three judges on a federal appeals court panel here indicated Thursday that they might not be prepared to accept the Bush administration's claim that it has the unilateral power to detain people it calls enemy combatants.

The case was brought by Ali al-Marri, a citizen of Qatar who is the only person on the American mainland being held as an enemy combatant, at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C. Mr. Marri, a legal resident whom the government calls a sleeper agent for Al Qaeda, was arrested in Peoria, Ill., on Dec. 12, 2001, where he was living with his family and studying computer science at Bradley University.

"What would prevent you from plucking up anyone and saying, 'You are an enemy combatant?' " Judge Roger L. Gregory of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit asked the administration's lawyer, David B. Salmons.

Mr. Salmons said the executive branch was entitled to make that judgment in wartime without interference from the courts. "A citizen, no less than an alien, can be an enemy combatant," he added.

Mr. Marri's appeal had been expected mostly to concern the impact of a new law, the Military Commissions Act, which says the courts have no jurisdiction to hear challenges from any noncitizen "who has been determined by the United States to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant."

But questions from Judge Gregory and Judge Diana Gribbon Motz suggested that the court might be willing to reach the more fundamental question of when and how such enemy-combatant determinations should be made.

Judge Motz asked, for instance, about the broader implications of the government's position that the United States is at war with Al Qaeda and that people affiliated with it may be subject to military detention rather than criminal prosecution.

"Nations have wars against each other," Judge Motz said. "People have quarrels or fights. Individuals can be terrorists. Individuals don't make war."

Mr. Salmons responded that a 2001 Congressional authorization to use military force after the Sept. 11 attacks had granted the president the power to detain Mr. Marri.

Judge Motz asked a series of hypothetical questions about whether the president could designate someone affiliated with People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, or PETA, as an enemy combatant. "Could the president declare war on PETA?" she asked.

Mr. Salmons said the hypothetical was unrealistic, but he stopped short of categorically rejecting the idea. "The representative of PETA can sleep well at night," he said, because the executive branch's determination of who is an enemy combatant is a careful one.

Judge Motz also suggested that the criminal justice system could handle people like Mr. Marri.

"That doesn't mean he doesn't get punished," Judge Motz said. "Perhaps he gets punished worse, under the criminal process."

Mr. Marri was in fact charged with credit card fraud and lying to federal agents after his arrest in 2001, and he was on the verge of trial when he was moved into military detention in 2003.

The third judge, Henry E. Hudson, visiting from the Federal District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, asked relatively few questions, most of them centered on the adequacy of the hearing Mr. Marri received in the trial court.

Judge Gregory, by contrast, subjected both lawyers to tough questioning.

"Do you agree," he asked Jonathan Hafetz, a lawyer for Mr. Marri with the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law, "that Congress gave the president broad power after Sept. 11 to wage the war on terrorism?"

"Certainly, your honor," Mr. Hafetz responded. "Broad, but not unlimited."

Judge Motz indicated that the government's shifting legal tactics in other cases had lost it a measure of credibility. It moved Jose Padilla, once labeled an enemy combatant, into the criminal justice system as the United States Supreme Court was considering whether to hear his challenge to that designation.

"Often the government in these cases has a late-breaking development," Judge Motz said. "Is there any late-breaking development here?"

Mr. Salmons said no.

Judges Motz and Gregory were appointed by President Bill Clinton, and Judge Hudson by President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0126098

Detainee Rights At Center Of Fight (WP)

By Sari Horwitz

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

RICHMOND, Feb. 1 -- The Bush administration argued Thursday that a Qatari national who it says was an al-Qaeda sleeper agent sent to the United States for a second wave of terrorist attacks has no right to challenge in court his status as an enemy combatant.

Attorneys for Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, held for 3 1/2 years in the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., have contested the president's authority to indefinitely detain a lawful resident of the United States without charges.

If the government is right, said lawyer Jonathan Hafetz, "they can pick up any immigrant in this country, lock them in a military jail and hold the keys to the courthouse. If this case stands, the United States could effectively disappear people."

In arguments before a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit in Richmond, Bush administration lawyers contended that the Marri case is unique and does not represent a threat to immigrants with no ties to terrorist organizations.

Assistant Solicitor General David B. Salmons said Marri met in 2001 with Osama bin Laden and accused Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed and received training from al-Qaeda in Afghanistan in the use of poisons.

The government contends that Marri was sent to help other al-Qaeda operatives carry out subsequent terrorist attacks and had been told by al-Qaeda to explore computer-hacking methods to disrupt the U.S. banking system. "This is not a close case," Salmons said. "Al-Marri is clearly an al-Qaeda operative."

Marri, 41, is the only accused enemy combatant still held in the United States. Yaser Esam Hamdi, a U.S. citizen, was freed and sent to Saudi Arabia after the Supreme Court upheld his right to challenge his detention; Jose Padilla, another U.S. citizen, was transferred to the civilian justice system last year. Marri, who took up residence in Peoria, Ill., on a student visa in 2001, was arrested there.

Marri was arrested by the FBI in December 2001 and charged with credit card fraud and lying to federal agents. He was accused of denying that he had repeatedly tried to call a man in the United Arab Emirates who was the paymaster for the Sept. 11 hijackers. The charges were dropped in June 2003 when President Bush declared Marri an enemy combatant and moved him to military control.

Thursday, the judges focused their questions not on whether Marri is an al-Qaeda operative but on whether he was properly designated an enemy combatant.

Judge Diana Gribbon Motz questioned under what circumstances the president can order someone on U.S. soil to be detained as an enemy combatant. Under the traditional laws of war, she said, combatants are captured on a battlefield and connected to a nation or state at war with the United States.

Motz said that she is concerned about giving the government broad authority "to pluck up anyone from the streets of the United States" and added: "We don't want other nations to do that to our people."

But Judge Roger L. Gregory suggested that Congress knew it was dealing with an "amorphous enemy" when it passed the Military Commissions Act last year, creating a tribunal system for accused combatants such as Marri to challenge their status.

The provision of the act that denies access to U.S. courts to foreign nationals deemed enemy combatants was aimed primarily at Guantanamo Bay detainees. Attorneys for those prisoners have filed a challenge to that provision, arguing that it violates constitutional guarantees against being detained without the right to contest the charges in court.

Bush's War Powers Further Scrutinised (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Richmond, Virginia

Financial Times, February 2, 2007

The battle to define presidential powers in the "war on terror" came under renewed scrutiny on Thursday when a foreign prisoner held in the US on suspicion of being an al-Qaeda "sleeper agent" asked a court to declare his detention unconstitutional.

Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a Qatari citizen studying computer science in the US, was arrested in Illinois in late 2001 in connection with the investigation into the September 11 attacks. He was slated for a criminal trial in 2003 on charges including credit card fraud.

Just weeks before the trial, however, President George W. Bush classified Mr Marri as an unlawful "enemy combatant" in the "war on terror". He was removed from the criminal justice system and transferred to a prison in South Carolina, where he has remained without direct access to his family. The administration has designated hundreds of detainees at Guantánamo Bay as "enemy combatants".

DOJ_NMG_0126099

But lawyers for Mr Marri argued in a federal appeals court in Virginia on Thursday that Mr Bush did not have the authority to declare legal US residents as enemy combatants. “The president cannot militarise the case of a man in Peoria [Illinois] with the stroke of a pen,” said Jonathan Hafetz, a New York University lawyer representing Mr Marri.

The Justice Department argued that Congress gave Mr Bush the authority to declare Mr Marri an enemy combatant when it gave him the ability to use force to prosecute the “war on terror” after September 11.

Critics say Congress intended the president to have the authority to classify only prisoners captured on the battlefield, not legal US residents or US citizens, as enemy combatants.

“If the government prevails, any one of the 11.6m legal permanent residents in the US could – on the president’s say-so...be held indefinitely as an ‘unlawful enemy combatant’ with no right to challenge his or her imprisonment in court,” said Human Rights Watch.

In court on Thursday, the Justice Department argued the battlefield in the “war on terror” included the US. That view seemed to receive support from one judge on the three-member panel but another appeared to question the administration’s argument, saying while Congress could have given Mr Bush the ability to declare legal residents and citizens as “enemy combatants”, it was unclear it had done so.

But Congress may again tackle the debate over habeas, which could have implications for the case of Mr al-Marri and the several hundred detainees still imprisoned at Guantánamo.

Senators Patrick Leahy and Arlen Specter, the top Democrat and Republican on the Senate judiciary committee, last week said they would work to reinstate the right of habeas corpus for all detainees.

“The great writ of habeas corpus was done horrible damage by the Congress in a law the president signed last year,” Sen Leahy told Alberto Gonzales, the US attorney-general last week.

“I just want to put everybody on notice: as chairman of this committee, I will do everything possible to restore all the rights under the write of habeas corpus that were there before we passed the [MCA] legislation,” he said.

Two Men Acquitted Of Conspiracy To Fund Hamas Activities In Israel (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

A federal jury in Chicago acquitted two men yesterday of charges that they were part of a long-running conspiracy to finance Hamas activities in Israel -- marking the latest defeat for the Justice Department in cases involving support for radical Palestinian groups.

Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former Howard University professor who lives in Springfield, and Muhammad Salah, 53, a former grocer from suburban Chicago, were found not guilty of racketeering conspiracy. The charge was the most serious allegation against them and could have drawn life sentences for each.

But the two men were found guilty of lesser charges: Ashqar was convicted of obstruction of justice and criminal contempt for refusing to testify in front of a grand jury, while Salah was convicted of obstruction for providing false answers in a civil lawsuit.

The case provides the latest example of the serious difficulties faced by the Justice Department in its attempts to prosecute supporters of radical Palestinian organizations. In the Chicago case, prosecutors faced the additional challenge of trying to punish activities that occurred before Hamas was declared a terrorist organization by the U.S. government in 1995.

Salah, a U.S. citizen, was accused of helping funnel hundreds of thousands of dollars to militant groups in the West Bank and Gaza. He was captured by the Israelis with $100,000 in cash in 1993 and allegedly confessed to being a military commander in Hamas. Ashqar was alleged to have helped launder money and facilitate communications for Hamas.

Neither man denied that he helped move money for Palestinian causes. But both said what they did was aimed at helping the Palestinian people and not to promote terrorism. In addition, Salah said his confession was the result of torture by Israeli officials.

In Chicago yesterday, the defendants and their attorneys immediately characterized the verdicts as a victory and said they showed that the government had overreached by trying to punish legitimate opposition to Israeli policies.

"It was better than we thought," a tearful Salah told reporters in Chicago. "We are good people, not terrorists."

Salah's attorney, Michael Deutsch, called the verdict "a tremendous victory" and said his client "may not even go to prison at all."

"This rejects the idea we can criminalize someone for resisting an illegal occupation in another country," Deutsch said.

The Justice Department in Washington declined to comment. First Assistant U.S. Attorney Gary S. Shapiro told reporters in Chicago: "We've convicted them. It's hard to say that we're disappointed."

DOJ_NMG_0126100

The prosecution of Ashqar and Salah was deemed so important to the Justice Department that the 2004 indictments were announced in a news conference by then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft. But the outcome of the three-month trial is decidedly mixed.

In December 2005, a jury in Florida acquitted former computer professor Sami al-Arian of eight terrorism charges and deadlocked on nine others. Arian eventually pleaded guilty to supporting members of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad and is slated to be deported after finishing a short prison term.

One of Arian's attorneys, William Moffit, also represented Ashqar in Chicago.

The case was prosecuted by the office of U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who is in the spotlight as the special counsel in the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff.

The Hamas prosecution also featured another central player in the Libby saga: former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, who testified on behalf of prosecutors in Chicago about an Israeli interrogation session with Salah that she witnessed in the early 1990s.

Salah and his attorney argued that much of the evidence against him, including a confession, should be disregarded because it was obtained under torture when he was in Israeli custody. Miller testified that she saw no evidence of mistreatment when she witnessed an interrogation of Salah and -- in an unprecedented twist for a U.S. courtroom -- two Israeli interrogators testified under aliases that Salah was treated well.

Prosecutors also presented recorded conversations in which Ashqar discussed violent operations by Hamas. But Moffit said his client was never recorded planning any attacks or recruiting anyone to carry them out.

One other defendant remains under indictment in the case: Mousa Abu Marzook, Hamas's deputy political bureau chief, who was deported from the United States in 1997 and is now a fugitive living in Damascus, Syria.

Staff writer Kari Lydersen in Chicago and staff researcher Julie Tate in Washington contributed to this report.

Two Found Not Guilty Of Supporting Hamas (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Jeff Coen

Chicago Tribune, February 2, 2007

In a legal defeat for the Bush administration's domestic war on terror, a federal jury Thursday acquitted two men of being leading members of the Palestinian extremist group Hamas and conspiring to support terrorism from the United States.

Bridgeview businessman Muhammad Salah swallowed hard and visibly fought back tears of joy as the jury acquitted him and co-defendant Abdelhaleem Ashqar of the most serious charges in the landmark case.

Salah and Ashqar, a business professor living outside Washington, D.C., were found not guilty of the racketeering charges that could have resulted in life prison terms. The men were convicted of lesser charges including obstruction of justice, and their lawyers promised to fight to keep them out of prison altogether when they are sentenced in June.

Salah hugged his family and supporters and raised his arms in victory as he left the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse to applause.

"The terrorism theory is defeated," he said as he left. "We are not terrorists, and everyone can see it."

The case was among the first to level allegations that America was being used as a fundraising base for a government-designated terrorist organization, but it was built largely on evidence that was more than a decade old. Some of that evidence was gathered in Israel—including what the defense contended was Salah's coerced confession—and involved conduct that occurred in the early 1990s, before the U.S. had given Hamas the terror designation.

Former U.S. Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft had announced the charges against Salah and Ashqar in a 2004 news conference in Chicago that heralded a significant shift in the Justice Department's approach to allegations about domestic support for foreign militant groups.

But Salah's lawyers said their win shows the government was overreaching.

"It's a huge victory—what's left is a relatively minor charge," said Salah's lawyer, Michael Deutsch. "I think the jury rejected this idea that you can criminalize this kind of organizing activity under RICO [Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act] in the U.S.," he said. "It's a stretch."

Leaders of the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI in Chicago disagreed, and said the outcome of the Salah trial would do nothing to dissuade them from using the same tools again to fight terrorist organizations with branches or operatives here.

"This case is not going to prevent us from aggressively pursuing terrorism and terrorism financing cases," said Gary Shapiro, first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago

That includes the unprecedented use of Israeli agents to testify against defendants, as they did against Salah and Ashqar.

"We don't believe we would have received guilty verdicts on all the other counts if it had not been for their testimony, which put all the conduct of the defendants into perspective," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0126101

Jurors deliberated for 14 days over three weeks before finding Salah, a 53-year-old grocer, not guilty of conspiring to provide funding, recruiting, training and other aid to Hamas, a group responsible for dozens of terrorist attacks in Israel, Gaza and the West Bank. He was convicted of obstruction for lying under oath when questioned in a civil suit filed by the family of David Boim, an American student killed in a Hamas shooting.

$156 million awarded

In 2004, a federal jury awarded Boim's parents $156 million after finding that Salah provided support to Hamas.

Ashqar, 48, had been accused of archiving and distributing key documents and acting as a kind of switchboard who connected Hamas members across the globe to one another through his home telephone. He was convicted of obstruction and criminal contempt for refusing in 1998 to testify before a grand jury

Jurors said they were not divided, and simply applied the evidence presented in the three-month trial to the law they were given.

"There was a lot of evidence to go through, a lot of documentary evidence to go through," said juror Max Lapertosa, a lawyer for Access Living, a disabilities advocacy and services organization in Chicago. "The law was complex. In the end I think we came up with an unanimous verdict that is as fair as we could have possibly rendered."

That evidence included the confession of Salah, an American citizen, provided in 1993 while in the custody of Israel, as well as bank records showing he had received nearly $1 million from top Hamas leader Mousa Abu Marzook.

And the evidence included a trove of documents and wiretaps collected by federal agents in 1993 and 1994 under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA. The act permits electronic surveillance for the purpose of gathering intelligence domestically against people suspected of being foreign agents.

Some of the wiretaps and documents captured under the FISA order were entered as evidence against Salah and Ashqar in a process facilitated by the much-scrutinized Patriot Act.

The case had so many unusual elements that it's not possible to generalize from the results, Shapiro said.

But he said this was not a case about someone innocently sending or taking money overseas to aid charitable events. One of the defense positions in the case was that fundraising efforts were meant to support hospitals and education in the West Bank.

Prosecution cites terror acts

"The evidence in this case was pretty substantial that the money went overseas to aid the military wing of Hamas, and that that money went at least for the ostensible purpose of killing the Israeli military and engaging in other terrorist acts which killed civilians," Shapiro said.

Salah's lawyers also had contended that he was tortured into confessing while in Israeli custody. The prosecution had rejected that claim, and had even brought in former New York Times reporter Judith Miller—who had seen some of the interrogation—to testify about Salah's condition.

At the Mosque Foundation in Bridgeview on Thursday, Muslims who worship with Salah celebrated the verdict. They said it shows Muslims can find justice in the American legal system.

"Our community will no longer have to be afraid," said Amira Daoud. "I'm so glad that American people—his peers—gave a verdict that shows he couldn't have done this."

Leaders of Jewish advocacy groups expressed disappointment over the acquittals on the most serious charges.

"The fact that the charges were not sustained is a setback for the international fight against terrorism, plus for the public's understanding of how terrorist organizations can take advantage of the openness of democratic societies," said Yehudit Barsky of the American Jewish Committee in New York.

But they took some consolation in Salah's conviction for lying under oath in the Boim litigation.

"There is no escaping the fact that both of these individuals [Salah and Ashqar] were deeply involved with Hamas," said lawyer Steve Landes, who represented the Boim family at the trial.

Notified of the verdict, Boim's father, Stanley, said he was "at a loss for words."

"We have to hope that for people who do evil, justice will be done," he said from Jerusalem.

Salah relatives pleased

Salah's relatives said the jury's verdict shows Salah and Ashqar were only engaged in legal conduct, supporting Hamas' charitable work in gatherings protected by the U.S. Constitution.

Salah was forced to talk to Israeli interrogators and give a handwritten statement admitting he acted as the military commander of Hamas from his home in Bridgeview, they said.

Prosecutors had argued that Salah's confession to Israeli authorities was voluntary and included corroborating facts.

"They were basically trying to do Israel's work," Salah's cousin, Abdullah Salah, said of the government. "They were using Israeli agents, [coerced] confessions, in an American courtroom. It's un-American."

"We are not terrorists. We are not bad people," said Mahmoud Salah, Salah's brother. "We came to this country to be free.

DOJ_NMG_0126102

"Now we thank God because it is over."

2 Men Cleared Of Charges Of Aiding Hamas Violence (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

CHICAGO, Feb. 1 — Two men were acquitted Thursday of federal charges that they provided money and other aid to the Palestinian organization Hamas in the early 1990s.

The racketeering case against the men, Muhammad Salah, 53, a onetime grocer from suburban Chicago, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former university professor from suburban Washington, was announced with much fanfare in 2004 by the United States attorney general at the time, John Ashcroft, as an important part of the government's fight against terrorism.

But Thursday afternoon, after a three-month trial and 14 days of deliberations, a jury of seven women and five men rejected the core of the government's case and acquitted Mr. Salah and Dr. Ashqar of the most serious charge brought under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, that the two men used United States bank accounts to funnel money to Hamas's military leaders and were therefore responsible for the group's violent tactics against Israel.

The jury convicted the men of lesser charges, including obstruction of justice and, for Dr. Ashqar, criminal contempt.

Both men smiled and wept after the verdict, hugging and thanking family members and supporters in the packed and heavily secured downtown courtroom. "We are not terrorists," Mr. Salah told reporters in the lobby of the courthouse, his young son perched on his shoulders.

Defense lawyers said the verdict was a blow to what they called the United States government's decision to litigate the dispute between Israel and the Palestinians in American courtrooms.

"The government has tried to turn the Israeli-Palestinian conflict into something criminal," said William Moffitt, who is Dr. Ashqar's lawyer. "Maybe the government will get it in their heads that the conflict won't be settled in the criminal courts of the United States."

Prosecutors said they accepted the jury's decision, but also stood by the evidence they presented at trial.

"This was about an organization that has publicly claimed credit over and over and over again for terrorist acts," said Gary S. Shapiro, the first assistant United States attorney in Chicago, "not just acts against the Israeli military, but acts against civilians where Americans and foreign nationals were killed."

Prosecutors based their accusations against Mr. Salah on a 1993 confession he made while in the custody of the Israeli secret police, who arrested him at a checkpoint in the Gaza Strip and found $97,000 in his hotel room. Mr. Salah told the Israeli police that he had met with top Hamas military officials and given them money. He spent nearly five years in an Israeli prison.

Defense lawyers argued that the confession was false and obtained only after Mr. Salah endured weeks of torture by the Israeli agents.

The case against Dr. Ashqar centered on recorded telephone conversations he had with Hamas officials and records seized in the early 1990s from his home in Oxford, Miss., while he was a graduate student at the University of Mississippi.

Throughout the trial, both defendants denied membership in Hamas, which they pointed out had not been designated a terrorist organization by the United States government until 1997. They maintained that their interactions with the organization were humanitarian in nature, intended only to finance charities and help impoverished Palestinians living under Israeli occupation.

Federal Jury In Chicago Acquits 2 Men Of Racketeering Conspiracy In Hamas Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 2, 2007

(AP) - CHICAGO-Two men accused of furnishing money and fresh recruits to the militant Palestinian group Hamas were acquitted Thursday of racketeering but convicted on lesser charges.

The two men beamed broadly at the split verdict and defense attorneys immediately declared victory in the three-month trial that the government had described as a major component in its war on terrorism.

"We are not terrorists," former grocer Muhammad Salah told reporters as he left the courthouse with his 8-year-old son, Ibrahim, on his shoulders. "I feel good," he said as he was hugged by relatives and well wishers. "I thank God and I hope justice will prevail."

"This is a great day for justice," said Salah's attorney, Michael E. Deutsch.

Salah, 53, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a one-time assistant business professor at Howard University in Washington, had been accused of laundering money for Hamas terrorists fighting to topple the Israeli government.

DOJ_NMG_0126103

Defense attorneys portrayed the men as freedom fighters, comparing them to Nelson Mandela, Malcolm X and the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

Salah and Ashqar, who lives in Springfield, Virginia, have always denied being members of Hamas. But they have made no secret of their dislike of the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza.

Salah was convicted of obstruction of justice for providing false answers to questions in a civil suit filed by parents of an American teenager who was shot and killed by Hamas terrorists at an Israeli bus stop.

Ashqar was convicted of obstruction of justice and criminal contempt for refusing to testify before a federal grand jury after receiving immunity from prosecution for anything that he might have revealed.

The jury delivered the verdict amid heavy security in the courtroom after deliberating for 14 days.

"We've convicted them - it's hard to say that we're disappointed," First Assistant U.S. Attorney Gary Shapiro said.

Defense attorneys said they hoped to have the convictions reversed on appeal but added that, at worst, the men would likely serve comparatively short sentences.

Also charged in the case is Abu Mousa Marzook, described as one of the top leaders of Hamas. Prosecutors said it was Marzook who sent Salah on his mission to Israel and supplied him with money to give to Hamas leaders.

FBI agents also intercepted phone calls between Ashqar and Marzook.

Marzook is currently living in Damascus, Syria, and is classified by the government as a fugitive.

U.S. Senators Briefed On Arar But Say They Have A Lot More Questions (CP)

Canadian Press, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (CP) - Two U.S. senators who have been briefed on the Maher Arar case say they have a lot more questions.

But Democrat Patrick Leahy and and Republican Arlen Specter clammed up about what they were told by Justice Department officials today during a meeting that lasted an hour and 40 minutes.

They say the information is classified but wanted to assure people that the file was receiving a lot of congressional oversight.

The two senators say they want to know more about why Arar was sent to Syria and why the United States won't take him off its security watch list when he's been completely exonerated in Canada.

Leahy also wants the Government Accountability Office to look into Arar's case. The office is already conducting a study of how people make it onto the U.S. no-fly list.

Leahy angrily demanded answers from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a public hearing last month, saying the case was a black mark on the United States.

Chinese Official Publishes Rebuke Of Bush (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 1 — A senior Chinese government official issued a rare public rebuke of President Bush on Thursday, accusing him of waging a “unilateral” battle against terrorists that had worsened global tensions.

The official, Ye Xiaowen, director of China’s State Bureau of Religious Affairs, said in a front-page article in the overseas edition of The People’s Daily that Mr. Bush’s past references to a “crusade” and to “Islamic fascism” were verbal gaffes that revealed his effort to turn the fight against terrorism into a religious war.

Partly as a result, he said, the United States had lost support for the war in Iraq and had frittered away the good will Americans gained after the 9/11 attacks.

“The more they oppose terrorism, the more terror they produce,” Mr. Ye said in the article. “How many more troops will they send to die in the meat grinder” of Iraq.

Mr. Ye wrote that Mr. Bush had effectively “hijacked” one religion, Christianity, to engage in a battle against another one, Islam. That has strengthened Islamic fundamentalists and made the war unwinnable, he contended.

“Unilateralism and terrorism breed each other, but neither can overcome the other,” he wrote.

While such assessments of Mr. Bush’s leadership are not new among his opponents in the United States and abroad, Chinese officials generally take pains to maintain cordial relations with Washington. Beijing remained on the sidelines when the United States invaded Iraq, and Chinese officials have refrained from commenting extensively on the difficulties the American military has faced there.

Even when China opposes American policies, it is rare for a sitting official to cast aspersions on an American president by name, a step often considered a breach of diplomatic etiquette.

DOJ_NMG_0126104

It is unclear if Mr. Ye cleared his comments with other top leaders before publishing them in the overseas edition of the newspaper, the Communist Party's most authoritative publication.

Mr. Ye's bureau manages China's official Christian, Buddhist and Islamic associations. The associations regulate religious practice in China, which is officially atheist.

In the past, Mr. Ye has clashed with American officials who have pressed China to allow greater religious freedom, and he has tended to speak bluntly when defending religious policies.

The American Embassy in Beijing did not offer any immediate response to Mr. Ye's article.

Beijing at least initially embraced the American-led fight against terrorists. Human rights groups say China has used Mr. Bush's policies to justify a broader crackdown on its Muslim Uighur population in the western region of Xinjiang, where it says separatist groups operate.

Yet even as that crackdown has continued, the Chinese religious authorities have sought to improve relations with Islamic nations and Islamic religious leaders at home and abroad.

Last year, the Foreign Ministry officially condemned Danish cartoons that Muslims considered an insult to the Prophet Muhammad. This year, Chinese propaganda officials have ordered the Chinese news media to play down images or references to pigs ahead of the Year of the Pig in the Chinese zodiac, because China's Hui Muslim minority considers pigs offensive.

Mr. Ye suggested that Mr. Bush follow China's more accommodating approach. Mr. Bush should "abandon unilateralism" and "respect that differences can exist in harmony," Mr. Ye wrote.

Poster Of Hussein At Guantánamo Draws Detainee Complaints (NYT)

By David Rohde

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

Military officials have removed a poster of Saddam Hussein from the American detention center in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, after complaints from a detainee that it was intended to intimidate the prisoners there.

Lawyers for the detainee said the 7-by-3-foot poster, in a small recreation area for prisoners, featured images of Mr. Hussein being sentenced to death and a heading in Arabic that stated, "Because Saddam chose not to cooperate and not to tell the truth, because he thought by lying he would get released, for that reason he was executed."

The chief military spokesman in Guantánamo, Cmdr. Robert Durand, said the lawyers' description of the statement on the poster was inaccurate, but he declined to give its exact wording.

"A recent poster showed Saddam Hussein's capture, court appearances and sentencing," Commander Durand said in an e-mail message. "The intent of this poster was to show that the Iraqi people are making progress and have delivered justice."

Commander Durand said that the poster had been removed and that the military regretted that the "language of this poster appeared insensitive."

Lawyers for the detainee who complained, David Hicks, an Australian who was captured in Afghanistan in 2001, said news articles about Mr. Hussein's execution were also displayed in the recreation area. Other articles described the accidental decapitation of a Hussein co-defendant in a subsequent hanging.

"I have no doubt that those were put up for a particular reason," said Joshua L. Dratel, one of Mr. Hicks's lawyers. "For psychological warfare and for mental torture and intimidation."

Commander Durand said the articles had not been intended to intimidate prisoners. "The news photos that appear in the stories are neither graphic nor sensational," he said. "A BBC news article describing Saddam Hussein's execution, with a photo of him prior to his hanging, was included in the camp news."

Since the camp's opening, American military officials have displayed posters they created in Arabic and other languages that conveyed news events. Lawyers for the detainees said they focused on the arrests of terrorism suspects and the deaths of Iraqi and Afghan insurgents. Military officials described the posters as balanced.

In the past, military officials barred lawyers for the prisoners from describing outside events to them or giving them news articles.

The articles on Mr. Hussein were displayed under a new policy in which the American military posts a weekly collection of news reports in recreation areas around the prison, Commander Durand said.

Travel Logs Aid Germans' Kidnap Probe (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0126105

BERLIN, Feb. 1 -- If not for the pit stops on a Mediterranean resort island, where they relaxed in four-star hotels and went to the spa for a massage, the CIA operatives who now face arrest on kidnapping charges in Germany would have remained safely in the shadows, according to German prosecutors.

German investigators said they received detailed records of the intelligence agents' stopovers on the Spanish island of Palma de Mallorca from Spanish police last year. The documents, which included the operatives' passport numbers, hotel bills and aviation records, enabled prosecutors to identify a CIA abduction crew that allegedly kidnapped Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen, in a bungled counterterrorism operation in early 2004.

On Wednesday, prosecutors in Munich announced that a German court had issued arrest warrants for 13 people it named as CIA operatives involved in the Masri kidnapping. While most of the people used aliases and their true identities remain unclear, German authorities said the Spanish records provided a critical break and kept the investigation alive.

"It made it possible for us to identify specific individuals and to connect them with the kidnapping case," said Christian Schmidt-Sommerfeld, the chief Munich prosecutor, in a statement disclosing the warrants. "This information as well as other investigative evidence now leads to the grounds of suspicion against these 13 distinctly identifiable individuals."

It's not the first time that CIA officers have left a long trail of clues during an undercover counterterrorism operation in Europe. Italian prosecutors charged 25 CIA operatives and a U.S. Air Force officer with kidnapping a radical cleric in Milan in 2003 after investigators traced their cellphone logs and frequent-flier records. They also found that the operatives had racked up more than $150,000 in expenses while in Italy, including long stays at $500-a-night hotels.

Records of the other team's stopovers at Palma de Mallorca were gathered by the Guardia Civil, a Spanish police agency that has investigated the CIA's use of the island as a staging ground for other counterterrorism operations in Europe and North Africa. Some of the records were provided to The Washington Post by Human Rights Watch, a New York-based advocacy group that has investigated extralegal abductions by CIA counterterrorism squads.

A CIA spokesman at headquarters in Langley, Va., declined comment for this article.

Aviation records show that the CIA operatives arrived at Palma de Mallorca at 10 p.m. Jan. 22, 2004, from Algiers. They spent the night at the Marriott Son Antem Golf Resort and Spa, paying $175 each for a room, including breakfast. One male member of the team, who stayed in Room 216, was billed for $85 worth of massages and a $23 bar tab. He and the others paid with their Visa cards.

The next day, the CIA crew departed in a privately chartered Boeing 737 for Skopje, Macedonia, where Masri had been detained secretly for three weeks by Macedonian security agents on suspicion of involvement with a terrorist network, according to German prosecutors. The plane stayed on the ground for less than six hours before departing with Masri on board, heading first to Baghdad and then to Kabul.

Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, said he was kept in a secret CIA prison that was known as the Salt Pit and interrogated about Islamic radicals in Germany before his captors realized they had the wrong man. He said he was flown back to the Balkans five months later, released on a hillside in Albania and warned to keep his mouth shut.

After delivering him to Afghanistan, the CIA operatives flew back to Palma de Mallorca after a brief stopover in Romania, aviation records show. The team spent three more nights on the Spanish island before returning to Washington. For the flight home, they ordered a shrimp cocktail for the pilot and two bottles of Pesquera red wine, according to invoices from the ground services crew at the Palma airport.

John Sifton, a senior researcher on counterterrorism for Human Rights Watch, said the operatives may have taken a carefree approach because they assumed they were being protected by European intelligence partners. Masri, for instance, was handed over to the CIA by Macedonian security agents. And in the Milan kidnapping case, top officials with the Italian military intelligence agency known as Sismi have been charged with conspiring with the CIA.

"I suppose they never expected there would be a flap about all this or else they would have been more cautious," Sifton said. "When you think a local government is cooperating with you in your criminal activities, you're probably less careful."

U.S. officials have never publicly admitted guilt or responsibility in the Masri case, and the U.S. Justice Department has refused to cooperate with requests for information from German prosecutors.

Masri sued the CIA for damages in U.S. District Court in Virginia. His complaint was dismissed in May on grounds that the lawsuit could generate revelations that would damage national security. Masri is appealing. His attorneys said the recent revelations from Europe show that the secrecy concerns are moot.

"It renders even more far-fetched the argument that every single development in this case is a state secret," said Ben Wizner, an ACLU lawyer who is representing Masri in his lawsuit.

Staff researcher Julie Tate in Washington contributed to this report.

Neighbors Of British Terror Suspects Skeptical Of Charges (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

BIRMINGHAM, England, Feb. 1 — Many residents in the area where nine people were arrested and accused of planning to kidnap, torture and behead a British Muslim soldier said Thursday that they were unconvinced of the accusations against them.

By most neighborhood accounts, for example, one suspect, Amjad Mahmood, is a father of two in his late 20s who has worked tirelessly to keep his father's grocery business going and who has shown no discernible interest in Islamic affairs.

He is cleanshaven, wears jeans and, like some young men in the Alum Rock section of this diverse city, seems more secular than religious, people who know him said. He rarely attended the mosque a block away from his house, they said.

For those reasons, and because of recent instances of the British police arresting suspects and then releasing them for lack of evidence linking them to terrorism, people here said they were not convinced of the accusations against Mr. Mahmood and the other eight suspects. The public and startling nature of the arrests in predawn raids made them angry and dismayed, they said.

In what the British authorities called a joint operation by the security service MI5, a newly formed West Midlands counterterrorism team and West Midlands police, the nine men were arrested in raids in poor, mainly South Asian neighborhoods of Birmingham, Britain's second-largest city, with one million people.

Pakistanis, Bangladeshis, Kashmiris and, recently, Somalis dominate the areas where the men were arrested. Birmingham, where a central area of recent urban redevelopment contrasts with the poor ethnic areas, is 14.3 percent Muslim, seventh highest among areas measured in Britain, according to the Office of National Statistics.

The neighborhoods of Sparkhill and Alum Rock are lined with often run-down but still neat Victorian-era two-story row houses that show pride with limited means. Some boast carved stone lintels, and many are decorated with lace-trimmed white curtains in their front windows.

The police shut and searched the Maktabah al-Ansar Islamic bookstore, a purveyor of radical Islamic books and tapes. They also closed the Blades Cyber Cafe and the Khan General Store. The police did not release the names of those arrested. Newspaper reports here described one of the suspects as the owner of a pizza shop.

A neighbor of Mr. Mahmood's said it was possible that Mr. Mahmood, whose father came to Britain from Pakistan, became the "victim of a bunch of bad lads."

"He had quite a few Arab friends, that's the only thing, looking back on it," said the neighbor, Amad Altaf, 30, a university student.

There seemed to be surprise in the neighborhoods that the supposed plot involved killing a British Muslim soldier. Indeed, a British Muslim soldier, Lance Cpl. Jabron Hashmi, 24, was killed in fighting against the Taliban in Afghanistan last year. Since the arrests, British television has shown pictures of a Lance Corporal Hashmi, and some newspaper reports said a commemoration of his death was held last week.

About 330 Muslims serve among the 180,000 members of the British armed forces. In an effort to increase the proportion, the army has held recruitment drives in recent years in South Asian neighborhoods, though to little effect, people here said.

Under British terrorism laws, police can detain suspects for up to 28 days without bringing formal charges.

Mohammad Khan, a friend of one of the suspects who is a lecturer in the department of education at the University of Birmingham, said that he had hired a lawyer for his friend and that the lawyer had visited the suspect in custody on Thursday. Mr. Khan declined to identify the suspect, saying only that he was "a very caring person" who had helped in antidrug programs.

Mr. Khan said the arrests put a spotlight on the lack of government services in the South Asian neighborhoods.

According to a survey by the Birmingham Voluntary Services Council, the Alum Rock and Sparkhill neighborhoods ranked highest on the "inequality index," Mr. Khan said.

The Sparkhill area where the Maktabah bookshop is located had the highest rate of unemployed university graduates in Birmingham, he said. That meant, he said, "You jump through all the hoops and you don't go anywhere."

The Labor government has poured money into religiously based community organizations since the terrorist bombings in July 2005 that killed 56 people, including 4 bombers, Mr. Kahn said. But the grants were unevenly distributed if the goal was to improve livelihoods in mainly poor and Muslim areas, he said. The grants went to 900 Christian groups, 400 interfaith groups and fewer than 300 Muslim organizations, he said.

"They fund according to old relationships," said Mr. Kahn, who was invited by the American Embassy in London to visit the United States last year as part of a State Department program on conflict resolution. "They need to encourage Muslim organizations that offer something other than representation."

More effort should be put into promoting scholarships for Muslim youth, and offering counseling services, he said. There were almost no youth centers in the areas, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0126107

A prototype of what can be done opened recently in the Sparkbrook neighborhood not far from Alum Rock: a gym for women run by women. Called Saheli Women's Group Gym — saheli means "best friend" in the Urdu language — the gym serves women who had nowhere to go outside their homes, said Naseem Akhtar, its founder. Many of the women who used the gym were conservative in their Islamic beliefs, wearing black robes and veils that showed only their eyes, she said.

Until the arrests on Wednesday, Birmingham had escaped the notoriety that has befallen a number of Muslim areas in Britain since the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States and the July 2005 bombing in London.

Last year, for example, in dramatic raids conducted by 250 policemen in the neighborhood of Forest Gate in East London, two Muslim men were arrested on suspicion of planning a terrorist attack. One was shot and had to be hospitalized. But both were released after no evidence was found to justify formal charges.

The chairman of the Birmingham Central Mosque, Mohammed Naseem, said the attention from the arrests was unwelcome because it was based on what he called the un-British notion of arresting people on the basis of suspicion.

But Dr. Naseem, 82, an outspoken critic of American foreign policy who confronted the American ambassador, Robert H. Tuttle, on Iraq during the ambassador's visit to the mosque last year, said he was concerned about "Muslim nationalism." This "Muslim nationalism" had developed among some of his constituents since 9/11 and was based "not on morality, but my nation right or wrong," he said. "That's the dangerous element, and we're trying to counteract it."

Bank Group Is Told To Halt Flow Of Data To U.S. Officials (NYT)

By Agence France-presse

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

BRUSSELS, Feb. 1 (Agence France-Presse) — The European Central Bank must take action by April to stop the transfer of personal information from Swift, the bank-data consortium, to American authorities for use in antiterrorism investigations, a regulatory agency said Thursday.

The agency, the European Data Protection Supervisor, told the bank to come up with measures "to make its payment operations fully compliant with data-protection legislation," urging it to "take appropriate measures as soon as possible."

Swift, the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, deals with trillions of dollars in global transactions daily between nearly 8,000 financial institutions in more than 200 countries.

It has come under scrutiny for taking part in an American program that allows analysts from the Central Intelligence Agency and other agencies to search for possible terrorist financing activity among the confidential financial transactions that Swift oversees.

The Bush administration has defended the once-secret program, which began after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States. But critics in Europe contend that it places American security interests ahead of European civil liberties.

Under European Union rules, information on money transfers can be used only for banking purposes and not for other uses, like combating terrorism.

No More Renditions (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

THERE ARE PLENTY of legal and moral reasons why the CIA shouldn't be snatching terrorism suspects off the streets of Europe and shipping them to unsavory countries to be tortured. But there is a simple, practical reason why the Bush administration should forthrightly repudiate its disastrous rendition policy: The United States cannot prevent terrorist attacks without help from its European allies, and they will be less inclined to cooperate when confronted with a policy they rightly believe to be beyond the pale.

After the disgrace of Abu Ghraib and the ongoing international furor over the indefinite detentions at Guantanamo Bay, the Bush administration cannot afford further self-inflicted damage to it's prestige. But this week, the bills for rendition came due when a German court issued arrest warrants for 13 Americans accused in the Keystone Kops kidnapping of a German citizen — the wrong man, as it turned out. Khaled Masri was imprisoned and abused in Afghanistan for five months before being released without charge.

In Italy, prosecutors are also reportedly seeking to indict 25 CIA operatives for kidnapping an Islamic cleric in Milan and sending him to Egypt for alleged torture. Sweden too has been burned by cooperating with U.S. renditions. In December 2001, it handed over to CIA operatives two asylum-seekers accused of terrorism. They were sent back to Egypt where, despite promises to Sweden that they would be properly treated, both also were allegedly tortured.

Continental opposition to U.S. foreign policy is hardly breaking news. But that doesn't mean in this case that the furious European electorates are wrong. Due process remains a fundamental Western value, and outrage about violations is a sign of democratic health, not political opportunism. It did not smooth matters that the White House initially denied that any such practices were being used.

DOJ_NMG_0126108

It's not as if the Bush administration can claim that renditions from Western Europe have produced life-saving intelligence. (We would have probably heard about the successes by now, if a plausible case could be made.) Even if they had, it's unlikely that the positive effects would outweigh the negative impact of having Washington's most important law enforcement allies — countries that have large Muslim populations known to periodically shelter and incubate terrorists — turn sour on collective policing and prevention efforts.

The administration needs to gain cooperation with local authorities before snatching suspects, ban the outsourcing of torture and keep its word to allied governments about the treatment of detainees. We damage the cause of fighting terrorism together when we don't respect European laws. There can be no more disappearances, no more renditions and no more Masris.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Intelligence Pick Says He'd Fight Manipulation (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's pick for director of national intelligence told senators Thursday that he'll blow the whistle on the president or any other official who tries to skew intelligence reports for political purposes.

"There have been a number of occasions in my career when I had to not be popular but to speak truth to power," J. Michael McConnell told the Senate Intelligence Committee at a hearing on his nomination.

"I've lived it, I've learned it, I believe it and I can only tell you that's what I'll do," he said.

McConnell's comments came as committee Democrats, including Ron Wyden of Oregon and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, repeated now-familiar charges that the Bush administration had "cherry picked" intelligence about threats posed by Iraq in 2003.

If confirmed, McConnell said, he would inform committee members if that occurs.

McConnell was nominated last month to replace John Negroponte as the overseer of all 16 federal agencies that collect or analyze intelligence. The 2-year-old position was created as part of changes recommended by a presidential commission that examined government failures that preceded the 9/11 attacks.

On other issues, McConnell promised to:

· Review security rules from the World War II and Cold War eras that make it difficult for intelligence agencies to hire foreign-language specialists whose families include non-citizens.

· Consider a first-of-its-kind audit of spending by individual agencies.

· Not use outside contractors in sensitive jobs such as interrogators.

· Support the committee's attempts to get documents that would test conclusions of intelligence agencies.

McConnell, 63, served 29 years as a Navy intelligence officer, including serving as intelligence officer to the Joint Chiefs of Staff during the 1991 Persian Gulf War. From 1992 until his retirement in 1996, McConnell directed the National Security Agency, which performs satellite spying as well as electronic surveillance.

Judge Explains His Dismissal Of Scientist's Suit Against Times (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — A federal judge who dismissed a defamation lawsuit against The New York Times acted after concluding that the scientist who brought the case, a bioterrorism expert investigated over deadly anthrax mailings in 2001, was a public official and could not show that the newspaper had knowingly published false information.

In an opinion released Thursday, the judge, Claude M. Hilton of the Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va., laid out the reasons for his order last month dismissing a long-running case brought by Steven J. Hatfill, a specialist in biological weapons. Dr. Hatfill's lawsuit said a series of columns by Nicholas D. Kristof about the anthrax mailings had defamed him.

Mark A. Grannis, a lawyer for Dr. Hatfill, said Judge Hilton's opinion was unsurprising and was not the last word in the case.

"The opinion is more or less what we expected, given the judge's earlier statements," Mr. Grannis said. "We will appeal, and we expect to prevail."

Mr. Kristof wrote about a government scientist whom he initially identified as Mr. Z, saying this scientist had become the overwhelming focus of the investigation into the anthrax attacks. Then, in August 2002, Mr. Kristof wrote that Dr. Hatfill, formerly with the Army bioweapons center at Fort Detrick, Md., had come forward to identify himself as Mr. Z and say the news media had treated him unfairly.

DOJ_NMG_0126109

Five people died in the anthrax attacks. Federal authorities identified Dr. Hatfill as a “person of interest” in the investigation but never charged him with any crime. The attacks remain unsolved.

Judge Hilton’s opinion, which was dated Tuesday, said Dr. Hatfill could be considered both a “public official” and a “public figure” and therefore would have to meet a higher burden of proof than would a private figure in order to prevail in a defamation suit. Under that higher burden, a public figure bringing suit must demonstrate that the writer acted with “actual malice” — that is, either knew that what he was writing was false or had “a high degree of awareness” that it probably was.

The judge said Dr. Hatfill was a public official because even after he left his formal government position, he continued to perform official functions as a federal contractor. At the time Mr. Kristof wrote about the case, Dr. Hatfill was receiving federal money to work on national defense programs, the judge said.

The opinion said Dr. Hatfill was also a public figure, holding himself out as an expert on bioterrorism and granting interviews to a variety of news organizations.

Judge Hilton described at length the government’s inquiry into the case and its focus on Dr. Hatfill. He disclosed that the F.B.I. had searched Dr. Hatfill’s car and a condominium owned by his girlfriend and had seized several items, including “notes regarding the anthrax mailings, a spinner flask of anthrax stimulant and a container of Cipro.” A spinner flask could be used to study the properties of anthrax, and Cipro is an antibiotic used to treat a variety of ailments, including anthrax poisoning.

Judge Explains Tossing Out Suit Against N.Y. Times (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

A series of New York Times columns that explored whether a former Army scientist was responsible for the 2001 anthrax attacks were "cautiously worded" and asserted that the scientist could be innocent, a federal judge wrote in explaining why he decided to dismiss a lawsuit against the paper.

Columnist Nicholas D. Kristof did not act with malice and did not believe his columns about Steven J. Hatfill were false, according to the opinion by U.S. District Judge Claude M. Hilton in Alexandria. Last month, Hilton said he would throw out -- for the second time -- the defamation suit Hatfill filed against the paper. An opinion explaining his reasoning was released Tuesday.

Although the columns identified Hatfill as a "likely culprit" in the deadly anthrax-spore mailings, Kristof "made efforts to avoid implicating his guilt," Hilton wrote. "Mr. Kristof reminded readers to assume plaintiff's innocence, and highlighted the fact that plaintiff was viewed by his family and friends as a patriot who could not have perpetrated the crime in question."

The opinion weighs heavily on the side of Kristof, who has been fighting the lawsuit that Hatfill filed in 2004. Hatfill accused the paper of defaming him and ruining his reputation in the columns. Authorities have identified Hatfill as a "person of interest" in the anthrax mailings that killed five people and sickened 17, but no one has been charged.

Kristof said last night that he was "really pleased that the judge recognized the importance of this kind of reporting" and called it "terrific to have a judgment that protects journalism at a time when the press has had a fair number of rulings against it."

The columnist said he was surprised at the "burden" of fighting a lawsuit. "There are just hundreds of hours that I've had to spend and vast amounts of money the Times has had to spend," he said.

Mark A. Grannis, an attorney for Hatfill, said the opinion "is more or less what we expected, given the judge's earlier statements." He said Hatfill will appeal and "expects to prevail."

Hilton's opinion recounted parts of the government's investigation of Hatfill and said FBI searches of his apartment, his car and a condominium owned by his girlfriend recovered among other things "a spinner flask of anthrax stimulant" and a container of Cipro, an antibiotic commonly prescribed for anthrax. Hatfill had previously said the Cipro was for a lingering sinus infection.

Another attorney for Hatfill, Thomas Connolly, said yesterday that the stimulant was "a pesticide that can be purchased at any hardware store in America" and that Hatfill used it to train first responders in identifying a biological agent like anthrax. Hatfill had provided briefings to government officials and law enforcement agencies about biological weapons.

In the 2002 columns, Kristof said the FBI had failed to aggressively pursue a scientist he first identified as "Mr. Z." He wrote that the biodefense community had called Mr. Z a "likely culprit," partly because the scientist was familiar with anthrax.

Kristof later acknowledged that Hatfill was Mr. Z and wrote that Hatfill deserved the "presumption of innocence."

Hilton first threw out the case in 2004, ruling that Kristof accurately reported that the scientist was a focus of the FBI probe.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit reinstated the suit in 2005 and said Kristof's columns could be read as blaming Hatfill for the attacks.

Homeland Security Moves To Increase Armed Pilots (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

Homeland Security officials are making changes to the armed-pilot program to encourage more of the nation's 90,000 captains and co-captains to participate.

Armed pilots will be issued badges to identify themselves, they will be allowed to carry their weapons on flights they are not piloting, and U.S. officials will seek to expand the program for overseas flights.

Conan Bruce, spokesman for the Federal Air Marshal Service, which now operates the armed-pilot program, said the changes are in response to a working group that has been meeting for months to address pilots' concerns.

"We recognize there is a need to carry a weapon on international flights, but we have to work it out with host countries; it's not up to us," Mr. Bruce said.

But David Mackett, director of the Airline Pilots Security Alliance, doesn't expect a quick fix for a program that has attracted less than 10 percent of pilots.

"Maybe at some point, we will protect a handful of international flights, but the public should not feel secure that it will happen any time soon," Mr. Mackett said.

"Changes are coming at a glacial pace, and there seems to be no sense of urgency. The terrorist clock is ticking, and we need to be doing this now, not a year from now."

Federal air marshals, who number about 2,000, say they are concerned the agency will cut back their numbers as a cost-saving measure and instead turn to pilots to protect the aircraft.

Mr. Bruce said such a proposal is "absolutely not" under consideration.

Pilots are "an enhancement, not a replacement, they have totally separately and unique jobs," he said.

However, such a suggestion is coming from Capitol Hill, said one source familiar with the proposal.

"It is being advocated they use resources that are already in place, and that's the pilots, and use air marshals on targeted, high-risk and threat flights rather than scattered throughout the system like they are now," the source said.

"The air marshals are too elite of a group to be used like security guards," the source said.

One burden lifted is the rule that pilots commuting or "deadheading" on a flight no longer must pack their weapon separately in a lock box in the cargo hold.

Mr. Bruce declined to specify the rule, citing security reasons.

Little Progress Seen For Poorest After Hurricane (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

ATLANTA, Feb. 1 — The recovery from Hurricane Katrina has stagnated for the poorest families displaced by the storm, a new study shows. Many still suffer from a significant loss of income, a higher-than-normal rate of chronic diseases like hypertension and an exponential rise in mental health problems among children.

The study, conducted in the Gulf Coast region of Mississippi a year after the storm by the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University and the Children's Health Fund, showed no improvement since a survey in Louisiana six months earlier.

Among the new study's findings are that more than a third of working families earning less than $20,000 a year before the storm have not regained their previous income level; almost twice as many families are dependent on public assistance; and diagnoses of depression and anxiety among children have increased fourfold.

School absenteeism remains high, with more than a third of children missing 10 or more days of class in April, May or June of 2006. Families with specific needs like food or household items found help far more easily than those who needed legal help, child care or mental health care.

Among adults, the rate of hypertension diagnoses increased by more than a third after the storm in August 2005, and more than 44 percent of parents or guardians tested "very low" on a basic mental health test. About 13 percent said they were coping "not very well or not at all" with the daily demands of parenting, significantly higher than the 1.5 percent who chose that answer in the 2003 National Survey of Children's Health, which the researchers used as a benchmark.

Nearly 40 percent of the respondents said they had been working before the storm but were now unemployed.

Dr. Irwin Redlener, the director of the National Center for Disaster Preparedness at the Mailman school and co-founder of the Children's Health Fund, said the survey results showed a lack of leadership in a relief effort marked by scattershot private efforts that resulted in an uneven distribution of help. For example, he said, the Children's Health Fund runs three mobile clinics, far from enough to meet the need.

"It's not a lack of money," Dr. Redlener said. "It's a lack of structure; it's a lack of distribution of the resources. We have a completely dysfunctional distribution system, and a great deal of bureaucracy."

The survey was conducted in face-to-face interviews with families living in private trailer parks, in Federal Emergency Management Agency trailer parks, or on their own property, usually in trailers provided by FEMA. The FEMA park residents, who are often isolated by lack of transportation, were the poorest and least financially stable, and the most likely to view their environment as dangerous.

"For all practical purposes, these FEMA trailer parks are in fact internal refugee camps," Dr. Redlener said. "Families are mired in these horrendous conditions with no sense of when this is going to be over, either in the minds of the families or in the officials responsible for them."

David Abramson, the study's principal investigator, identified what he called the "poverty penalty," pointing out that the working poor were far more likely to have lost income since the storm. More than half of those who made less than $10,000 a year in wages or salaries lost that income, compared with 15 percent of those who made $35,000 or more before the storm. Half of those living in FEMA trailer parks had a bank account, and 16 percent had a usable credit card, according to the study.

There were significant differences between the people studied in Mississippi and those in Louisiana. In the new study, 43 percent of the respondents were Mississippi natives, compared to more than 80 percent of the Louisianians. In the FEMA trailer sites in Mississippi, just under half those surveyed were black, compared with nearly 80 percent in Louisiana trailer parks.

Robin Hoods (commentary) (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Hurricane Katrina was ugly enough, but leave it to Gulf state politicians to guarantee that even a mild future hurricane may cause more human hardship. They're busy rewriting private insurance contracts in such a way that will raise property and casualty rates for everyone, especially if you live near the coast.

In Mississippi, Attorney General Jim Hood has bludgeoned insurer State Farm into a gigantic settlement over hundreds of dubious claims. His populist opportunism is matched by Florida, where legislators have passed a "reform" that forces insurers to lower their premiums and allows the state-run insurer to co-opt the local market.

Mr. Hood has been on a campaign to loot insurers from the first days after Katrina. His complaint is that it is "unconscionable" that insurers have refused to pay for flood damage. Never mind that their contracts specifically contain flood exclusions even as they pay tens of millions for wind damage. This water exclusion has been well known among homeowners and state regulators for years, which is why the federal government offers flood insurance. Mr. Hood nonetheless filed a civil suit and began a criminal probe.

The insurance industry has won a few of these legal skirmishes. But that changed last month when a judge told State Farm to pay a Mississippi couple a $232,000 claim and a jury awarded $2.5 million in punitive damages (since reduced by a judge to $1 million). State Farm is the nation's largest home insurer and has already paid $1.1 billion in Katrina claims in Mississippi alone. But the company looked at its hundreds of other pending suits, did the math, and threw itself on the mercy of Mr. Hood. State Farm agreed to re-open some 35,000 claims it had already settled and to pay at least $50 million more. The insurer also agreed to hand over $80 million to some 640 households represented by tort kingpin Dickie Scruggs.

The one bit of good news is that Federal Judge L.T. Senter Jr. blocked the settlement last week. The judge recognized the deal as an "arbitrary" publicity payout -- long on glory for Mr. Hood but short on the specifics of who would get money. The judge might also have wondered if Mr. Scruggs and his legal team were going to ride off with as much as $46 million.

The bad news is that the judge left the door open for a revised settlement, which is likely and would do unpleasant things to the state insurance market. Other insurers will feel pressure to follow State Farm's lead and pay the flood ransom. The obvious way to finance these unexpected claims will be to raise premiums for other policy holders, while refusing to sell policies in certain high-risk areas. Mr. Hood is basically stealing from future policy holders in order to pay off his current constituents.

As for Florida, insurers are understandably trying to build up their reserves against the likelihood of larger future payouts. Forecasters are predicting more frequent hurricanes for the state, which could mean hundreds of billions of dollars in claims. So premiums have been rising.

Florida legislators and new GOP Governor Charlie Crist have responded with one of the more un-Republican reforms on Florida's books. The measure mandates a reduction in homeowner premiums from private insurers by 5% to 25%, which means that companies are likely to be even less prepared to cover future damages. The legislation will also force insurers that write home and auto policies in other states to offer home insurance in Florida -- or be banned from the Sunshine State.

Another charming twist is that the new Florida law will allow the state-run Citizen's Property Insurance to begin competing with private insurers. This was done in the name of "competition," but it will have precisely the opposite effect. Citizens was designed as an insurer of last resort, but as a government company it will not have to worry about profits and other capitalist details. It will be able to offer lower prices because it has an implicit taxpayer guarantee, a la Fannie Mae. These arrangements typically end badly for the taxpayer, who in this case will be absorbing future hurricane risk without even realizing it.

DOJ_NMG_0126112

Some insurers have already responded to all this by cancelling policies. And Governor Crist this week issued an "emergency" order freezing premiums and barring cancellations. So not only is the state imposing price controls, it is forcing companies to do business. Where'd the Governor learn economics -- Caracas?

More Americans are choosing to live in places at risk for natural calamity, only to seek a bailout from politicians when the worst happens. This trend is bad enough. But politicians compound the problem when they make insurers the scapegoats for acts of God. The insurance industry has spent billions of dollars to assist the recovery after Katrina. Who's going to pay when the next storm hits?

Off Guard (WP)

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

AFTER DECADES of service, the Coast Guard's fleet of planes, helicopters and cutters is aging, just as the service is trying to recast its mission to emphasize demanding new anti-terrorism efforts. But the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general reported last week that, to date, a scheduled retooling of the Coast Guard fleet has hit more than a few expensive and time-consuming snags, including a slew of basic design errors in the service's new flagship vessel. A congressional roasting of Coast Guard chief Adm. Thad W. Allen followed this week, along with a number of stinging news reports.

Though some of it is overblown, the criticism is deserved. The Coast Guard is guilty of one of the classic errors that other federal agencies within and without the Department of Homeland Security make all the time: poor contract management, an alarmingly -- and unnecessarily -- large source of government waste.

The problem dates to a contract the Coast Guard signed in 2002 with government mega-contractors Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman to manage the fleet's upgrade project and build needed new craft. The centerpiece of the Coast Guard's brand-new force was to be the National Security Cutter, a 425-foot ship capable of operating far from the American shoreline. According to the inspector general, though, the plans for the cutter contained a series of design flaws that could lead to cracks in the hull or deck and require the early retirement of the vessels. On top of that, the contractors botched the $100 million retrofitting of eight smaller cutters, rendering those craft essentially useless to the Coast Guard.

Before an irate House oversight panel, Adm. Allen took responsibility for the performance of his contract managers and detailed needed reforms to the service's contracting process. That's a start. Beyond administrative shakeups, the big challenge will be keeping costs down and ensuring the quality of the rest of the work that the Coast Guard's contractors have to complete, including the repair of the two National Security Cutters already under construction and the eight smaller cutters that the Coast Guard had to suspend from service. After a year's time, the Coast Guard's retooling must be back on course or more drastic measures will be warranted.

WAR NEWS:

Senate Talks On Iraq Take A New Form (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — The shape of the Senate debate over President Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq came into clearer focus Thursday as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz) and two other senators introduced a resolution to support the buildup.

After weeks of back-and-forth negotiations over resolutions, it appears likely the Senate debate over the 4-year-old war will pit McCain's resolution of "full support" against one introduced by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) that "disagrees" with the president's proposal.

But how that debate is likely to turn out became even murkier Thursday as lawmakers continued to mull the details of the two lengthy resolutions.

Two Democratic senators who oppose Bush's plan broke with their leaders and said they would not back Warner's measure, which was designed to unify opponents of the troop buildup.

And Republicans wrestled with the sharp divisions in their ranks exposed by the looming war debate next week. "The debate in my caucus has been very passionate on both sides," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who has signed on to Warner's resolution. "Feelings are running high."

Seven GOP lawmakers have expressed support for Warner's resolution. Opponents of the buildup are trying to recruit seven or eight more Republicans to reach the 60 votes that would be needed to overcome a promised GOP filibuster.

DOJ_NMG_0126113

And pressure is mounting on undecided Republican senators, particularly moderates and those running for reelection in 2008.

Thursday afternoon, Sens. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) and George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who have criticized the troop buildup but have not endorsed any critical resolution, uncharacteristically rushed past reporters and into the Senate chamber.

Meanwhile, McCain and other senators escalated their attacks on the Warner measure and its supporters.

"Where is the intellectual honesty if you think that you're sending young Americans into harm's way in a futile effort?" McCain asked. "I know if I felt that way, I would say, 'My resolution is a binding resolution that cuts off funding.' That's the intellectually honest approach."

McCain, a former naval aviator who spent more than five years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, unveiled his alternative resolution Thursday afternoon with co-sponsors Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.). Lieberman still caucuses with the Democrats.

Warner's measure is nonbinding and urges the president to consider alternatives to sending more U.S. troops into Baghdad to halt the sectarian fighting.

Wednesday evening, Warner and his co-sponsors specifically added language opposing any funding cutoff, in an effort to woo more Republicans. So far, no additional GOP senators have joined him.

Democratic leaders, including Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin of Michigan, have lined up behind the Warner resolution.

On Thursday, Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), who had been pushing an alternative resolution with Levin that was more critical of the White House plan, abandoned their measure and backed Warner's.

Even Moveon.org, an antiwar grass-roots organization, praised the Senate's move toward a vote on the Warner resolution, saying, "This is an important first step toward Congress blocking the escalation and stopping the war."

But Democratic hopes of holding their caucus together behind the Warner resolution were dashed when Sens. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.) and Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) announced they would vote against the measure.

"The Warner-Levin legislation does not explicitly oppose the escalation, [and] it doesn't contemplate the phased redeployment from Iraq," Dodd said.

He and Feingold advocate immediate steps to start withdrawing U.S. forces from Iraq. Feingold proposed legislation Wednesday that would mandate a withdrawal from Iraq within six months after the bill is passed.

Other antiwar Democrats — including Sens. Barbara Boxer of California and Barack Obama of Illinois — said Thursday they were still reviewing the language in the eight-page Warner measure. California's other senator, Democrat Dianne Feinstein, said she would support it.

McCain and other GOP leaders meanwhile pushed forward with their drive to round up the undecided Republicans who could determine which resolution, if either, emerges from the Senate debate next week.

The McCain measure, which is also nonbinding, explicitly states that U.S. forces "should receive from Congress the full support necessary to carry out the United States mission in Iraq."

It does acknowledge past mistakes and lists 11 "benchmarks" for Iraqis, a nod to lawmakers who complain that the Bush administration is not demanding enough of the Iraqi government. These include deploying sufficient forces to help U.S. troops, disarming militias, spending more on reconstruction, and devising a plan to share oil profits between the nation's major sects.

The measure does not spell out any consequences should the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki fail to meet these goals. And it conspicuously does not set any timelines.

"The day you say, 'When you fail to do them by a date certain,' you might as well fold up the tent and go home because the enemy knows exactly what they have to do," Graham said.

Some senators and Middle East experts believe that without outlining specific consequences, the U.S. will never succeed in pushing Iraqi leaders to take the difficult political steps they have avoided for years.

But Senate Republican leaders have managed to prevent any new defections to the anti-buildup camp all week and were sounding defiant Thursday.

"I'm trying to get 60 votes for something other than Warner," said Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), the ebullient No. 2 leader in the caucus.

Bush Senate Allies To Seek Iraq Benchmarks (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Trying to stem defections over Iraq, President Bush's Senate allies want a vote next week calling on the Baghdad government to "make visible concrete progress" toward 11 political, military and economic benchmarks.

The resolution, announced at a hastily called press conference late yesterday, is designed to slow the momentum behind a tougher Iraq measure crafted by Sen. John Warner (R., Va.), the former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, the Connecticut independent who usually caucuses with Democrats, is among the sponsors, but the support comes overwhelmingly from Republicans led by Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.). As recently as Wednesday, Mr. McCain's office had expected no announcement of an alternative Iraq measure so soon. But with the Warner proposal becoming a serious threat, waiting until next week was no longer feasible. "We want to make sure that it's out there," Mr. McCain said.

The Senate floor debate, due to begin Monday, reflects broad discomfort in both parties over Mr. Bush's plan to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq by 21,500, chiefly to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad.

Army Gen. George Casey, the departing top commander in Iraq, told a Senate panel yesterday that he had initially requested about half that number before the president adopted a more ambitious approach. At the same time, a new report by the Congressional Budget Office says the number could be higher than 21,500 once additional support personnel are counted.

By the CBO's estimate, the full commitment could run as high as 35,000 troops, costing $9 billion to $20 billion, depending on whether the peak deployment lasts four months or 12 months. But the Pentagon and congressional staff familiar with the military's request disputed the CBO's analysis and said the 21,500 total included support staff to complement those already on the ground in Iraq.

Sen. McCain has criticized Gen. Casey, who is now being succeeded in Iraq by Gen. David Petraeus, for not being more aggressive in waging the war and seeking more U.S. troops. But his own resolution reflects the conflict that Gen. Casey described in his testimony: how to balance the U.S. military might with the need to prod the Iraqi forces to take more of the lead.

First among Mr. McCain's benchmarks is a major commitment of "new Iraqi security forces to partner" with the larger number of U.S. troops. Other requirements include "disarming individual militias as circumstances warrant," distributing oil resources and building an independent judiciary.

The resolution doesn't spell out what options the U.S. should pursue if Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki fails to meet the benchmarks. And a recent meeting in Baghdad between a House delegation and Iraqi officials including Mr. Maliki showed the limits of Congress's power to pressure the Iraqi government.

Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), chairman of the House Appropriations panel that oversees funding for Iraq, said he warned that unless more progress was made, Congress would be reluctant to fund new equipment for the Iraqi forces. Mr. Murtha and others in the delegation said the Iraqi reply was that the Maliki government would then secure it elsewhere. "I was stunned," Mr. Murtha said.

A handful of liberal Democrats, notably Sens. Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, announced their opposition to the Warner language yesterday as too weak in its opposition to the administration's policy. But at this stage, the Virginian has a strong chance of commanding a solid majority in the Senate; even among the Republicans reluctant to join him, there is little contentment with the direction of the war.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.), an ally of the White House, had surprised many this week when he said he was "considering" supporting the Warner language. Mr. Gregg said yesterday he had decided not to vote for the measure, concerned that the debate is more "a political exercise than a substantive exercise" and that he didn't want to be part of a public rebuke of the president. But Mr. Gregg said he continues to have "serious reservations" about the administration's policy.

Compromise Senate Measure Rebuffing Bush's Iraq Buildup Gathers Support (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — A revised Senate resolution criticizing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq drew new support Thursday as two authors of a sterner resolution of disapproval said they would accept the compromise, fashioned by Senator John W. Warner.

Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, and Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, said they would back Mr. Warner's alternative, which declares that "the Senate disagrees with the 'plan' to augment our forces by 21,500," calls on the president to consider other alternatives and urges him to limit the American role in countering sectarian violence.

"The bottom line of our resolutions is the same: Mr. President, don't send more Americans into the middle of civil war," said Mr. Biden, one of the authors of the initial resolution, which was approved last week by the Foreign Relations Committee, which he leads.

Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, was the third author of that plan, favored by the Democratic leadership; on Wednesday night he, too, agreed to support Mr. Warner, a Virginia Republican who has worked with Mr. Levin in the past on major military policy.

DOJ_NMG_0126115

But at least two Democrats, Senators Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, said they would oppose the new compromise, objecting to its symbolic nature and to wording they said could tie the hands of war critics on potential future votes over military spending. The Warner resolution says Congress should not reduce financing for troops in the field.

"I regret we are not doing something that has more bite to it," said Mr. Dodd, one of the 2008 presidential contenders in the Senate whose positions on the Iraq resolution will figure into their emerging campaign themes.

The shifting allegiances — and the intense procedural gamesmanship preceding votes next week on Iraq policy — left it uncertain whether Mr. Warner's compromise could attract the 60 votes needed to overcome procedural obstacles. Given the party divide in the Senate, it appeared that about a dozen Republicans would have to break from the president to allow the debate to move forward; he had only six Republicans firmly on board.

The Senate Republican leaders intend to mount vigorous resistance to any plan that rejects Mr. Bush's troop buildup and were contemplating their options on Thursday.

"The chessboard changed last night," said Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, the Republican whip. "We had them checkmated, but now everybody has to go back and look at the board."

The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said Mr. Bush "will continue to exercise his responsibilities as commander in chief" even if the Senate — with House action expected to follow — approved a resolution opposing the buildup. He reiterated the administration view that a clear split between Congress and the president on Iraq could embolden the nation's enemies.

"Osama bin Laden thought that a lack of American resolve was a key reason why he could inspire people to come after us on September 11th," he said. "I am not accusing members of the Senate of inviting carnage on the United States of America. I'm simply saying you think about what impact it may have."

With the framework of the Senate debate still being set, House Democrats pounced on a new Congressional Budget Office estimate that the addition of 20,000 combat troops could require an additional 15,000 to 28,000 related support troops to be deployed.

Representative Martin T. Meehan, a Massachusetts Democrat who was among lawmakers requesting the estimate, noted the numbers exceeded administration projections. He said the report "only confirms what we already know: the president has continually tried to hide the true costs of this war, both in terms of money spent and lives affected."

The first significant Senate vote on the Iraq resolution is scheduled to occur Monday evening, when supporters of Mr. Warner's proposal will seek Senate approval to open the debate — a request that could require 60 votes.

Democrats said they were hoping that they could muster that many votes or reach an agreement with Republicans on the terms of the debate, allowing it to get under way. Then lawmakers would be given a few days to lay out their views before a more crucial cloture vote, which would also require 60 votes, on limiting the debate and moving toward a final vote.

Many of the senators from both parties who represented potential swing votes on the Warner resolution said they would be reviewing it over the next few days before taking a stand. The latest draft includes 22 paragraphs of findings, 12 more expressing the "sense of the Congress" on the best options, and 2 requiring periodic progress reports.

Republicans were meeting privately on Friday at a policy retreat and the Iraq resolution was certain to be a major topic.

A few prominent Democrats quickly came out for the Warner plan, which was written with Senators Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, even as they expressed reservations.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York and a leading presidential contender, said that while she did not support all the provisions in the resolution, she would support it. "It makes the point, which is important," she said. "We're trying to get the attention of this president, to change course."

But the outcome remained unsettled. As Senator Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana walked from the closed-door meeting of fellow Democratic senators, she declared, "It's still not a done deal."

While some Democrats argued that the Iraq resolution was too accommodating to the administration and were weighing opposition, she disagreed. "It sends a very powerful signal to the president," she said.

Senate Prepares To Debate Opposition To Bush's Iraq Policy (MCT)

By Margaret Talev And Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Senate will begin formal debate Monday on legislation opposing President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq, but Democrats aren't sure that they've got the 60 votes they'll need to break Republican obstruction and move to a final vote.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and his leadership team said Thursday afternoon that they didn't have a firm vote count for the bipartisan resolution that the leadership has decided to support. It effectively declares no confidence in Bush's plan to send more U.S. troops to Baghdad and urges him to reconsider. They acknowledged that they could fall short because liberal Democrats consider the resolution too weak.

DOJ_NMG_0126116

Senate Democrats met behind closed doors Thursday afternoon as their leaders assured them that the nonbinding bipartisan resolution was only a first step and that stronger measures to bring the war to a close would follow.

"It's a first step," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., "and a second step is following very quickly afterward where we're going to try to do something binding."

The bipartisan resolution was developed by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., a respected centrist who's long been influential on military matters and is World War II veteran and a former Navy secretary. Democratic leaders chose to endorse his plan and drop a more critical version sponsored by Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del., and Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., because they feel it has a better chance of winning enough votes to break obstruction from Republicans who back Bush's plan.

Warner's resolution opposes Bush's 17,500 troop buildup for Baghdad but supports the 4,000 troop increase against Sunni Muslim insurgents and al-Qaida in Anbar province. It also declares that it would be wrong to cut off funding for troops in the field. Some Democrats oppose those last two provisions.

Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., said he opposes Warner's resolution, and he hasn't ruled out joining Republicans to block a final vote on it.

"I don't know why people, especially those who voted against this war in the first place, would at this terrible stage want to vote for something that essentially reauthorizes this action and even intensifies it in places like al Anbar province, where most of our people are dying," Feingold said. "That strikes me as an odd strategy for people who want to end the war."

Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., also said he opposes the resolution, but said he wouldn't vote to block it. Biden and Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said they could accept Warner's approach for now.

Some key Republicans said they hadn't made up their minds, and Senate Republican Whip Trent Lott of Mississippi said he thought he could rally enough opponents to sustain a filibuster. "I'm always working," he said.

Senate Republicans huddle in a retreat on Friday, when their leaders plan to pressure wavering members to stick behind Bush. The president will apply pressure, too, when he meets with Senate Republicans at the White House in the afternoon and entertains them and their wives at a reception.

Reid left open the possibility Thursday that he might bring in South Dakota Sen. Tim Johnson, who's recuperating from brain surgery, if Democrats need his vote to move the resolution forward.

"We'll have to see. He's doing very well," Reid said in a brief interview with McClatchy Newspapers.

But Johnson's chief of staff said later that while the senator is making good progress, he physically wouldn't be able to return to the Senate to cast a vote by next week.

While Reid stressed that there was no firm plan to try to get Johnson to the Senate to vote, the fact that he was willing to consider it demonstrates how fluid the parliamentary situation remains.

Most Senate Democrats are backing the Warner approach as their best bet to build a large bipartisan majority behind a no-confidence vote in Bush's plan. They got potentially important grass-roots support Thursday when the anti-war group Moveon.org issued a statement calling the Warner plan an "important first step" toward stopping the war.

The group also assured liberal lawmakers who were on the fence that "the compromise language would not constrain the Congress from using all of its powers to stop the escalation and force President Bush to implement an exit plan."

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., who opposes a troop buildup, joked that Moveon's position was making him second-guess his own inclination to back Warner. He said of many Democrats: "I think they're just so intent on criticizing the president that they probably see this as a vehicle. That's unfortunate."

Meanwhile, some lawmakers continued to propose other resolutions, although none appeared to have as much support as Warner's does.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn., joined with Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina to introduce a resolution that supports Bush but also tells the Iraqi government that it must meet performance benchmarks for the United States to continue its engagement long term.

Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., chairman of the Appropriations Committee, said he'll introduce a resolution that proposes to end the 2002 congressional authorization for the war.

Senate Democrats Split On Measure Opposing Bush (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Senate Democratic leaders who decided to back a Republican resolution against President Bush's Iraq war plan in hopes of winning broad bipartisan support ran into stiff resistance yesterday from an unexpected quarter -- fellow Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0126117

The Democratic dust-up came on a day when opponents of the president's policies received some unexpected ammunition. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office reported that Bush's plan to deploy roughly 20,000 additional U.S. combat troops to Iraq is likely to require at least 15,000 support personnel, and possibly as many as 28,000.

That could mean the plan would involve up to 48,000 troops and contractors, at a cost of between $9 billion and $13 billion for the first four months and up to $27 billion for the first year.

The compromise resolution states that the Senate disagrees with the president's plan and urges Bush to instead consider all other options for achieving his strategic goals.

Democratic defections would probably not prevent the legislation from passing the Senate, provided that the measure gets to a final vote over a threatened filibuster by Republicans. But defections would deprive Democratic leaders of a strong united vote against Bush's decision to boost troop levels in Iraq by 21,500.

Two Democratic senators, Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) and Russell Feingold (Wis.), came out forcefully against the compromise, saying the newly worded resolution goes too far toward GOP positions. Dodd called it "essentially an endorsement of the status quo" in Iraq, while Feingold denounced it as "a deal with the devil."

"This is the United States Senate. This is not some city council somewhere," Dodd said. "It seems to me sending something down that engages the president, that forces the administration to pay attention is something we ought to be considering."

Several other Democrats said they remain undecided; many of them are pushing binding legislation to cap troop levels, force a new vote to authorize the war or begin bringing troops home.

For days, two groups of senators had backed competing resolutions of opposition: a sharply worded version by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), and a more conciliatory resolution by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.). The stalemate was broken Wednesday night when Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) backed a revised version of Warner's resolution.

Democratic leaders noted that the compromise puts them in a far stronger position to defeat a Republican-led filibuster against the resolution when it is brought to a vote next week. The first showdown will come Monday afternoon, when the Senate will vote on whether to proceed to the debate. At least seven Republicans, and possibly more than 10, could back the compromise, worked out by Warner and Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.). If, as expected, Democratic opponents of the resolution side with their leaders to break a filibuster, the measure would have close to the necessary 60 votes, but it is not there yet.

If the Senate does break the filibuster, only to see half a dozen Democrats oppose the resolution, Democratic leaders could still pass the measure but would be deprived of the broad, bipartisan vote they want to send a clear signal to the White House.

Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who led the war effort in Iraq before being nominated as Army chief of staff, confirmed that the 21,500 troops in Bush's plan is not the total, as indicated in yesterday's CBO report. In written answers to the Senate Armed Services Committee, he said that "certain additional combat support and combat service support capabilities" would be required. They include "logistical enablers, intelligence assets, military police, and a command/control node," although the numbers would be "minimal."

Democrats said those answers directly contradict statements made by the current Army chief of staff just a week ago.

"The CBO report only confirms what we already know: The president has continually tried to hide the true costs of this war," said Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), chairman of the House Armed Services subcommittee on oversight and investigations.

Army and White House officials said they are reviewing the CBO report and have not yet determined the number of support personnel needed.

During a confirmation hearing yesterday, Warner pressed Casey on why he had asked for fewer than half the additional troops Bush now wants -- two combat brigades instead of five.

"I did not want to bring one more American soldier into Iraq than was necessary to accomplish the mission," Casey responded.

To opponents of the Senate resolution, such developments only bolstered their resolve to demand stronger action.

"A political victory is not more important than ending this war," Feingold said.

At issue are three clauses in a resolution that is now 11 pages long.

Of particular concern to some Democrats is a clause stating, "The Congress should not take any action that will endanger United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field." That provision was added to win GOP support. Levin said it would not prevent binding legislative action to stop further deployments.

DOJ_NMG_0126118

But some Democrats took offense at equating a cutoff of funds with the endangerment of troops and said it would bind their hands in the coming months.

They also objected to a call for continued "vigorous operations in Anbar province," where U.S. forces have been battling al-Qaeda-linked Sunni extremists.

Another phrase saying that the resolution "should not be interpreted as precipitating any immediate reduction in" present troop levels was seen by some as an endorsement of the status quo.

Majority In Senate Support 'Stay The Course' Resolution (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

A bipartisan majority in the Senate yesterday united behind a firm "stay the course" resolution on the war in Iraq, despite searing public criticism from both sides in Congress over President Bush's handling of the war.

The resolution is critical of the war's execution and condemns any effort by Mr. Bush to send reinforcements to the region. In the measure, the Senate also promises not to cut off funding for the increasingly unpopular war.

"Congress should not take any action that will endanger United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field, as such an action with respect to funding would undermine their safety or harm their effectiveness in pursuing their assigned missions," says the resolution, authored mainly by Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican.

Although backers say they are deeply dissatisfied with the execution of the war, the resolution says that the United States "should continue vigorous operations" in parts of Iraq and that early withdrawal "would present a threat to regional and world peace."

Sen. Russ Feingold, the Wisconsin Democrat who has always opposed the war, called the resolution weak and misguided.

"The resolution rejects redeploying U.S. troops and supports moving a misguided military strategy from one part of Iraq to another," he said. "The American people have rejected the president's Iraq strategy, and it's time for Congress to end our military involvement in this war."

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat, also said yesterday that he would oppose the resolution because it doesn't call for withdrawing the troops quickly enough.

"I strongly oppose the Warner-Levin legislation," said Mr. Dodd, who voted in 2002 in favor of the war. "It is essentially an endorsement of the status quo, an endorsement I simply cannot make in light of the dire circumstances in Iraq, and the need for meaningful action now."

Debate over the resolution angered some anti-war voters who were crucial to Democrats' victory in the November midterm elections.

"The whole reason so many of us worked for Democratic candidates was so that they would get a majority in Congress and bring the troops home," said Tina Richards, who described herself as a lifelong Republican from Missouri whose opposition to the Iraq war turned her into a Democrat. "They're in the majority now, but they won't bring the troops home."

She said her son is a Marine reservist who expects to be called up as part of Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

"It's pointless. These are nonbinding resolutions, and they won't do a thing to bring our troops home," Mrs. Richards said. "This is the definition of insanity; they're banging their heads against the wall and expecting a different result."

But the nonbinding resolution was embraced yesterday by several key members of both parties, including Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, and Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican. Both men, like Mr. Warner, voted in 2002 to go to war with Iraq. Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat who opposed the war, also signed on to the Warner resolution.

Although both sides agree that there is a majority of support to approve the resolution, there is far less certainty about whether it has the 60 votes needed to overcome any filibuster.

Approval of the resolution will have no real effect on war policy because it's nonbinding, said Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, adding that its criticism of the administration's policy serves only to undermine the war effort.

"We are not simply speaking to the president," Mr. Kyl said. "Everyone else in the world will get that message. ... Those are the words that will resonate around the world."

Is Iran Fighting Proxy War With U.S. In Iraq?; Interview With Howard Dean (CNN)

CNN THE SITUATION ROOM, February 2, 2007

THIS IS A RUSH TRANSCRIPT. THIS COPY MAY NOT BE IN ITS FINAL FORM AND MAY BE UPDATED.

DOJ_NMG_0126119

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: And to our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM and it's happening right now.

As bombs go off across Iraq, the top U.S. military commander, up for a promotion, gets a grilling about the violence he left behind.

Is Iran using Shiite militants to fight a proxy war with U.S. troops in Iraq?

CNN's Christiane Amanpour will tell us what they're saying in Tehran. That's where she is right now.

And Democrats divided -- first, Joe Biden's attack on rival presidential candidates. Now shocking allegations from female members of a Congressional Caucus. I'll talk with the Democratic National Committee chairman, Howard Dean, this hour.

I'm Wolf Blitzer.

You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Market shoppers and bus passengers blown up by bombs. Students and teachers shot dead.

As fresh violence ripped through Iraq today, the outgoing U.S. military commander there was in the hot seat up on Capitol Hill, where there's a debate on whether he should get the top job in the U.S. Army.

CNN's Michael Ware is in Baghdad.

Christiane Amanpour is in Tehran.

But let's turn to our senior Pentagon correspondent, Jamie McIntyre -- Jamie.

JAMIE MCINTYRE, CNN SENIOR PENTAGON CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, several senators say they have not yet made up their mind if they will vote for the confirmation of General George Casey to be the Army chief of staff. Among them, one of his sharpest critics, Senator John McCain.

(BEGIN VIDEO TAPE)

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN (R), ARIZONA: I question seriously the judgment was -- that was employed and your execution of your responsibilities in Iraq. And we have paid a very, very heavy price in American blood and treasure because of what is now agreed to by literally everyone is a failed policy.

MCINTYRE (voice-over): Casey's critics fault him for failing to adapt as the war took a turn for the worse and only asking for more troops in December, after President Bush ordered an overhaul of Iraq strategy.

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY, U.S. ARMY: I did not want to bring one more American soldier into Iraq than was necessary to accomplish the mission.

MCINTYRE: Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin pressed Casey on President Bush's comment that Iraq was headed to a slow failure until the president himself stepped in.

CASEY: I actually don't see it as slow failure. I actually see it as slow progress.

MCINTYRE: In fact, Casey says he still feels only two brigades of additional U.S. troops are needed in Iraq, not the five the president ultimately ordered. And he stubbornly defended his strategy.

CASEY: It may not have produced the results on the time lines that people expected or wanted, but I do believe that it has laid the foundation for our ultimate success in Iraq.

(END VIDEO TAPE)

MCINTYRE: General Casey does not appear to be headed for the unanimous endorsement that his replacement, General Petraeus, got from the U.S. Senate. But he may be confirmed.

Among people who said they would vote for him, last hour on your show, Wolf, Senator Carl Levin said he would vote for him even though he had made some mistakes, because he didn't hold him responsible for what he called the bigger policy mistakes of the Bush administration -- Wolf.

BLITZER: And Senator Levin is the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, so he has some sway.

Thank you, Jamie, for that.

Meanwhile, there's new word today that the troop increase in Iraq could cost $27 billion for a year long deployment. A Congressional Budget Office report says it could also mean thousands of support troops being sent, in addition to the roughly 21,000 combat troops called for in the Pentagon's deployment plan.

In Iraq today, two suicide bombers blew themselves up in a crowded market in the town of Hillah. That's south of Baghdad. Sixty-one people were killed, 150 others wounded. In Diyala Province, the U.S. military says Iraqi troops stopped a suicide truck bomber at the gates of an Iraqi Army compound. The driver was shot dead but the vehicle blew up, wounding 13 Iraqi soldiers.

Police imposed a strict curfew tonight in the southern province of Najaf, where a bloody battle this week pitted Iraqi and U.S. forces against hundreds of gunmen from what Iraqi officials described as a Messianic killer cult. We're now learning new details of that clash.

And joining us now in Baghdad, our correspondent, Michael Ware -- you know, we've seen this phone video now of these bodies from that battle in Najaf the other day. I know you're investigating -- Michael, what went on?

It's very confusing. The only thing we know for sure, there are a lot of dead people there.

What are you picking up?

MICHAEL WARE, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, what we do finally know is that on Sunday just gone, there was a major engagement, a major battle just north of the holy city of Najaf, south of the capital, Baghdad.

Now, according to the Iraqi government, at the center of this battle was this apocalyptic death cult. I mean, this group who believe that a messiah was among them and had returned.

The government claims that part of their plan, that this sect's intention was to enter the holy city and assassinate the Shia religious sect leadership. They believed that this was part of a prophecy.

Now, this is what the government says, and they say that this group of about 600 or 700 strong had taken land north of the holy city, dug entrenchments, gun positions. They had heavy weapons and that essentially they were approaching zero hour in their deadly plan and government forces intervened.

Beyond that, what we actually do know is that a battle did took place, that government forces did engage irregular forces north of the capital. We also know that Iraqi Army units with American advisers attached became involved. They were quickly enveloped. The American advisers called in two Apache helicopter gunships, one of which went down during the fight. As the battle raged throughout the evening, F- 16s were called in. A-10 and AC-130 gunships and aircraft were also called in. A Stryker unit and some infantry from the American forces, several hundred troops in total, were also brought in.

Now, according to U.S. officials, at the end of this blazing battle, there was at least 250 dead and they've hauled in 400 detainees or more so far.

Now, the Americans, however, are a little bit more cautious about just who they were fighting. Military intelligence -- military spokesmen described them as a Shia breakaway group.

Now, they're saying the jury is still out on whether it was actually this apocalyptic cult, although some officers refer to it as a David Koresh like organization, the American cult leader in Waco, Texas some years ago.

However, there's other stories, that this is a faction upon faction among the Shia militias; that this was a massacre of anti-Iranian forces; that this was a tribal dispute.

Basically, at the end of the day, Wolf, no one saw this battle. No one really knows how it began. And the facts are still emerging from the ruins of this engagement.

BLITZER: I know you'll stay on top of the story for us, as you always do.

Michael, thanks very much.

WARE: Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: And a stunning new report today says that on average, more than 1,000 Iraqis were displaced from their homes every day in 2006, since last February's bombing of a Shiite holy site in Samarra. The International Organization for Migration says more than 330,000 Iraqis have been displaced since that attack, which triggered an all out round of sectarian violence. And it's still raging in Iraq.

Iran today began celebrations -- anniversary celebrations, that is -- for its Islamic Revolutionary, which brought hard-line clerics to power a generation ago.

But is Iran exporting that revolution to neighboring Iraq by aiding Shiite militants?

And joining us now from Tehran is our chief international correspondent, Christiane Amanpour.

A rare opportunity for us to get insight -- what are they saying to you, Iranians, about these very serious U.S. allegations, Christiane, that the Iranians are helping foment this insurgency inside Iraq?

CHRISTIANE AMANPOUR, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, officially, they're not saying anything, except for veiled comments today on the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution to remain united against "U.S. conspiracies."

Unofficially, sources with very intimate knowledge of the government and government policy have told me that they are really surprised to hear these allegations, that they would not be overtly attacking or urging attacks against American soldiers there, that they want a stable Iraq because it's in their interests. And while they admit that they have a struggle with the United States over issues such as the nuclear issue and regional influence, that they wish they could work with the United States, as they did in Afghanistan, to resolve the situation inside Iraq.

BLITZER: The Americans insist that the Iranians are providing sophisticated equipment, including improvised explosive devices of a new generation, capable of penetrating the best U.S. armor.

Have you had a chance to ask them if they're providing this kind of equipment to Iraqis?

AMANPOUR: Yes, I have. I've asked them. And I've asked them, this is not new, these allegations. And I've asked them over the many times that I've been here and when I've met government officials.

And they always deny it. And their answer is always the same, that our interest is in a stable Iraq, that we want a democratic and free Iraqi government, which there is right now, the Shiite dominated Iraqi government, and that, yes, we would like "occupying forces out of Iraq," but once the conditions are set for them to leave Iraq. Because if not, they say, these sources, then Iraq will Iraq will be in an even bigger mess than it is right now.

DOJ_NMG_0126121

BLITZER: What about the Iranian nuclear program that the U.S. and others -- the Europeans -- suspect is designed to build a bomb? How does this tension, the current tension between the U.S. and Iran, play into that bigger issue of Iran and a potential nuclear bomb?

AMANPOUR: Well, it certainly does. And, of course, while the West and many in the media talk about a nuclear bomb, here they are insistent, as they always have been, that that is not what they're pursuing. And they always point to the IAEA, which said it does not have evidence to anything other than a nuclear program.

They said that they are going to be announcing some kind of new development in their nuclear program over the next 10 days. We don't know what this is or whether it will happen. But we do know that they're taking journalists to one of the facilities this weekend. Among those journalists will be me and a cameraman from CNN, Mark Phillips (ph).

So maybe we'll know a little bit more over the weekend.

BLITZER: Our chief international correspondent, Christiane Amanpour, inside Iran.

Christiane, we're going to stay in close touch with you.

And will the American people support the Bush administration if it decides to get tough with Iran?

Coming up, I'll speak about that and more with Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns. He's over at the State Department right now.

Jack Cafferty is in New York with The Cafferty File -- Jack.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN CORRESPONDENT: It doesn't get much better than that, you know? You've got Michael Ware in Baghdad. You've got Christiane Amanpour in Tehran. I mean I don't know why you'd want to watch anybody else for news about what's going on in the Middle East, do you?

BLITZER: No. I totally agree.

CAFFERTY: And it isn't in my nature to be sucking up to the management around here, but that's pretty good stuff.

BLITZER: Yes.

CAFFERTY: $75,000 a minute, Wolf -- that's even more than you make. That's how much money Exxon Mobil earned every minute of last year. The oil giant today reported the biggest annual profit ever for a U.S. corporation -- $39.5 billion.

The company topped its own past record of $36.1 billion back in 2005. That wasn't such a good year.

Keep in mind that last year oil prices did hit a record high of $77 a barrel. Gasoline hit $3 a gallon.

Now, then gas prices spiked, a lot of politicians were quick to start calling for a windfall profit tax on the oil companies. Some of them even suggested breaking up the biggest oil companies, like Exxon.

But the talk died down once gas fell back to closer to $2 a gallon.

Oil company executives insist that oil prices go through boom and bust cycles, so their profit margins are about average compared with other industries. They also say they need to keep their large profits and size in order to compete against big foreign oil companies.

So here's our question -- what's your reaction to Exxon energy $75,000 a minute every single minute for an entire year last year?

E-mail us at caffertyfile@cnn.com or go to cnn.com/caffertyfile.

BLITZER: That adds up pretty quickly.

CAFFERTY: Yes, it does.

BLITZER: We're talking billions and billions.

CAFFERTY: Oh, yes.

BLITZER: Thank you very much, Jack.

Up ahead, accusations rocking the Congressional Hispanic Caucus and pitting two California Democratic lawmakers against each other in an increasingly public feud.

Also, the controversy over presidential candidate Senator Joe Biden's remarks about his potential rival, Senator Barack Obama. I'll talk about it with the Democratic Party chairman, Howard Dean. And love and politics Italian style. We're going to show you how a marital spat wound up making headlines and captivating a country. You're going to want to see what's going on in Italy right now.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: New developments in the bomb scares that paralyzed parts of Boston yesterday. Two men have now been charged in what turned out be a promotion for a TV show on a network owned by CNN's parent company, Turner Broadcasting.

But the story took another strange twist in front of the TV cameras earlier today.

DOJ_NMG_0126122

Let's go to Boston.

CNN's Dan Lothian joining us with more on this -- Dan.

DAN LOTHIAN, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Hello, Wolf.

Well, the two men accused of placing those devices across the Boston area and causing a security scare were in court today. At their arraignment, they're facing some very serious charges. But afterward, they didn't appear to be taking it all very seriously.

(BEGIN VIDEO TAPE)

LOTHIAN (voice-over): Just released on $2,500 bail each, Sean Stevens and Peter Berdovsky hugged supporters then launched into an odd rant about haircuts and hairstyles.

PETER BERDOVSKY, DEFENDANT: For example, Afro, I think, comes kind of from the '70s. But then again, there's other styles, like the greased up hair, when they actually use grease.

LOTHIAN: Despite repeated attempts by reporters to get serious comments, the two men did not stray from their unusual performance.

SEAN STEVENS, DEFENDANT: I'm getting sort of more due to -- to get a haircut because it's getting in my bangs now.

LOTHIAN: Earlier, not guilty pleas were entered on charges of placing a hoax device and disorderly conduct. The two were conducting a marketing campaign for an ad agency hired by The Cartoon Network, which is owned by CNN's parent company, Turner Broadcasting.

It led to a massive bomb scare across the Boston area. Blinking electronic signs were found under bridges, highways and other locations.

JOHN GROSSMAN, MASSACHUSETTS ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL: It's clear that by placing a bomb like device where they did, the intent was to get that attention, at least initially, by causing fear, unrest, that there was a bomb located in this location. MICHAEL RICH, DEFENSE ATTORNEY: I don't think that anybody had -- had any intent to -- to raise fear, concern or alarm.

LOTHIAN: Outside the courthouse, supporters said authorities over reacted.

JAYSON PALM, SUPPORTER: They were just doing their jobs, really. This was part of an advertising campaign. They were getting paid to do this.

(END VIDEO TAPE)

LOTHIAN: I asked the defense attorney about the odd behavior of his clients. He said they were "performing." He went on to say that they're still getting over their shock of what has happened to them over the past 24 hours -- Wolf.

BLITZER: I don't think I've ever seen a news conference like that during my years covering these kinds of stories.

Have you, Dan?

LOTHIAN: I have not. It was quite bizarre. I didn't know what was happening when it was happening at the time. And even after viewing it, it was still shocking.

BLITZER: Yes. I was watching it on TV and I was saying whoa, whoa, these guys are something.

All right, Dan, thank you very much.

The Internet, by the way, played a very important role in uncovering the background of those light installations placed around Boston.

let's get some more details on this promotion gone wrong.

Our Internet reporter, Jacki Schechner, has that -- Jacki.

JACKI SCHECHNER, CNN INTERNET REPORTER: Wolf, these promotional ads weren't just all over Boston and cities around the country, but there were photos of them all over the Internet. It's something that some blogs picked up on yesterday.

We asked the Boston police whether they've got any tips from bloggers, and they said that their investigative unit was monitoring blogs.

We want to give you an example of what has been online. This is Todd Venderlin's photo he uploaded to Flicker.com. He took this photograph more than two weeks ago. And it shows right here that promotional ad underneath a bridge in South Boston. You can get a closer up look of it there. And then he took it down and you can see what it looks like on the under side.

There's also another woman named Riga Murthy (ph), who took this photograph and uploaded it on January 21st. She says that she thought, when she first saw it, it was part of a popular street game that somebody posted in the comments, that it was, in fact, a Mooninite from the "Aqua Teen Hunger Force" show on The Cartoon Network.

Now, these things are big fodder online now. They're up on eBay. You can bid on them. This one was a starting bid of $2,000. It's a guy named Jack who says he got it outside a bar in Philadelphia. He was a big fan of the show and was going to hang onto it, Wolf. But he says now he thinks he can make some money off of it.

BLITZER: Two grand, nothing to sneeze at.

Thanks very much for that, Jacki.

Coming up, intra-party warfare leading one California Democrat to quit the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. We're going to have details of an increasingly ugly feud.

Plus, my interview with the Democratic Party chairman, Howard Dean. I'll ask him about presidential candidate Joe Biden's controversial remarks about possible White House contender, Barack Obama, and more.

Stay with us. We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: The Senate has gone forward and raised the federal minimum wage.

Let's go to our Carol Costello.

She's got the latest details -- Carol.

CAROL COSTELLO, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Yes, we just got word a couple of minutes ago, Wolf.

It looks like we're moving closer to an increase in the minimum wage. The Senate just passed, by a vote of 94-3, a bill to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour. The Senate's legislation includes tax cuts for small businesses.

Now, before the bill goes to the president's desk, the differences between the House and Senate versions will have to be ironed out. That will happen in a conference committee. Of course, we'll be following that for you.

Infighting spread today in Gaza despite a three-day-old cease- fire. Hamas militants opened fire in a raid on the Fatah Preventive Security Building in the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahiya. Elsewhere, in central Gaza, Hamas gunmen ambushed a convoy purportedly carrying arms to Mahmoud Abbas' presidential guard. Fatah says the convoy was carrying humanitarian aid. Today's fighting left five dead and dozens injured. It violates a cease-fire which went into effect on Tuesday. More on that thwarted execution plot in Birmingham, England. British police say they're seeking further detention of nine people arrested in a series of raids yesterday. Under British law, police must apply with Magistrate's Court for permission to hold suspects up to 28 days before charging them. The detainees are suspected of plotting to kidnap a British Muslim soldier then torture and behead him. The soldier has not been named.

And British police are confirming that Prime Minister Tony Blair was recently questioned over allegations that his Labor Party tried to reward political donors with titles of nobility. It is the second time police have interviewed Mr. Blair about these allegations. They say he is not a suspect and cooperated fully. Four people, including Mr. Blair's senior political adviser, have been arrested in connection to this scandal.

That's a look at the headlines right now -- Wolf.

BLITZER: They've got scandals all over the world happening right now.

We're going to have another one in Italy.

That's coming up, as well.

Carol, thank you.

Also coming up, when it comes to Iran meddling the United States in Iraq, where is the evidence?

We're going to ask the undersecretary of state Nicholas Burns. He's standing by live.

Plus, my interview with the Democratic Party chairman, Howard Dean. We'll talk about politics, what's going on in the presidential race. That's coming up, as well.

Also, details of the feud that's unfolding right now among Democrats that's rocking the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. It's getting very ugly.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: To our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM, where new pictures and information are arriving all the time. Happening now, the former top U.S. military commander in Iraq grilled at his confirmation hearing by senators critical of the way he executed the troubled U.S. military mission in Iraq. General George Casey now up for Army chief of staff. He told the Armed Services Committee President Bush's troop increase will give commanders greater flexibility.

The Congressional Budget Office now says that increase could cost up to $27 billion over the next year. Also, sources telling CNN members of Congress will get a look at the latest National Intelligence Estimate tomorrow and that the so- called key judgment section will be made public. But the sources say the rest of the Estimate remains classified.

And scandal rocking San Francisco's city hall. Mayor Gavin Newsom admitting to an affair with the wife of his former reelection campaign manager. The man reportedly confronted Newsom and he then resigned. The mayor is apologizing, saying he's deeply sorry for what he calls a lapse of judgment.

I'm Wolf Blitzer. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

A storm is brewing on Capitol Hill within the Congressional Hispanic Caucus and it's getting ugly. Its leader is coming under growing fire from within the ranks.

DOJ_NMG_0126124

CNN's Brian Todd is standing by with all the details -- Brian.

BRIAN TODD, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, until recently, Congressman Joe Baca was not well known, even in this town. Now, he is under extreme pressure and may not be able to hold his fractious group of legislators together.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

TODD (voice over): The leader of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus now under heavy fire, accused of not treating the six women in that group fairly. Congresswoman Loretta Sanchez, who just resigned from the caucus, goes further, telling the online publication politico.com that some months ago, caucus chairman Joe Baca told a California politician she was a whore.

Sanchez would not speak to CNN. Her office issuing a statement saying she resigned because of her "... strong opposition to Mr. Baca's chairmanship..."

"The Politico" reporter who interviewed Sanchez says she confronted Baca late last year about the remark.

JOSEPHINE HEARN, POLITICO.COM: This was a closed-door meeting. There were no staff there. It was just members of Congress. And in that meeting he denied having ever made the remark. But quite an argument ensued, as I understand it.

TODD: We couldn't reach Joe Baca directly for comment, but a statement from his office calls Sanchez's accusation "...baseless..." and "... categorically untrue..."

CNN has tried to confirm this account first hand. Congressional observers and Hill staffers tell CNN there have long been tensions in the caucus over the perception that Baca gives more favorable treatment to the men in the group.

Today, Congresswoman Hilda Solis from California gave a statement to CNN saying she shares Loretta Sanchez' sentiment about "... the lack of respect afforded to women members of the Hispanic Caucus."

CNN asked the Democratic Party leader about this upheaval.

HOWARD DEAN, DNC CHAIRMAN: This is something that we have made some calls back and forth into the caucus on. They will resolve it. They have good leadership.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

TODD: We repeatedly called and e-mailed Joe Baca's office for response to those broader accusations that women are not accorded equal treatment in his caucus. As of now, we have not heard back -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right. Thank you very much, Brian, for that.

And the race is clearly on for the White House. Democrats are already jockeying for power. But is the party threatened by some new splits among those powerful personalities?

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And joining us now, the chairman of the Democratic Party, Governor Howard Dean.

Governor, thanks very much for coming in.

DEAN: My pleasure. Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: It looks like you have got some division -- this is not a surprise -- among Democrats, but let's go through some of them and as chairman, see what you have to say.

First of all, Joe Biden. He had some really blunt comments about fellow Democrats, presidential candidates. First of all, going back, he said of Al Gore and John Kerry, he said, "Democrats nominated the perfect blow-dried candidates in 2000 and 2004... and they couldn't connect."

Now, on John Edwards, he's saying, "I don't think John Edwards knows what the heck he's talking about."

Also some disparaging remarks about Senator Clinton. And, as you know, listen to what he said about Barack Obama.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. JOSEPH BIDEN (D), DELAWARE: I mean, you got the fist mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy... I mean, that's a storybook, man."

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: What do you make of this?

DEAN: Well, you know, as you well know, Wolf, there are going be a thousand comments of this kind that are controversial and so forth as we go forward. I'm not going to make a practice of commenting on them.

In this particular case, the principals have talked about it, they have resolved their differences. And so I'm not going to get into it at all.

I'm going to be the referee. We're going to have a fair process. The only time I'm going to get into it is if I think things are going on that are really unfair and below the belt. But the media is going to sort this one, and the principals have already talked, Senator Obama and Senator Biden. So there's no need -- no need for me to get involved.

BLITZER: Well, at what point thought do you make a phone call or do you call Senator Biden, for example, and say, "Joe, maybe you should cut back a little bit on the rhetoric"?

DEAN: You know, I think there's been a lot of people probably giving him that advice publicly. And he certainly doesn't need to hear it from me publicly or privately.

Again, my job is to be the referee. I have to be very careful in this campaign. I want the DNC to be the place where every single candidate can feel they can come to, if they feel something else needs to be done differently and they're going to get a fair hearing.

And so you won't hear me commenting about who's the front-runner and who isn't and who said what last week and who said what yesterday and all that kind of stuff. I'm just not going to do that kind of public analysis.

BLITZER: Because your job is to get Democrats elected, Democrats locally, statewide and in the White House.

DEAN: That's right.

BLITZER: And if you have Democrats fighting each other, that's going to make your job a lot more difficult.

DEAN: Well, there's difference between controversial comments that get resolved in a couple of days and really serious stuff. And I'm going the save my comments and interventions for the really serious stuff that isn't going to get resolved between the principals. If the principals can resolve this stuff on their own, they certainly don't need me to help, and I'm going to be -- look, we had great year in 2006.

We've got all the momentum on our side. This presidential Iraq policy is about to be disavowed by the majority of the Senate, including Republicans.

This presidential race is something that we ought to win. We've kept our promises. I think Speaker Pelosi and Leader Reid have done a great job. You know, when was the last time you can remember that people made six promises before they got elected and they kept them on time?

I think it's a great record. And I think we ought to focus -- I want to focus on the positive things the Democrats are doing.

BLITZER: What about the split that the Democrats in the Senate are having now in whether or not they should go along with a modified, a watered-down. symbolic resolution complaining about the extra troops going to the Iraq? You've got Levin and Biden on one side, you've got Russ Feingold on another side saying use the power of the purse.

This another problem you potentially have to get involved in.

DEAN: No, this is not a problem. The Democrats, in fact, are not split. And the resolution is not watered down. They changed a few words.

I think this s a very smart move on the part of Harry Reid. If we can get significant numbers of Republicans to repudiate the Republican president's policy, which is about to happen, then I think that's very, very positive.

Look, we're doing what Americans elected us to do. The American people do not believe we belong in Iraq. The president is going in exactly the opposite direction that the American people asked him to go to. It's not a surprise to me that any United States senator, Republican or Democrat, might want to listen to their constituents before they listen to a president who's taking us in the wrong direction, despite what the American people voted for.

So, I think you're going to see a unified vote. I think you're going to see unified Democrats.

The question will be, which I'm not going to go into and speculate about, but the question will be, what happens when the House and the Senate disavow the president's wrong-headed actions in Iraq, ask him not to do it, and he does it anyway? Then I think you're going to see more discussions about what the alternatives are in addition to this.

But this is first step, it's the right step. Again, I think both Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid are doing exactly the right thing on the right timetable, and I think you're going to see overwhelming Democratic support for these resolutions condemning the president's actions in Iraq to escalate the war.

BLITZER: One final quick question. Al Gore, he supported you back in 2004 when you were running for president. Now he's expected to win an Oscar. He's being nominated for a Nobel prize. Should he get back into this presidential race?

DEAN: Again, I'm not going to get into that, but I certainly think he deserves the Oscar and Nobel Prize.

Look, this guy, who is a good friend, a wonderful friend, a courageous friend, has done more to affect public policy than anybody I can think of in the last few years. Al Gore and the people who helped him make that movie -- and it wasn't just Al, but it was others -- have -- have totally changed the way Americans look at global warming.

The president of the United States has tried to pretend that global warming hasn't existed for six years. He has bullied scientists who are concerned about this, as has his administration. And because of the efforts led by Al Gore, we are really doing -- dealing with the issue that may be the most important issue to face this planet as long as humankind has existed on it.

So I think he deserves whatever awards he gets for doing that.

BLITZER: Governor Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic Party.

Thanks very much.

DEAN: Thanks for having me on.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And still ahead, Italians they're spellbound by a very public airing of lover's quarrel involving one of the country's most powerful couples. We're going to have the report from Rome.

But first, the Bush administration leveling some very serious allegations at Iran. Does the administration have the credibility right now to convince the American people it knows the real story?

We're going to be joined here in THE SITUATION ROOM by one of American's top diplomats. Nick Burns, he's standing by live at the State Department.

We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: We're getting word now, a statement the president has just issued in connection with the Senate going ahead and passing a federal minimum wage increase. The House did that a couple weeks ago.

"Today, the Senate has passed significant legislation," the president's statement says, "that will benefit America's workers and small businesses. By working in a bipartisan way to match a minimum wage increase with tax relief for small businesses, the Senate has taken a step toward helping maintain a strong and dynamic labor market and promoting continued economic growth. I strongly encourage the House to support this combined minimum wage increase and small business tax relief."

As you know, the House version -- House version did not contain the tax credits for small businesses. The House and Senate versions are going to have to be reconciled in what's called a conference committee before it goes to the president for signature.

The Bush administration has been blasting Iran for aiding Shiite militants in Iraq and for a nuclear program that U.S. officials maintain is aimed at building a bomb. If the administration decides to get tough with Iran, what would it make the case to the American people with given the experience in Iraq?

Joining us now, the undersecretary of state, Nicholas Burns.

Mr. Secretary, thanks very much for coming in.

NICHOLAS BURNS, UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE: Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: What evidence do you have, for example, that the Iranians are involved in killing American troops in Iraq?

BURNS: Well, Wolf, I think there's incontrovertible evidence that the Iranians have been giving very sophisticated explosive technology to Shia insurgent groups for the better part of the last year and half. Those groups have used that technology, some of which is armor-piercing -- to attack American soldiers and British soldiers and to kill them. It's a very, very serious development.

Now, we have warned the Iranian government in past about this. We had not received an adequate response from them. And you have seen now President Bush, over the several weeks, having decided that we will detain those military and intelligence officials in Iraq who are responsible for this.

Obviously, we wish Iran to cease and desist. Iran is not playing the type of role that most other countries are in Iraq.

Most countries like the United States want to see Iraq stayed together as unitary state. They want to see the problems between the Shia and the Sunni be resolved. But Iran seems to be stoking those problems, igniting them.

And so that's the basic -- that's the basic allegation that we're making against the Iranians. And we hope they're going to have a change of mind.

BLITZER: And the State Department, I take it, is putting together a dossier, a full report that will be declassified and made public going through your arguments, your evidence? Is that right?

BURNS: Well, obviously, we have been making the case for the last several weeks and will continue to make the case to the American people and to the international public that this is a problem. There really is no doubt about it.

You saw an interview, an extraordinary interview, when the ambassador of Iran in Iraq admitted that there are Iranian security operatives on the soil. Now, here's difference between the U.S. and Iran, Wolf. The United States military forces are there under U.N. authorization. Iran has no right and no authorization to have its military operatives or its intelligence on the soil of Iraq.

BLITZER: Although yesterday we heard -- we heard Nouri al- Maliki, the prime minister of Iraq, yesterday in an interview with our own Michael Ware, basically equate Iran and the United States, saying he wants both of them to fight what he called their proxy out of Iraq.

BURNS: Well, you know, I think, Wolf, there's no question that the Iraqi government has to maintain relations with the Iranian government because they're neighbors. We would just hope that the Iranians would choose to have a positive influence and not a negative influence. And right now they're exercising a very negative influence.

BLITZER: Your former boss, the former secretary of state, Madeleine Albright, was here in THE SITUATION ROOM yesterday. You're a career diplomat. You've served for many years over at the State Department. She says the administration has a credibility problem right now on Iran, the evidence you say you have on Iran, because of the failures of intelligence that now have been evident involving Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0126127

Listen to what she said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MADELEINE ALBRIGHT, FMR. SECRETARY OF STATE: Because of the decision failures leading to the war in Iraq. And basically, that we were told a variety of things and something else was going on. Now, there may be all the terrible things going on in Iran that we are being told by the administration, but who is to say?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: You acknowledge you have this serious problem of credibility?

BURNS: Well, Wolf, I respectfully disagree. I have been working on this problem of Iran's nuclear ambitions for the better part of two years. We now have a united coalition, the United States, China, Russian, the European countries, supported by India and Brazil and Egypt. All of us believe that Iran's nuclear research program and its plant at Natanz is intended to give Iran in several years a nuclear weapons capability.

There is no doubt about that in the international community. And there are no states, with the possible exception of Syria and Cuba and Venezuela, that believe that Iran's nuclear research program is benign.

And so, we're not in a situation that is analogous to what we were in in 2002 and '03 in Iraq, when there was a great international debate about the issue of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. There is unanimity across the world that Iran should not have a nuclear weapons capability, that it is trying to create one, and that the goal of our international effort should be to stop them from doing so.

You've seen us pass a Security Council resolution just before Christmas. There will be another Council resolution passed in February and March unless Iran agrees to negotiate with us, and that's what we're trying to do, Wolf. We're trying to negotiate this with Iran. BLITZER: So, bottom line -- bottom line, it's diplomatic and economic pressure. You're not planning on going to war against Iran, at least not now, is that right?

BURNS: Wolf, we are on a diplomatic track. We believe that diplomacy can succeed. And we don't believe that a military conflict is inevitable or even likely.

The fact is that the United States is protecting its interests by detaining those Iranian paramilitary officials in Iraq because they're attacking our soldiers. And we're protecting our interests in the Gulf by deploying our carrier battle groups.

We have been in the Gulf since 1949. And we have an historic responsibility to protect the security of the Gulf Arab states.

So we're not acting in a provocative way. We're actually acting for stability and for peace in the region. We have to ask Iran now to adjust its policies and to be willing to meet us at the negotiating table on the nuclear issue. They have turned us down on that issue, Wolf, as you know.

BLITZER: Nick Burns, the undersecretary of state.

Mr. Secretary, thanks for coming in.

BURNS: Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: And Lou Dobbs is getting ready for his program that begins in a few minutes, right at the top of the hour. He's going to tell us what he's working on -- Lou.

LOU DOBBS, HOST, "LOU DOBBS TONIGHT": Wolf, thank you.

Coming up at 6:00 p.m. Eastern here on CNN tonight, we're going to be telling you about the pro-illegal alien open-border lobby. They're using shocking language, even by their standards, now to blast our federal agents trying to enforce U.S. immigration laws.

They're using words such as "terror" and "ethnic cleansing." And what is the president and the federal government saying in response? Nothing.

We'll have that special report.

Also tonight, troubling concerns that radical Islamist terrorists may be using Venezuela as a base for attacks against the United States, with the full support of Venezuela's president, Hugo Chavez.

We'll have that report tonight.

And House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, she apparently believes she has the right to use a military aircraft at taxpayer expense to fly herself, members of her family, other lawmakers in California, all around the country. We'll have that report.

And we'll also be examining the rising Iranian nuclear terrorist threat to this country.

And Terry McAuliffe, the Democratic strategist leading Hillary Clinton's presidential election campaign is among our guests.

We hope you'll join us at the top of the hour here on CNN.

Wolf, back to you.

BLITZER: Did you think the undersecretary of state made a good case as far a Iran is concerned?

DOBBS: I don't -- at this point, I thought it was interesting, your discussion about credibility. I think that it's time for a lot of discussion about the U.S. policy in the Middle East, period. And there's very high bar, I think -- I think -- I'm hardly alone in feeling this way -- but a very high bar for this administration to reach in putting forth evidence that would require a direct action against Iran, either diplomatically or militarily, beyond the sanctions that are already in place by the United Nations.

BLITZER: Lou's coming up in 10 minutes.

We'll be watching.

Thanks, Lou.

DOBBS: You bet. Thanks, Wolf.

BLITZER: And still ahead here in THE SITUATION ROOM, a rising star in the Democratic Party admits to a personal lapse of judgment. Much more on that during our 7:00 p.m. Eastern hour here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

And in Italy, a very public couple has a very public spat. We're going to tell you what's happening in Rome right now. You're going to want to see this.

We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Let's check in with Jack Cafferty in New York -- Jack.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN ANCHOR: ExxonMobil reported the biggest annual profit ever for a U.S. corporation -- $39.5 billion last year. So we asked: What's your reaction to Exxon earning $75,000 a minute for the whole year?" That's -- if you do the math, that's what it comes out to.

Arlene in Folsom, California, "My reaction to big oil making those gigantic profits happen last year when they made so much dough: I sold my car, began walking and taking public transportation everywhere. I got even for the over-inflated car prices, the insurance prices and the gas-gouging. I save $900 to $1,000 every month and I can now take a vacation."

Mark in Anchorage, Alaska, "Jack, I'm a sourdough Alaskan and to hear that ExxonMobil made $39 billion in profits frosts me as they still owe Alaska billions of dollars for the damage done by the Exxon Valdez spill in 1989. Jerks!"

Mark, "Bully for them. It will allow a great American company to remain great. Additionally, the earnings will allow them to conduct further exploration for new reserves of oil and gas."

Linda, "I don't care how much Exxon makes. I care how much the Saudis make. I care how much the Kuwaitis make and how much all the other countries who fund Islamic terrorists make when selling us their barrels of crude oil."

J.B. in Connecticut, "Jack, the middle class in this country will lament the exorbitant (or is that extorted?) profits by ExxonMobil and other big oil, drug. and insurance companies. But the people in this country that control the laws are the upper class and their paid lobbyists who take good care of our elected representatives. And the upper class makes big money when the big companies make big profits."

"So, who's going to fix this problem? No one."

John writes, "Jack, Exxon makes $75,000 a minute in profits. I wonder if they could spare a minute or two for you or me, Jack."

If you didn't see your e-mail here, you can go to cnn.com/caffertyfile and read more of these online -- Wolf.

BLITZER: You know what they say, Jack. Rich or poor, it's good to have money.

CAFFERTY: That's right. On the whole, I'd rather be rich. I've been rich, I've been poor, and on the whole I'd rather be rich.

BLITZER: Good. See you in an hour, Jack. Thanks very much.

Up next, love and politics, Italian-style. A former prime minister and his wife, they're battling it out in public. You're going to want to see this when we come back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Italy is being riveted right now by a very public spat between former prime minister Silvio Berlusconi and his wife.

CNN's Alessio Vinci is joining us from Rome with details -- Alessio.

ALESSIO VINCI, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, Italian politics is perhaps best known for how crazy it is or, at times, for being plain boring. But Italians witnessed something they have never seen before, an open letter on the front page of a national daily, written by Silvio Berlusconi's wife, fed up with her husband's flirting.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

VINCI (voice over): The letter demanded a public apology by the former prime minister for sexist comments he allegedly made to a group of women during a dinner party, telling one of them he would marry her and another he would go with her anywhere.

"These are comments I consider damaging to my dignity," she wrote. "The can be reduced to jokes." Such a bold and unexpected move by a woman known for staying out of the limelight had the nation spellbound for a day.

Newscasts, newspapers, blogs all devoted a huge amount of space to the saga. And by late afternoon, Berlusconi was ready to apologize, saying, "Forgive me. Accept this public display of public pride as an act of love, one of many."

(END VIDEOTAPE)

VINCI: Had all this played out in the U.S., the outcome may well have been the end of a political career. But here in Italy, it all ended with a nice family dinner at Berlusconi's estate near Milan -- children included -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, Alessio. Thanks very much. Always interesting in Rome.

We're here in THE SITUATION ROOM, back in an hour.

Let's go to Lou in New York.

TO ORDER A VIDEO OF THIS TRANSCRIPT, PLEASE CALL 800-CNN-NEWS OR USE OUR SECURE ONLINE ORDER FORM LOCATED AT www.voxant.com

Will Politicians Unite Against Troop Build Up?; Interview With Carl Levin; Sex And Scandal In San Francisco; Mary Cheney Reacts To Political Fallout (CNN)

CNN THE SITUATION ROOM, February 2, 2007

WOLF BLITZER, CNN ANCHOR: Happening now, a top Republican and Democrat are working together against the troop build-up in Iraq and against President Bush.

Will they get the bipartisan backing they want or just rile up the left and the right?

I'll talk to one of the senators behind the new deal, the Armed Services Committee chairman, Carl Levin.

Also this hour, sex and scandal in San Francisco -- Mayor Gavin Newsom goes before reporters to say he's sorry. It's not just that he had an affair, it's whom he had an affair with.

Plus, Mary Cheney talks openly about the subject her father refused to talk about with me, the subject of the baby she's having with her lesbian partner. The vice president's daughter opens up about her pregnancy and the political fallout.

I'm Wolf Blitzer.

You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Frustrations over the war in Iraq are being laid bare on Capitol Hill right now. Senators of both parties have been grilling the president's top commander in Iraq about failures in the war. General George Casey being considered for a new job. That would be the Army chief of staff.

The hearing comes just hours after top Senate Democrats threw their support behind a Republican resolution disagreeing with the troop build-up. They're hoping to build bipartisan support and send the strongest message possible to President Bush.

In the war zone, a source in Iraq's Interior Ministry tells CNN nearly 2,000 civilians were killed in violence in that country in January alone. More than 60 people died in suicide bombings in a crowded market in Hillah today.

Our senior Pentagon correspondent, Jamie McIntyre, is standing by.

But let's go to Capitol Hill.

Our Congressional correspondent, Dana Bash, with the latest -- Dana.

DANA BASH, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, we're waiting this hour for a press conference with Senator John McCain. He's going to formally unveil his resolution to set up benchmarks for the Iraqis.

Now, Republican leaders hope that will be an alternative to appeals to the GOP rank and file, who don't -- who are skeptical of the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq but don't necessarily want to outright condemn him.

Now, that is just part of the intense behind the scenes maneuvering today after last night's blockbuster bipartisan deal.

(BEGIN VIDEO TAPE)

BASH (voice-over): The morning after Senate Democrats joined forces with leading Republicans to oppose the president's Iraq strategy, Bush allies scrambled to prevent more GOP defections, lashing out at fellow Republicans who would support any measure opposing a troop increase in Iraq.

SEN. JIM BUNNING (R), KENTUCKY: And I believe they send a dangerous message to our enemies.

BASH: Others pleaded for patience.

SEN. JON KYL (R-AZ), INTELLIGENCE COMMITTEE: Years ago, I used to see bumper stickers that said, "Give peace a chance." And I think today we need to dust off some of those bumper stickers and write a couple of extra words in -- give the president's plan for peace a chance.

BASH: That as anti-war protesters walked the halls of Congress, delivering petitions pushing senators to oppose more troops in Iraq.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: We really need to bring an end to this war.

SEN. JOSEPH BIDEN (D-DW), FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE: The quickest, most effective way to get the president to change his course is to demonstrate to him that his policy has little or no support in this body.

BASH: Democratic leaders signed onto the less confrontational Republican resolution with the goal of attracting the GOP votes they need to actually pass a bipartisan rebuke of the president.

But in the process, Democrats lost some support on their left flank.

Wisconsin's Russ Feingold says he'll oppose it because it contradicts the goal of withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq.

Democratic presidential candidate Chris Dodd agrees.

SEN. CHRIS DODD (D), CONNECTICUT: I don't know how you can vote for this resolution and vote for that language and then simultaneously be for a redeployment of forces.

(END VIDEO TAPE)

BASH: Now other Democrats on the left say they actually will support this resolution. Ted Kennedy, Tom Harkin, for example.

Now, we understand that Democrats just came out of a closed door meeting and that they have decided that they do have the votes to at least proceed to the debate when they get to that point. And, Wolf, that will be the first incredibly important test vote, when they get to that motion to proceed to debate on this issue -- Wolf.

BLITZER: And so when it plays out on the floor, we expect that to start next week, is that right?

BASH: We expect it to -- what is going on right now is a big question mark, to be honest with you.

Republicans are trying to figure out their next move; Democrats, as well. They're talking to each other behind-the-scenes.

What we can look for, though, what's really important to look for is something that's going to happen tomorrow, Wolf, and that is Senate Republicans are going to have an all day retreat. It's been long planned. And afterward, they're going to go to the White House and have a meeting, face-to-face time with the president.

And we understand from Demo -- from Senate Republicans, rather, who are undecided about this, that they are going to use that time to really discuss this with the president.

And we understand from a senior administration official, Mr. Bush is going to do the same, something he really hasn't done -- personal lobbying -- since this whole issue of resolutions really got underway a couple of weeks ago.

BLITZER: We'll watch it play out, Dana.

Thank you.

Over at the White House today, the press secretary, Tony Snow, is sending a harsh word of warning to those senators about putting their opposition to the president's new Iraq strategy on the record. He even invoked the name of America's most wanted terrorist.

Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

TONY SNOW, WHITE HOUSE PRESS SECRETARY: Osama bin Laden thought that a lack of American resolve was a key reason he could inspire people to come after us after September 11th. I am not accusing members of the Senate of inviting carnage on the United States of America. I'm simply saying you think about what impact it may have.

(END VIDEO CLIP) BLITZER: Now to the president's top commander in Iraq, under fire from both sides today, even as he interviews for a new job.

Let's turn to our senior Pentagon correspondent, Jamie McIntyre -- Jamie, what's the latest on this front?

JAMIE MCINTYRE, CNN SENIOR PENTAGON CORRESPONDENT: Well, General Casey got the roughest treatment from one of his toughest critics, Senator John McCain, who ripped Casey for his past rosy predictions and slammed him for his failure to ask for reinforcements until things were really getting bad in Iraq late last year.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN (R), ARIZONA: I question seriously the judgment was -- that was employed and your execution of your responsibilities in Iraq. And we have paid a very, very heavy price in American blood and treasure because of what is now agreed to by literally everyone is a failed policy.

And I'd be very happy to hear your response, General.

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY: Senator, I don't think there is any question that the situation in the center of the country, particularly in the capital, is bad. And we are working very hard to rectify that.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MCINTYRE: Critics -- Casey's critics fault him for not asking for more troops until President Bush stepped in and ordered an overhaul of the policy in December. But he said he sticks by the strategy. He said: "It may not have produced the results that everybody hoped, but he does think it's laid the foundation for success."

DOJ_NMG_0126131

That was met somewhat skeptically by other members of the committee, including Senator Carl Levin, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. He asked Casey if he wouldn't agree with President Bush's own assessment that Iraq was headed for a slow failure until the president personally stepped in. And Casey again disagreed, saying that he thought what they were seeing was slow progress -- Wolf.

BLITZER: I'm speaking to Senator Levin momentarily. We'll ask him what he thinks about this nomination.

Jamie, thanks for that.

We're going to have a lot more coming up on the battle on Capitol Hill and what's happening in Iraq.

But I want to move to a different story right now, a very different story -- a sex scandal going public in San Francisco right now.

The mayor, Gavin Newsom, went before reporters just a little while ago to apologize for having a sexual relationship with his former campaign manager's wife.

Alex Tourk resigned yesterday as Newsom's reelection chief after confronting his boss about the affair. Tourk's wife Ruby once worked as Mayor Newsom's appointment secretary.

Newsom didn't answer reporters questions about calls for him to resign, but he did say this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MAYOR GAVIN NEWSOM, SAN FRANCISCO: Everything you've heard and read is true and I am deeply sorry about that. I've hurt someone I care deeply about, Alex Tourk and his friends and family, and that is something that I have to live with and something that I am deeply sorry for.

I'm also sorry that I've let the people of San Francisco down. They expect a lot of their mayor and my personal lapse of judgment aside, I am committed to restoring their trust.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: We're going to have a lot more on this story coming up in the next hour right here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Clearly, an awkward, very embarrassing moment for the mayor of San Francisco.

Let's go to New York and Jack Cafferty for The Cafferty File -- Jack.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Biden blows it -- Biden stumbles at the starting gate. Biden unwraps his bid for '08 with an "Oops!" and "Senator Stupid." Not exactly the kind of headlines you're looking for the day after you kick off a presidential campaign.

But that's what the Delaware senator, Joe Biden, got, after describing Senator Barack Obama as "the first mainstream African- American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice looking guy."

The Democratic White House hopeful apologized yesterday. He called Obama. He told reporters he regretted that his comments were taken out of context. He said he meant to say Obama was fresh and an exciting candidate.

But the damage may already have been done. Biden's comments about Obama bring back attention to something he said about Indians last year: "You can't go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent." And he later said that comment was taken out of context, too.

And then there was the senator's first presidential bid in 1988. He was forced to drop out of that race after it was revealed that he was stealing parts of his speeches from a British politician without attribution, something called plagiarism. So, here's the question -- should Senator Joe Biden withdraw from the presidential race?

E-mail your thoughts to caffertyfile@cnn.com or go to cnn.com/caffertyfile.

The newspapers took no prisoners, Wolf.

"Senator Stupid" -- big, black headline in the "New York Daily News" today.

BLITZER: I saw him on "The Daily Show" with Jon Stewart last night. He's not dropping out yet and we expect to have him here in THE SITUATION ROOM tomorrow. He told our staff earlier in the week he'll be here. We hope to interview him tomorrow, but we're anxious to hear what our viewers think, as well.

Thank you, Jack, for that.

Coming up, he's one of the most powerful Senate voices on Iraq right now, the Armed Services Committee chairman, Carl Levin.

Is he alienating the Democratic Party's base by making a deal with Republicans?

I'll ask him in a few minutes.

Also coming up, something's missing from the race for the White House. Hard to believe, with 18 candidates running or exploring. But our Bill Schneider says it's true.

And she's being applauded by gay rights groups and criticized by some in the Christian right. Now the vice president's daughter, Mary Cheney, speaking publicly about her pregnancy for the first time.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

DOJ_NMG_0126132

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: The chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, he's on Capitol Hill.

He's standing by.

We're going to speak to him in a moment.

But first, as the White House and the Senate head into a showdown over U.S. policy in Iraq, activists around the country are pressuring their senators to take sides in this debate, and it's all taking place -- at least a lot of it -- online.

Let's go to our Internet reporter, Abbi Tatton, with the latest -- Abbi.

ABBI TATTON, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, this counter at the Web site of the liberal Moveon.org is right now keeping track of the people all over the country who are calling Senate offices to voice their opposition to President Bush's troop increase. The number is approaching 700,000. Those are the people who are joining what Moveon labels a virtual march on Washington.

There are online tools to help people, to direct people to who the people they should be calling. The group also delivered signatures to Senate offices today, 600,000 of them. Moveon calls the Warner-Levin resolution an important first step.

On the other side -- (AUDIO GAP).

Lights back, no computer. But on the other side, there's been a conservative push to influence Republican senators to oppose this kind of resolution, led by conservative blogger and radio talk show host Hugh Hewitt. He's been urging people to sign an online pledge, telling people that "I will not contribute to any Republican senator who votes for a resolution of this kind."

And that online pledge, Wolf, right now having over 30,000 signatures -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Abbi, thanks very much.

Someone flipped the switch for a second, but we're back.

Joining us now, a power player in this debate over Iraq and the new deal on a resolution against the troop build-up.

That would be Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan.

He's the chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. Chairman, thanks very much for coming in.

SEN. CARL LEVIN (D-MI), CHAIRMAN, ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE: Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: You're being criticized by the left and the right for this deal you worked out with the ranking Republican, John Warner.

Listen to your friend, Chris Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, a presidential candidate.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DODD: This is not three years ago or two years ago. We're being asked to send 21,000 young Americans into a cauldron. And we ought to be able to do better than a resolution here that really brings 70 people together that doesn't have any effect on whether or not they're going to be put in that situation or not.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: All right, what do you say to Senator Dodd?

LEVIN: Well, first of all, I think that there -- there's a broad consensus against sending the 21,000 additional troops in the country and among Democrats. And if we can get 60 votes -- if we can get 60 votes to defeat a Republican filibuster against the Warner resolution, which I've co-sponsored, which says that we disagree with the president's plan to increase forces by 21,000, it would be a very dramatic statement of senatorial disagreement with the president and would be an important first step, we believe, in turning this ship around and forcing a change of course.

This is the best way, we believe, that we can get a change of course, with a bipartisan resolution disagreeing with the president.

And one other thing. Your -- your reporter there made reference to Moveon.org. Moveon.org is a pretty -- has pretty much of a cross section across the Democratic Party. And as she said, Moveon.org supports, as they put it, the Warner-Levin language because it is an important first step toward Congress blocking the escalation.

So Moveon.org, it seems to me, is a pretty good indicator of where an awful lot of Democrats and others in this country are.

BLITZER: On the right, though, a lot of your critics are saying you know what your doing, senator?

You're giving aid and comfort to the enemy and you're undermining the U.S. military in -- in Iraq, who are serving there right now.

I want you to listen to the White House press secretary, Tony Snow.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SNOW: Osama bin Laden thought the lack of American resolve was the key reason why he could inspire people to come after us on September 11. I am not accusing members of the Senate of inviting carnage on the United States of America. I'm simply saying you think about what impact it may have.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: All right, have you thought about the impact your resolution will have?

LEVIN: We sure have. We sure have. Our troops deserve everything. They deserve our support. They deserve our equipment, the best. They deserve to have their families supported. They deserve the best training in the world. They deserve a reliable ally. They also deserve our best thinking and when 60 senators, which is probably the number we have -- or close -- believe that this additional 21,000 is not going to contribute to success in Iraq, but the opposite -- it's going to contribute to an escalation of the military presence in Iraq. And Saddam Hussein is -- excuse me. Bin Laden is perfectly content. Bin Laden is very content to have American forces stay there occupying a Muslim country.

So, yes, we've given a lot of thought to this question. And we think the current course, which is not working, is a road to failure and we've got to change this course, increase the chances of success by pressing the Iraqi political leaders to take responsibility for their own country and make the necessary political compromises.

BLITZER: I know there's a lot of concern, Mr. Chairman, that the insurgents have a new generation of improvised explosive devices that penetrate even the best U.S. armor on the sides of the Humvees and the other vehicles. And there's concern, there's deep concern you're sending these additional troops, as well as the troops who are already there, into what could be a disaster because they're not going to be as protected as they should be. This came up at your hearing today.

LEVIN: It did, indeed. And we are determined that we're going to give our troops, while they're there, the best possible equipment. This has been an ongoing battle against the insurgents to try to stay ahead of them and we've continued to change technologies. We have told our military and our research and development people we will put all the funds necessary. You've got a blank check when it comes to protecting our troops.

That is the way we feel and we're going to keep working the technologies to try to respond to, but more importantly, keep a step ahead of the insurgents and the terrorists.

BLITZER: Are you -- do you have confidence that General George Casey is the best person to be the new Army chief of staff?

LEVIN: I have confidence that he is a qualified person to be the Army chief of staff. He was the vice chief of staff. And I don't think it's right that would put on his shoulders the policy failures in Iraq. There are some who point to the policy failures in Iraq, which have been major, including disbanding the Iraqi Army, not having a plan for the aftermath and other policy failures.

He shouldn't bear responsibility for the civilian decisions made by this administration. He's made mistakes, by the way, but they're not the major policy mistakes which have put us into the box that we're in.

BLITZER: So you'll vote to confirm him?

LEVIN: I will.

BLITZER: Senator, thanks very much for coming in.

LEVIN: Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: Carl Levin is the chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

And still ahead, Vice President Cheney's pregnant daughter speaking out for the first time since my interview with her father.

What does she think about the criticism she's getting from some in the Christian right?

And later, an Oscar nomination, a Nobel nomination -- could Al Gore go for the Democratic presidential nomination, as well?

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Happening right now, the top U.S. commander in Iraq says he asked for fewer than half the extra troops President Bush is sending to the war zone. General George Casey is testifying before a Senate committee considering his nomination to be the Army chief of staff.

Meantime, the president's Senate allies are trying to stop more Republican defections after a bipartisan deal was struck on a resolution opposing a troop build-up.

Also on Capitol Hill, the leader of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus is under fire. Joe Baca is accused of not treating six women in that group fairly. And wait until you hear what one congresswoman claims he said about her -- that story coming up in our next hour.

Also coming up: the charges that Iran is behind some of the bloodshed and the chaos in Iraq. Our chief international correspondent, Christiane Amanpour, has Iran's response to accusations from the United States that it's meddling and possibly provoking a wider war.

I'm Wolf Blitzer. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

It was one of the most heated confrontations we have seen in the U.S. Senate in quite a while, the Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, Patrick Leahy, going after the attorney general, Alberto Gonzales. People are still talking about it.

I want you to listen to that exchange.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. PATRICK LEAHY (D), VERMONT: He would be held. He would be investigated. We also knew damn well, if he went to Syria, he would be tortured. And it's beneath the dignity of this country, a country that's always been a beacon of human rights, to send somebody to another country to be tortured. You know and I know that has happened a number of times in the past five years by this country.

ALBERTO GONZALES, ATTORNEY GENERAL: Before you get more upset, perhaps you should wait to receive the briefing...

LEAHY: How long?

GONZALES: I'm hoping that we can get the information next week.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: And, today, there are new developments involving that case Senator Leahy was so angry about.

Let's turn to our justice correspondent, Kelli Arena. She is here to explain -- Kelli.

KELLI ARENA, CNN JUSTICE CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, that whole debate focuses on a man named Maher Arar.

Now, he holds both Canadian and Syrian citizenship. He was detained by the United States back in 2002, later deported to Syria, on suspicion that he had terrorist tiles. Well, after he was released, Arar said that he was held and tortured for 10 months.

Now, Senator Leahy was angry, wanted to know why that happened. Why not send him to Canada, where the laws are very similar as they are here in the United States? So, he asked the attorney general for a briefing. He got one today.

The only problem, Wolf, he couldn't say much about it, claiming that it was all classified.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

LEAHY: The conclusion I have reached from the briefing today is that we have only begun to ask the questions, and we have more questions that have to be asked.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

ARENA: Now, Wolf, this whole story is really very confusing.

Last year, a Canadian commission found no evidence to support that Arar posed any threat. And the government actually apologized publicly, paid him millions of dollars in compensation.

But the U.S. just recently told Canada that Arar remains on a U.S. watch list. So, in one country, he is roaming free, but he can't even get into the other country.

Now, Justice will not talk about this. As you heard, the senators won't talk about it. But at least the GAO is doing a study how people actually get put on watch lists. So, maybe then we will get some answers.

BLITZER: The Canadian government, as you know, gave him about $10 million...

ARENA: That's right. Mm-hmm.

BLITZER: ... in compensation for this entire matter.

ARENA: That's right.

BLITZER: All right, Kelli, I know you are going to stay on top of this story for us.

Other news we're following, this time on the road to the White House, it's a real traffic jam these days, with so many contenders. Some might argue enough is enough. Then, again, others might argue, not necessarily. Let's go to our senior political analyst, Bill Schneider -- Bill.

WILLIAM SCHNEIDER, CNN SENIOR POLITICAL ANALYST: Wolf, we have got 18 well-known candidates running or exploring the race for president next year. Do we really need more? Maybe.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SCHNEIDER (voice-over): Two big question marks hanging over the race for president: Al Gore and Newt Gingrich. Gore has described himself as a recovering politician, adding, you have to worry about a relapse.

Here is Gore on Gore.

AL GORE, FORMER VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I'm not planning to be a candidate again.

SCHNEIDER: Gingrich is devoting himself to finding what he calls a new generation of solutions to big problems, like energy, immigration, and health care.

Here is Gingrich on Gingrich.

NEWT GINGRICH, FORMER SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE: If the best way to help launch the solutions is to run, I will.

SCHNEIDER: Here is Gingrich on Gore.

GINGRICH: I think it's still possible that Al Gore will get in the race, because he has the resources and name I.D. to be very formidable.

SCHNEIDER: And the issues -- Gore has become a fierce critic of George W. Bush...

GORE: The president of the United States has been breaking the law, repeatedly and insistently.

(CHEERING AND APPLAUSE)

SCHNEIDER: ... and a passionate advocate of environmental action.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, "AN INCONVENIENT TRUTH")

GORE: This is Patagonia 75 years ago, and the same glacier today.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

SCHNEIDER: This news from Oslo: Gore could win this year's Nobel Peace Prize. He's been nominated by two members of the Norwegian parliament.

And this from Hollywood: Gore's movie, "An Inconvenient Truth," is the front-runner for the Academy Award for best documentary.

Gingrich, too, is a passionate advocate.

GINGRICH: The Republican Party has forgotten what made it a majority. Republicanism did not make conservatives a majority. Conservatism made the Republicans a majority.

SCHNEIDER: If conservatives are looking for someone to carry their banner, Gingrich could be the guy.

Do Democrats want to see Gore run for president? We asked. They do. Do Republicans want to see Gingrich run for president? We asked. They're not sure.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

SCHNEIDER: With 18 well-known candidates, why is there still interest in Gore and Gingrich? Because there are doubts about the leading contenders in both parties: Can they win? Are they ready? Are they really one of us? Maybe we should go with someone we know better -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Bill Schneider reporting -- thank you, Bill.

On our "Political Radar" this Thursday: a talent contest of sorts for three of the Democratic Party's top presidential hopefuls. A new Gallup poll asked Democrats and independents who lean Democratic to rate Senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama and former Senator John Edwards.

Who did they say was most qualified? Senator Clinton, hands down. Who is the most likable? Senator Barack Obama wins that category. Who is the best public speaker? Obama narrowly edges out Senator Clinton for that title. Who is the best on the issues? Senator Clinton trumps Edwards and Obama on every issue listed, excepted for one. That would be moral values. Senator Obama gets top ratings in that category.

And, finally, who has the best chance of winning the Democratic presidential nomination? Senator Clinton comes out on top again, more than 35 points ahead of her nearest rival on that question. That would be Senator Edwards.

And, remember, for the latest political news at any time, check out our Political Ticker at CNN.com/ticker.

And, remember, also, that CNN is a partner with WMUR-TV and "The New Hampshire Union Leader" for the very first presidential debates of the campaign season, two of them, Democratic and Republican, April 4 and 5. It's an unprecedented early kickoff to the race for the White House. You will want to see it right here on CNN.

Coming up: The vice president's daughter delivers a message about her qualifications to be a mother. Our Mary Snow is standing by with the story. And the mayor of San Francisco admits to having an affair with his campaign manager's wife. Is his career in politics done? That's coming up in our "Strategy Session." James Carville and J.C. Watts, they're here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Vice President Dick Cheney told me the other day that questions about his daughter's pregnancy were out of line. But now Mary Cheney herself is speaking publicly about the baby she is having with her lesbian partner.

Let's go to CNN's Mary Snow. She is standing by in New York with what Mary had to say -- Mary.

MARY SNOW, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, these are Mary Cheney's first public comments about her pregnancy.

She spoke at a forum held here in New York on Wednesday, saying that her pregnancy is not a political statement.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

MARY CHENEY, DAUGHTER OF VICE PRESIDENT DICK CHENEY: I knew, when Heather and I decided to have a baby, that it was going to be not the most popular decision ever.

SNOW (voice-over): It was a panel hosted and videotaped by "Glamour" magazine. The topic? Success at 20, 30, and 40.

But, for Mary Cheney, the questions turned to her pregnancy with longtime partner Heather Poe.

M. CHENEY: This is a baby. This is a blessing from God. It is not a political statement. It is not a prop to be used in a debate by people on either side of any issue.

DOJ_NMG_0126136

SNOW: But her pregnancy has generated debate. Some say she put herself into the political spotlight when she worked on her father Dick Cheney's reelection campaign in 2004 -- this as President Bush supported a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage.

Gay family advocates say they want to hear more from her.

JENNIFER CHRISLER, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, FAMILY PRIDE: You can't have one foot in and one foot out when you're talking about this issue. And she sort of dipped her toe in the water on this topic.

SNOW: On the other side of the spectrum came criticism from James Dobson, founder of the conservative group Focus on the Family. The group said Cheney's pregnancy raised questions about what is best for the child.

That's something Vice President Dick Cheney did not want to address when the question was asked during an interview with Wolf Blitzer in THE SITUATION ROOM. BLITZER: I have interviewed her.

RICHARD B. CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I'm delighted -- I'm delighted I'm about to have a sixth grandchild, Wolf, and obviously think the world of both of my daughters and all of my grandchildren.

And I think, frankly, you're out of line with that question.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

SNOW: Now, asked about her father's response, Mary Cheney was quoted by a "New York Times" reporter as saying she felt the question crossed a line.

The head of Family Pride, however, which works to secure gay rights, disagrees, saying the question was not off limits -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Mary, thank you for that.

And up next in the "Strategy Session," we will get to other politics, including Mayor Newsom of San Francisco. He now admits to hurting his friend and constituents by having an affair with his campaign manager's wife. Can this once rising star in the Democratic Party make a comeback?

And how close is the U.S. going to war with Iran? We will talk with Nick Burns. He's a key aide to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. He will be here live in THE SITUATION ROOM in the next hour.

Stay with us.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: A rocky road lately for the Democrats lately -- one of the party's rising stars may go dim after owning up to an illicit affair. And there's also some discord now among the rank-and-file over a resolution protesting President Bush's proposed troop buildup in Iraq.

Joining us now in our "Strategy Session," Democratic strategist James Carville and Republican strategist J.C. Watts.

Gavin Newsom, the mayor of San Francisco, went before the press in San Francisco just a little while ago and, among other things, acknowledged he had an affair with the wife of his campaign manager.

And he said this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GAVIN NEWSOM (D), MAYOR OF SAN FRANCISCO: Everything you have heard and read is true. And I am deeply sorry about that. I have hurt someone I care deeply about, Alex Tourk, his friends and family. And that is something that I have to live with and something that I am deeply sorry for. (END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: That's -- that's a political problem.

What do you think?

JAMES CARVILLE, CNN POLITICAL ANALYST: Yes. I mean, I think it's a political problem. I don't...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: Is it a career -- is it a career-ender?

CARVILLE: Probably not. I have seen bigger problems than that not big career-enders. But I think, to the extent that he could handle it, that was probably as good an answer as he could given under the circumstances. But he's probably not going to rise very far in national politics for some time now.

BLITZER: What do you think?

J.C. WATTS, CNN POLITICAL ANALYST: I -- in San Francisco, Wolf, I don't know. I don't have a good pulse of how things work out there. Interesting things go on.

But national politics, it's over. He probably didn't have any national ambitions. I would even say state politics, it probably hurts him.

But, you know, I -- I admire the fact that he came clean. And there is an old saying: Confession is good for the soul, but bad for the reputation.

(LAUGHTER)

WATTS: So, we will see how it plays out.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: If you were advising him right now -- he is single -- he's divorced.

CARVILLE: Right.

BLITZER: But he, obviously, admits to having had an affair with this other married woman. What advice would you give him, as a Democratic strategist?

CARVILLE: Well, first of all, I would say, based on what I have seen so far, you're -- you're doing fine.

And the big thing is, talk about what you have accomplished for the city: We all have our failings. I will do better.

And, you know, get married, and, 20 years later, run for anything that you want to. But you are going to have to spend a little time in -- in the cooler here.

BLITZER: Yes, J.C.

WATTS: And, Wolf, the thing is, voters, regardless of -- San Francisco voters may see it differently than I would or maybe than James would or you.

But the fact is, voters will always have a way of dealing with these things. And I think he's gone and he's faced the voters. And now they will have to deal with it whatever way they do.

CARVILLE: But they like the kind of mayor he has been. He -- because he is very popular out there. He may very well win reelection.

Like I said, it's going to be hard. He's going to have to say -- some time, some distance between before he can -- you know, and I don't know how much of a future he had in national politics anyway. He's a nice-looking, articulate guy, but he is the mayor of San Francisco.

Dianne Feinstein was the mayor of San Francisco. She got to be a United States senator.

BLITZER: Yes.

(CROSSTALK)

CARVILLE: So, you know, who knows.

BLITZER: Let's talk a little bit about another Democrat who has got some political problems right now. That would be Senator Joe Biden.

What do you make of the controversial comments he made in that interview in "The New York Observer" and the way he has dealt with it?

CARVILLE: You know, when I read it, and saw what he said, it was -- I said, oh, this is a problem.

(LAUGHTER)

CARVILLE: And, if I didn't know Senator Biden -- and people know him. They like him. And they're smart.

But I am not -- am I surprised that he got into trouble for something he says? No. Because he says so much. And we have to remember, there are so many candidates running for president over such a long period of time. This is going to be the first of many. It's not going to stop. It's not going to stop.

WATTS: That's right.

(LAUGHTER)

CARVILLE: I mean, but it was a -- it was something that required him to address. I think he could have addressed it a little bit force -- more forcefully.

BLITZER: What did you think?

WATTS: Well, there is another old saying that said -- that says, because you have the right to say it doesn't mean it's the right thing to say.

And I'm a little offended that he didn't think that I'm a mainstream African-American and articulate and...

WATTS: I took a shower this morning.

(CROSSTALK)

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: But you're not running for president.

CARVILLE: No.

WATTS: But I'm not running for president. That's right.

No, I -- I -- like Jim, I -- like James, I like Joe Biden.

CARVILLE: Right.

WATTS: But Joe likes to talk.

(LAUGHTER)

DOJ_NMG_0126138

WATTS: And we -- you know, we had the same problem with Newt. We would always say -- you know, some of us would say -- well, we would hope -- we would wish that Newt would understand, there's sometimes wisdom in silence, you know? You don't have to address every single issue.

And, of course, 18 months to go before the election, as I said before, I want the popcorn and Coke concessions, because it's going to be very entertaining over the next 18 months.

(CROSSTALK)

CARVILLE: ... the glory of the unspoken thought.

WATTS: Yes. That's right.

BLITZER: He went on "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart" on Comedy Central last night.

Let's play a little clip. CARVILLE: All right.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, "THE DAILY SHOW WITH JON STEWART")

SEN. JOSEPH BIDEN (D-DE), SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN: I spoke to Barack today.

JON STEWART, HOST, THE DAILY SHOW: I bet you did.

(LAUGHTER)

BIDEN: I also spoke to Jesse, and Al Sharpton.

(LAUGHTER)

BIDEN: And I also spoke...

(CROSSTALK)

STEWART: And Michael Jordan and anybody you could get your hands on.

(LAUGHTER)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: The Jackson 5.

WATTS: Didn't call me, Joe.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: He -- you know, I guess he has got to have a sense of humor to try to deal with that. That could be one strategy.

CARVILLE: You know, he's a good guy. He's a very smart man.

And, when you see that, and people -- and everybody likes Senator Biden. I think most of the other senators like him. And I think the press likes him. And people like him. And they just wince, because they know that he's smarter than he shows.

And that was -- and, on his announcement day, he -- he steps in it.

BLITZER: Briefly, on this resolution, this bipartisan resolution now dealing with Iraq, you have got Senator Levin, the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator Warner, the ranking Republican, they have reached a deal. The Democrats, a lot of them, at least, like it. And some Republicans like it as well.

What does the White House do, the strategy? If the White House was trying to derail this, even though it's a nonbinding, symbolic resolution, they clearly are not happy it's going to go forward.

WATTS: Well, I think the fact that it's nonbinding, it has no, you know, effect or weight involved.

BLITZER: It does send a political message out there, though.

WATTS: But I don't think this president is concerned about the politics of it.

I mean, how much more damage can the president do or can he have executed against him? I think the president, again, he is focused on saying: How do we win this? Do we want to make these political statements or do we want to win?

I think the resolution is bad for the troops. And I think it says that, you know, we're going to tolerate -- if we withdraw, we're going to tolerate them killing Americans home and abroad, and we're going to learn to live with it.

BLITZER: James...

WATTS: I think that's a horrible message.

CARVILLE: I think that the Senate has about had enough.

And I don't think that senators like Jim Webb, who has won the Navy Cross, who has a son in Iraq, and senators like Chuck Hagel, who's very brave, served his country very honorably, need Tony Snow or the White House talking about, this is this to Osama bin Laden, or this and that.

The truth is, there is great angst over this. There's great angst about this decision. The United States Senate is the place that -- that it's going to manifest itself. They are going to have a debate on this. And, you know, we're in a democracy. And they may not like it, but these people are trying to do the best for their country with this resolution.

BLITZER: We have got to leave it there, guys, unfortunately. But we will continue this conversation down the road.

James Carville, J.C. Watts, thanks very much for that.

And, remember, they are part of the best political team on television.

And, for the latest political news at any time, check out our Political Ticker at CNN.com/ticker.

Up ahead, this hour, at least -- excuse me -- next hour, the Democratic Party chairman, Howard Dean, what does he think about the divisions in his own party over Iraq? Also coming up next: "The Cafferty File." Should Senator Biden withdraw from the presidential race? That is Jack's question this hour -- Jack with your e-mail right after this.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Here is a look at some of the "Hot Shots" coming in from our friends over at the Associated Press, pictures likely to be in your newspaper tomorrow.

In Boston, protesters hold signs in support of two men charged in yesterday's bomb scare.

In Idaho, fire rages through Middleton High School, consuming at least half of the building.

In South Carolina, a Clemson University student gets pushed through the snow in a kayak.

And in Huron Township, Ohio, sumo wrestlers jump into a swimming pool to celebrate the expansion of a water park -- some of today's "Hot Shots," pictures often worth 1,000 words.

Nice pictures to go to Jack Cafferty with -- Jack.

CAFFERTY: Do we have a correspondent on that sumo thing? We should have a reporter out there.

BLITZER: We have a string -- a stringer there, not a full-time correspondent.

(CROSSTALK)

CAFFERTY: ... do a live -- live report on the opening of that water park.

BLITZER: Yes.

CAFFERTY: Should Senator Joe Biden withdraw from the presidential race?

G. in Montreal: "Joe Biden withdraw? From what? He never entered the 2008 campaign. After all, he explores or runs for president every 20 years for five minutes, like in 1987, and yesterday, in 2007. To hell with withdrawing. He should just keep exploring for 20 more years, and announce in 2027. By then, he will be articulate enough to run."

Norman in Kingfisher, Oklahoma: "I listened carefully, not only to what he had to say about Barack Obama, but the way he said it. And it's transparently obvious that, despite his unfortunate choice of words, he was paying his colleague a very gracious and heartfelt compliment. There's no reason for him to withdraw."

Dicky, Corpus Christi, Texas: "Joe can forget about it. He never had much of a chance anyway. And now, well, it's over. It would be better for him to spend his millions in his campaign war chest on Katrina restoration or something like that. He would then at least be remembered more favorably. Stick a fork in Biden. He's done."

Dave writes: "Of course Biden should not withdraw. We need not sacrifice another politician to the winds of political correctness. I accept his explanation about what he intended when he said that Barack Obama was clean. And I strongly wish that the other candidates for president were as clean as Biden and Obama."

Steven in Los Angeles: "Yes, he's through. He's got brains and heart. But, sadly, style counts in presidential politics, about as much as it counts in professional ice-skating. And this guy fell on his butt while trying to execute a fairly simple maneuver."

Bob in Bear, Delaware: "As a Delaware resident, I wish Joe would drop out tomorrow and get back to doing what he does well, which is being our senior senator. On the bright side, I picked January 31 in the Biden-blows-it pool."

Troop Increase Is A Tough Sale For GOP Senators On '08 Ballot (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — As the Senate prepares to debate his plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, President Bush will be trying to sell it Friday to an unexpectedly skeptical audience: senators from his party.

Republican senators are scheduled to wrap up a day-long strategy session with a visit to the White House, where Bush will host a meeting and a reception.

It could be an awkward visit: Some of the president's guests are leading an effort to put the Senate on record opposing Bush's plan to commit an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq.

Perhaps not coincidentally, many of the mutinous senators are up for re-election in 2008. At least seven of the 20 Republican senators due to face the voters next year already are on record expressing misgivings about the president's planned troop increase. Among them are Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., chief sponsors of the critical resolution that the Senate will begin debating Monday.

Another Republican supporter of the Warner resolution, Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota — one of the most vulnerable Republicans after winning with just 50% of the vote in 2002 — expressed exasperation with Bush's policies in Iraq at a hearing earlier this week. "I don't think there is any lack of appetite for clashing with the executive in both parties," Coleman said.

DOJ_NMG_0126140

He will be on the ballot in a state where Sen. Amy Klobuchar, a freshman Democrat, scored a surprisingly lopsided victory in November after a campaign in which she emphasized her opposition to the war in Iraq. Already one celebrity has expressed interest in taking on Coleman: comedian Al Franken.

Tim Penny, a former independent Minnesota congressman who remains close to lawmakers in both parties, predicted that Bush "will get an earful" this afternoon from the senators who are reflecting the unease of their constituents:

·In Virginia's conservative Shenandoah Valley, Twila Decker, who wears a yellow ribbon for the troops, said she's not upset that her senator has decided to oppose Bush's plan. "John Warner is a very smart man, and I would back up John Warner before I would back up the president," she said.

·In Nashville, Donald Oldham said he initially supported the war. Now, like his senior senator, Lamar Alexander, he's unhappy with the plan. "We don't need any more soldiers to die. We don't know what this war is about any more."

·In Oregon, retired college administrator Jim Treanor backed Sen. Gordon Smith's opposition to Bush's plan. "I don't believe that there's been any basis shown by the Iraqi government that it really wants to take the steps that are needed in order to quell militia violence," Treanor said.

Some voters say they support an alternative resolution in support of the president's plan that is being offered by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., Joe Lieberman, I-Conn., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C. Graham is up for re-election next year.

"I'm not a big supporter of Iraq, but I think in general I do support Lindsey Graham and President Bush," said Marlin Alford, a former Army National Guardsman who works for aerospace contractor Lockheed Martin in Simpsonville, S.C. "I think we made a mistake. It's just not that easy to get out."

Contributing: Tracy Loew, The (Salem, Ore.) Statesman Journal; Jennie Coughlin, The (Staunton, Va.) Daily News Leader; Leon Alligood, The (Nashville) Tennessean; Ron Barnett, The Greenville (S.C.) News; and the Associated Press.

Troop Surge Could Be Up To 48,000 (CQ)

By Frank Oliveri

Congressional Quarterly, February 2, 2007

Democratic leaders questioned whether President Bush fully disclosed the size and cost of his plan to send additional troops to Iraq, citing a report that said it could require more than double the number of soldiers.

The report by the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) found that Bush's decision to deploy 21,500 extra combat troops in Iraq actually could require a total increase of as many as 48,000 troops when support units are counted, and cost as much as $27 billion over 12 months. That cost is also far higher than the figure administration officials previously discussed.

The Senate expects to launch its long-awaited debate of Bush's new strategy on Feb. 5, and the CBO report is certain to complicate the deliberations.

Some lawmakers questioned the value of the debate if they do not have an accurate account from the administration on the size and costs of the troop increase.

"There is no way that the American people can have a meaningful debate about the troop escalation without understanding the full costs of sending more troops to Iraq," Rep. Martin T. Meehan, D-Mass., who chairs the Armed Services Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations, said in a statement. "Frankly, it is irresponsible for the administration to roll out a so-called 'new' strategy in Iraq without telling the public what that plan will entail."

Others used the CBO report to buttress their arguments against Bush's troop increase.

The report "puts the cost of the President's decision in even starker terms," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said in a statement. "If the President proceeds with his plan, thousands more U.S. troops will be at risk, billions more dollars will be required, and there will be a much more severe impact on our military's readiness."

Sen. Ted Stevens of Alaska, the ranking Republican on the Defense Appropriations subcommittee, said he also was concerned about the higher cost estimates in the CBO estimates, but not so much when compared to the cost of failure in Iraq.

"What's the cost of doing it the other way around?" he said.

Raising Questions

CBO Director Peter R. Orszag provided the new estimates on troop levels and costs in response to an inquiry from Meehan and fellow Democrats John M. Spratt Jr. of South Carolina, who chairs the House Budget Committee, and Ike Skelton of Missouri, who chairs the House Armed Services Committee.

The Pentagon has identified only the combat units involved in the troop increase order.

"However, U.S. military operations also require substantial support forces, including personnel to staff headquarters . . . military police, and provide communications, contracting, engineering, intelligence, medical and other services," Orszag said.

Skelton said the CBO report raised questions about what Bush has been telling Congress and the nation about the troop increase.

DOJ_NMG_0126141

"I am disturbed that the administration's figures may not be fully accounting for what a true force increase will entail," he said.

Skelton added that his committee was seeking clarification from the administration on "just how big the president's troop increase really is."

In a White House briefing Jan. 10, the day Bush announced his new strategy, a senior administration official said the "incremental" added cost for the surge would be "$5.6 [billion] on the military side," to be included in the war supplemental spending request that Bush will submit to Congress this month.

The following day, a Pentagon announcement about the "force adjustments" in Iraq contained a one-sentence clue that the number of troops involved would be greater than just the additional combat forces.

"Other combat-support and combat service-support units may also be deployed as necessary once new requirements are assessed," the Pentagon said.

The U.S. military command in Iraq did not respond Thursday to questions about the numbers of support personnel it would need.

The CBO report also noted that the Pentagon "has not yet indicated which support units will be deployed along with the added combat forces, or how many additional troops will be involved."

Regardless of the final count, the report said, "those units would still represent a significant additional number of military personnel" beyond the 21,500 figure.

Orszag said the CBO took into account Pentagon practices to date in assessing the likely impact of deploying additional combat forces to Iraq.

The report estimated costs for several battlefield scenarios. With the current deployment of about 20,000 additional troops reaching peak strength in May, the CBO estimated that the cost of sustaining such a troop strength for four months — including support troops — would range from $7 billion to $9 billion, depending on the size of the support contingent.

If the extra combat forces and their support units remain in Iraq for a full year, the added costs would total between $20 billion and $27 billion, again depending on how many support troops are needed, CBO said.

Over the past few years, the Defense Department has sent combat brigades totaling 9,500 soldiers to Iraq, of which 4,000 are actually combat troops.

Orszag said Army and Pentagon officials have indicated that it would be "both possible and desirable" to deploy fewer support troops "than historical practices would indicate."

But even if the number is lower than the full normal complement, the CBO said there would still be a "significant additional number of military personnel."

Using the historical force proportions in Iraq, adding 20,000 combat troops would require 28,000 more support troops, for a total deployment of 48,000 troops. CBO also provided an alternative scenario that envisioned 15,000 support troops, for a total increase of about 35,000.

CBO's cost estimates were based on appropriations that Congress provided in fiscal 2006 for operations in Iraq. Those amounted to $89 billion for combat troops and their support units.

Surge Could Cost Triple Bush Projection, CBO Says (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush's decision to send more American troops to Iraq could cost as much as $10 billion this year, nearly triple the initial $3.2 billion price tag that Bush aides placed on the surge, the Congressional Budget Office said Thursday,

If the additional troops remain in Iraq for more than a year, the CBO said, the cost could rise as high as $29 billion. And under traditional staging formulas, the added combat troops could require up to 28,000 support personnel, at a cost of another $12 billion through next year.

"Thus far, the Department of Defense has identified only combat units for deployment," the CBO said. "However, U.S. military operations also require substantial support forces, including personnel to staff headquarters, serve as military police and provide communications, contracting, engineering, intelligence, medical and other services."

The Pentagon says it can undertake the surge with a smaller support contingent.

"CBO's report concludes that the cost of the president's plan to surge troops will be higher than previously indicated, both in dollar terms and in the burdens it places on our military," said Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., the House Budget Committee chairman.

Sean Kevelighan, a White House budget office spokesman, disputed the CBO cost projection.

"We are still reviewing the report but maintain that additional brigades will cost $5.6 billion through `07," he said.

Kevelighan's figure was up from the $3.2 billion estimate that Bush aides had provided previously.

Congress already has appropriated $349 billion for the Iraq war, Spratt said. Bush is expected to send lawmakers an emergency spending bill next week seeking $100 billion more for the fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, $80 billion of that for Iraq. He also will send his budget plan for the 2008 fiscal year next week, seeking tens of billions of dollars more for the wars.

The supplemental appropriations measure won't include money for the 21,500 new troops now en route to Iraq.

The new report on the cost of the surge comes as many Democratic lawmakers and some Republicans question the wisdom of sending more U.S. troops to Iraq.

Some Democrats have talked of trying to cut off money for more troops, but the party's congressional leaders so far have said they won't do so. Administration officials maintain that no extra money is needed because the added costs can be handled from existing Pentagon funds.

Spratt requested the CBO report along with Reps. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., the House Armed Services Committee chairman, and Martin Meehan, D-Mass., who heads the oversight and investigations subcommittee of the armed services panel.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow reiterated the Bush administration's assertion that it can pay for the surge with money already appropriated to the Defense Department.

"The money is in the budget now for the five brigades into Baghdad and the 4,000 Marines into Anbar (province), and we would encourage everybody to take a look at what happens," Snow said.

That claim didn't satisfy Skelton.

"Because the president's advisers have indicated that they will pay for the troop increase from funds already provided to the Department of Defense, we were concerned that the full financial cost of the escalation would never be made clear to the American people," he said.

The Congressional Budget Office said the troop increase would cost more because thousands of support personnel would have to accompany those sent into combat.

It projected a range of costs tied to four scenarios for the surge, from one peaking at 35,000 troops and lasting 10 months to one peaking at 48,000 troops and lasting 18 months.

Whether fewer or more troops are dispatched, the increase will take three months to reach full force and three months for a withdrawal, the CBO said.

The agency gave cost projections for 48,000 new troops being in Iraq for four months at peak strength and for the same number for one year at peak strength; it made similar projections for 35,000 more troops over the same periods if fewer support personnel are needed as the Pentagon claims.

Snow, Bush's chief spokesman, said it was "tricky" to try to predict how long the additional troops would be needed.

"I won't give you an absolute timetable, but obviously the next six to eight months are going to be times when people expect to see something happening," he said. "But I would be very wary about trying to assign a specific date to it."

Iraq At Risk Of Further Strife, Intelligence Report Warns (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

A long-awaited National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, presented to President Bush by the intelligence community yesterday, outlines an increasingly perilous situation in which the United States has little control and there is a strong possibility of further deterioration, according to sources familiar with the document.

In a discussion of whether Iraq has reached a state of civil war, the 90-page classified NIE comes to no conclusion and holds out prospects of improvement. But it couches glimmers of optimism in deep uncertainty about whether the Iraqi leaders will be able to transcend sectarian interests and fight against extremists, establish effective national institutions and end rampant corruption.

The document emphasizes that although al-Qaeda activities in Iraq remain a problem, they have been surpassed by Iraqi-on-Iraqi violence as the primary source of conflict and the most immediate threat to U.S. goals. Iran, which the administration has charged with supplying and directing Iraqi extremists, is mentioned but is not a focus.

Completion of the estimate, which projects events in Iraq over the next 18 months, comes amid intensifying debate and skepticism on Capitol Hill about the administration's war policy. In a series of contentious hearings over the past two weeks, legislators have sharply questioned Bush's new plan for the deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. troops and the administration's dependence on the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

In acid remarks yesterday to Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the departing U.S. commander in Iraq, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) noted that "things have gotten markedly and progressively worse" during Casey's 2 1/2 -year tenure, "and the situation in Iraq can now best be described as dire and deteriorating. I regret that our window of opportunity to reverse momentum may be closing." Casey was appearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee on his nomination to be Army chief of staff.

DOJ_NMG_0126143

Although McCain supports the additional troop deployments, he has proposed a Senate resolution including stringent benchmarks to gauge the progress of the Iraqi government and military. McCain's resolution and other nonbinding, bipartisan proposals that would express varying degrees of disapproval of Bush's plan will be debated on the Senate floor next week.

Legislators have been equally critical of the intelligence community, repeatedly recalling that most of the key judgments in the October 2002 NIE on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction were wrong. That assessment concluded that Saddam Hussein had amassed chemical and biological weapons and was "reconstituting" his nuclear weapons program. It became the foundation of the Bush administration's case -- and congressional authorization -- for invading Iraq.

"One of the sort of deeply held rumors around here is that the intelligence community gives an administration or a president what he wants by way of intelligence," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) told Navy Vice Adm. John M. McConnell, Bush's nominee to be director of national intelligence, during McConnell's confirmation hearing yesterday.

Without directly accepting Feinstein's premise, McConnell replied that the intelligence community had learned "meaningful" lessons over the past several years and that "there's very intense focus on independence." McConnell and others made clear that the new NIE on Iraq had been subjected to extensive competitive analysis to test its conclusions.

One senior congressional aide said the NIE had been described to him as "unpleasant but very detailed." A source familiar with its language said it contained several dissents that are prominently displayed so that policymakers understand any disagreements within the intelligence community -- a significant change from the 2002 document, which listed most key dissents in small-type footnotes.

Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.), vice chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, pointedly told McConnell that "we are not going to accept national security issue judgment[s] without examining the intelligence underlying the judgments, and I believe this committee has an obligation to perform due diligence on such important documents." Previous committee attempts to obtain material to back up a 2005 NIE on Iran, Bond said, had "run into resistance."

The outgoing director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, briefed the president on the Iraq NIE yesterday, and the document will be made available to Congress early today. A two-page declassified version of its key judgments will then be posted on the DNI Web site.

Sources familiar with the closely held estimate agreed to discuss it in general terms yesterday on the condition that they remain anonymous and not be directly quoted. But Negroponte and others in the intelligence community have made frequent references to its conclusions in recent testimony.

On Tuesday, Negroponte referred to the NIE in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "Iraq is at a precarious juncture. That means the situation could deteriorate, but there are prospects for increasing stability" that depend on the commitment of Iraqi government and political leaders to take steps to end Sunni-Shiite violence and "the willingness of Iraqi security forces to pursue extremist elements of all kinds," he said.

Congress, which requested the Iraq NIE last August, has pressured the intelligence community to complete it in time for consideration of Bush's new strategy. Intelligence officials have insisted that their best experts were working on the project at the same time they were meeting the demands of policymakers for current intelligence reports.

NIEs comprise input from across the community and are written by the National Intelligence Council.

Potomac Watch Senator Feingold's Sin (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

The Senate is teeming with courageous souls these days, most of them Republicans who have taken that brave step of following the opinion polls and abandoning their president in a time of war. Meanwhile, one of the few senators showing some backbone in the Iraq debate is being shunned as the skunk at the war critics' party.

Sen. Russ Feingold held a hearing this week on Congress's constitutional power to shut off funds for the Iraq war, and followed it up a day later with legislation that would do just that. The Wisconsin pacifist might not understand the importance of winning in Iraq -- or the cost of losing -- but at least there's an element of principle to his actions. He's opposed the war from the start and his proposal to cut off money after six months would certainly end it. It also happens to be Congress's one legitimate means of stopping a war.

Mr. Feingold's reward for honesty was to preside over what might have been the least-attended hearing so far in the Iraq debate. And those of his Senate colleagues who did bother to show up looked like they couldn't wait to hit an exit door. "If Congress doesn't stop this war, it's not because it doesn't have the power. It's because it doesn't have the will," declared Mr. Feingold. Ted Kennedy -- one of two Democrats who put in an appearance -- could be seen shifting uncomfortably in his seat.

DOJ_NMG_0126144

That's because Sen. Feingold is coming uncomfortably close to unmasking the political charade playing on the Senate stage. Critics of President Bush want an unhappy public to see them taking action on the war. So we have the Biden-Warner compromise resolution condemning the plan to increase the forces. There is also talk of capping troops, of requiring redeployments to Afghanistan, of benchmarks and progress reports.

All these proposals have one overriding thing in common: While they may hurt the war effort, none are significant enough for Congress to take responsibility when Iraq is irrevocably lost. This is President Bush's war, and his critics won't take any step that puts them on the hook as well. Sen. Feingold's sin is to suggest that Congress do something more than play politics.

It's a delicate high-wire act, made more complex by the opponents' need to reassure the public that their actions, which will surely encourage the enemy and deflate troop morale, won't, in fact, encourage the enemy or deflate troop morale. This has led to the spectacle of the Senate one day unanimously voting to confirm Gen. David Petraeus, and the next taking up resolutions that would kneecap his plan for success. John Warner and Chuck Hagel are all for the troops, just not for letting them win. Very courageous indeed.

Meanwhile, back in the distasteful department, Sen. Feingold's hearing also drew attention (darn him!) to the other pachyderm in the room: the Constitution. The Senate next week may well pass a resolution that criticizes the Iraq troop buildup, yet notably it will be "non-binding." Should the president ignore it -- which he will have the legal and moral right to do -- pressure will increase for Congress to take real steps to micromanage the war, say with a troop ceiling.

But as constitutional scholars testified at the hearing, Congress (even one worried about its political backside) does not have an unfettered right to be commander in chief. The Founders specifically chose not to give Congress the right to "make" war, worried that this term might allow legislators to conduct military engagements. Instead, Congress was restricted to "declaring" war, which is what it did when it authorized President Bush to invade Iraq. Another constitutional power is to end war, by refusing to appropriate money. But "in the conduct of war, in the conduct of foreign affairs, the president is in fact the decider," said University of Virginia professor Robert Turner.

It is thus dawning on senators that any plans for tinkering with Iraq might not prove so easy. Mr. Feingold largely focused on the question of cutting off funds, but the three or four other war opponents present were eager to coax the assembled witnesses into giving them constitutional cover for other actions.

Sen. Dick Durbin floated the latest brainstorm: Since Congress's authorization of the Iraq war was premised on finding WMD and deposing Saddam Hussein -- and since we never found WMD and Saddam is now gone -- doesn't Congress have the constitutional right to revisit the war authorization? Even the liberal scholars, who'd been picked for their willingness to testify that Congress can do whatever it wants, looked peaky at the idea. That included one-time assistant-attorney general Walter Dellinger, who felt so strongly about executive power in the 1990s that he advised President Clinton to invade Haiti without congressional authority, but today believes the Republican in the Oval Office is getting away with too much.

The pesky constitution is a new hitch for the war critics, whose strategy was to briefly act as backseat generals, get the headlines, and then wait for President Bush to take the fall. Instead, Sen. Arlen Specter was gauche enough at the Feingold hearing to worry out loud that Congress was setting down a path that may lead to a "confrontation" between the two branches.

He might well worry. If one thing has defined the Bush years, it has been the president's willingness to exert his executive authority in defense of America. He's done it with detainees, with wiretaps, with military commissions. And he fervently believes success in Iraq is crucial to American security. In any thorny debate over just how much authority Congress has to interfere, it's a good bet Mr. Bush's own legal team will be pointing out the strong constitutional case that only the president has the right to decide where and how to deploy troops, as well as noting the peril of ceding any of that authority to 535 mini-me commanders in Congress.

What happens then? What happens if President Bush ignores Congress's attempt to direct the war? A few in the Democratic Party would love for an excuse to commence impeachment proceedings, but the rest understand that's political suicide. Then there's court. If liberals were unhappy about the Supremes deciding the 2000 election, imagine the theater of nine black robes deciding the outcome of the Iraq war.

Whatever comes, Congress is to blame. For a month the Senate has been trying to wrestle control of Iraq from the president, but undercover, and in a way that that avoids accountability. Sen. Feingold shone a light under that rock this week, and now the hard questions begin.

Casey: Only Half Of Troop Boost Needed (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 2, 2007

The outgoing top U.S. general in Iraq diplomatically aired his differences with the commander in chief on Thursday, telling lawmakers that President Bush has ordered thousands more troops into Iraq than needed to tamp down violence in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0126145

Gen. George Casey quickly added he understood how his recently confirmed successor, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, could want the full complement of 21,500 additional troops that Bush has ordered to Iraq. Casey said they could "either reinforce success, maintain momentum or put more forces in a place where the plans are not working."

The latest National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, delivered to the White House on Thursday, described an increasingly perilous situation in which the U.S. has little control and further deterioration is possible, The Washington Post reported. A two-page summary of the report was scheduled to be released publicly on Friday.

The 90-page classified report comes to no conclusion over the question of whether civil war has engulfed Iraq, unidentified sources familiar with the document told the Post. It says that al-Qaida activities remain a problem but cites Iraqi-on-Iraqi violence as the primary source of conflict and the most immediate threat to U.S. goals, the Post reported in its Friday editions.

While optimistic at times about improvement in Iraq, the report casts uncertainty over whether Iraqi leaders will be effective in fighting sectarian interests and extremists, establish effective national institutions and stop corruption, the Post said.

As Casey spoke at a confirmation hearing into his nomination to become Army chief of staff, the full Senate lurched toward a widely anticipated debate on the administration's policy, the first since midterm elections in which public opposition to the war helped install a new Democratic majority.

One day after critics of Bush's revised war strategy merged two competing Senate measures, the White House worked to hold down the number of GOP defections while two liberal Democrats attacked the compromise as too weak. An early test vote on the issue is tentatively set for Monday.

"It is essentially an endorsement of the status quo, an endorsement I simply cannot make in light of the dire circumstances in Iraq and the need for meaningful action now," said Sen. Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, who is seeking the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

Casey endured occasional sharp criticism as he appeared before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"I do not in any way question your honor, your patriotism or your service to our country, I do question some of the decisions and judgments you have made over the past two and a half years as commander of Multi-National Forces in Iraq," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz. "During that time, things have gotten markedly and progressively worse, and the situation in Iraq can now best be described as dire and deteriorating."

So far, no senators have announced plans to oppose Casey's elevation to chief of staff, although McCain, as well as Sens. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C. and Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn., said they were undecided how to vote.

In the peculiar politics surrounding the Iraq war, the three lawmakers are among the strongest critics of the nonbinding legislation. It would criticize the president's decision to increase troop levels as a way of stabilizing Baghdad nearly four years after Saddam Hussein was forced from power.

They said they intend to advance an alternative measure setting out the goals that should be met by the Iraqi government, and pledging whatever resources Petraeus requests. "We've come to the conclusion that the Petraeus strategy ... to buy some time for political reconciliation is our best chance for victory," said Graham.

Critics of the war, including most Senate Democrats and several Republicans, appeared to be coalescing around a revised measure advanced by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., and a group of lawmakers of both parties. It says the Senate "disagrees with the `plan' to augment our forces by 21,500, and urges the president instead to consider all options and alternatives."

Many Democrats had been supporters of a stronger measure, one declaring that Bush's plan for more troops was "not in the national interest."

That criticism was jettisoned Wednesday night as Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada maneuvered to pick up Republican votes. Additionally, the new measure says Congress "should not take any action that will endanger United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field," a provision that Republicans said was designed to outflank Democrats eager to rein in Bush's policy.

Several officials said Reid told a closed-door caucus during the day that lawmakers would have an opportunity to vote for binding restrictions on Bush's war policy in the coming months.

"For me it was a reassurance" that the Senate's hands would not be tied to end the war but troops would still be protected, said James Webb, a Virginia Democrat elected last fall as a critic of the war.

Two veteran liberals, Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and presidential hopeful Joseph Biden, D-Del., were among Democrats who said they were ready to accept the watered-down nonbinding measure as a first step.

Not so Dodd and Sen. Russell Feingold.

Feingold, D-Wis., issued a statement saying the measure "misunderstands the situation in Iraq and shortchanges our national security interests. The resolution rejects redeploying U.S. troops and supports moving a misguided military strategy from one part of Iraq to another."

DOJ_NMG_0126146

Two other presidential hopefuls, Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, said they were undecided on whether to support the measure. Both favor binding legislation to force a change in policy toward Iraq.

Separately, the Congressional Budget Office said Bush's plans would cost $9 billion to $14 billion for a four-month deployment, depending on the number of support troops required. It said that based on experience, each 4,000-troop combat brigade would be accompanied by 5,500 support personnel — 28,000 more than Bush is sending. A Pentagon spokesman, Paul Boyce, dismissed the estimate as too high, but he declined to offer his own estimate.

Casey's comments marked a rarity, a four-star general pulling back the veil on high-level differences expressed in advance of a presidential decision.

The White House seemed unperturbed. "What General Casey was talking about is some suggestions he'd made earlier. The president has made his decision, and it does reflect the wisdom of a number of combatant commanders and it does have the assent of General Casey," said presidential spokesman Tony Snow.

The remarks drew skepticism in Congress, though.

"I'm not certain five additional brigades in Baghdad and one more in Anbar province are sufficient to do the job," said McCain. "I am certain, however, that the job cannot be done with just two additional brigades, as you, General Casey, had advocated."

At his own confirmation hearing last month, Petraeus testified that he wanted all 21,500 troops moved "as rapidly as possible" into Iraq.

Casey: Fewer Troops Can Do Baghdad Job (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — Curbing insurgent-led violence in Baghdad can be done with fewer troops than the 17,500 extra proposed by President Bush, Gen. George Casey told a Senate panel Thursday during a confirmation hearing on his nomination as Army chief of staff.

Bush is sending the extra troops to Baghdad as part of an overall increase of 21,500 troops in Iraq, but "I believe that the job in Baghdad … can be done with less than that," Casey said.

"But having the flexibility to have the other three brigades on a deployment cycle gives us and gives Gen. Petraeus great flexibility," he said.

Lt. Gen. David Petraeus is Casey's replacement as the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the president has talked to Casey, and "Gen. Casey supports the plan."

Casey, who was nominated to succeed Gen. Peter Schoomaker as Army chief of staff, was criticized by senators of both parties for his record in Iraq.

"I question seriously the judgment that was employed in your execution of your responsibilities in Iraq," Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., told Casey. "And we have paid a very, very heavy price in American blood and treasure because of what is now agreed to by literally everyone as a failed policy."

McCain also challenged Casey on what he called overly "rosy" predictions of success in Iraq over the past two years. He referred to a statement in December 2004 in which Casey predicted that Iraqi security forces would be able to maintain order in Iraq by the end of 2005.

"That obviously has not panned out," Casey said.

Casey said he did "not believe we have a failed policy." Rather, "I believe the president's new strategy will enhance the policy that we have."

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., who has co-authored a non-binding resolution opposing the troop increase, said Iraqi troops should bear greater responsibility for security there.

Casey has supported turning over security responsibilities to Iraqi forces more quickly. He said Thursday that Iraqis were willing, but not ready, to take over.

"The struggle in Iraq is winnable," Casey said, adding that it will take patience and will.

As the Senate committee debated Casey's nomination, the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) released a report that says Bush's plan for more troops could also require an extra 28,000 support troops.

The CBO report says the Pentagon's "practice has been to deploy a total of about 9,500 personnel per combat brigade to the Iraq theater, including about 4,000 combat troops and about 5,500 supporting troops."

Adding the new troops will add an additional $13 billion for four months to the current costs in Iraq, the report says. If the higher troop levels were maintained for a full year, it will cost $27 billion more.

DOJ_NMG_0126147

The CBO report shows the costs of Bush's plan "will be higher than previously indicated, both in dollar terms and in the burdens it places on our military," said Rep. John Spratt, a South Carolina Democrat and chairman of the House Budget Committee.

Casey Defends Iraq War Effort (MCT)

By Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - The U.S. can win in Iraq and American policy there hasn't failed, Gen. George Casey said Thursday in response to a sharp condemnation from Sen. John McCain, who questioned Casey's judgment in his 2 { years as the top American commander in Iraq.

Casey defended his record at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on his nomination to become the next Army chief of staff. He stood by his recommendation that Baghdad needed fewer extra troops than President Bush had proposed, said calls for a U.S. withdrawal from Baghdad could hurt the new commander's flexibility and denied that the strain of the Iraq war has broken the Army.

McCain, R-Ariz., a potential presidential candidate, said that Casey had called for adding too few troops and failed to prevent an escalation of sectarian violence.

"I question seriously the judgment that was employed and your execution of your responsibilities in Iraq, and we have paid a very, very heavy price in American blood and treasure because of what is now agreed to by literally everyone is a failed policy," McCain said.

"Senator, I do not agree that we have a failed policy," Casey said. "I believe the president's new strategy will enhance the policy that we have."

Casey defended his decision to call for only two additional American brigades for Baghdad, saying his principle was to not add a single additional soldier or Marine more than needed.

McCain said he was "not certain" that Bush's plan to add five brigades (about 17,500 troops) was enough, but he was sure that "the job cannot be done with just two additional brigades."

Casey didn't criticize Bush's plan. He said that the three brigades it adds above his recommendation would give the new commander more flexibility.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the committee chairman, pressed Casey on why he changed his mind between mid-November, when he said no increase in troops was needed, and December, when he called for an increase of two brigades.

Casey said what changed was that the Iraqi government developed a new plan that called for increased forces.

He also said that political reconciliation among Iraqi factions - including a system of sharing political power and oil revenues - was essential for stability. He argued that Iraqis must take responsibility for security as soon as possible, but added, "They're not quite ready.

"The struggle in Iraq is winnable," Casey said, but it will "take patience and will."

He said that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Jan. 6 agreed to target anyone breaking the law, regardless of sect, and "so far the results have been heartening." But he also said that al-Maliki had denied that he'd agreed to any benchmarks and that the Shiite prime minister "leans toward" not wanting the troop increase that Bush ordered.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn., who supports the troop increase, said that some senators support a timetable for withdrawal from combat duty in Baghdad.

"As the commander, I would resist any type of mandated timetables that would limit my flexibility to deal with the situation on the ground," Casey said.

Casey also rejected the view of critics who say that the Army is broken by strains from the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. He said he saw a "splendid Army" in Iraq.

Casey was born in an Army hospital in Japan while his father was serving in the U.S. occupation forces there. Sen. John Warner, R-Va., noted that Casey's father was killed in the line of duty in Vietnam, where he was a two-star general commanding the 1st Infantry Division.

As he began his testimony, Casey thanked his "bride of 36 years" - Sheila, who sat behind him with their two adult sons - "for her courage, grace and support over the last two-and-a-half years."

He said that military families "make tremendous sacrifices on behalf of their loved ones a half a world away," adding, "courage is not reserved for the battlefield."

Casey Refutes Iraq Pessimism (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

DOJ_NMG_0126148

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

The outgoing U.S. commander in Baghdad yesterday broke with his superiors, including President Bush, by telling a Senate committee he does not agree with their dire assessments that the Iraq war is failing.

"I do not agree that we have a failed policy," Army Gen. George Casey told the Senate Armed Services Committee in confirmation hearings for him to be the next Army chief of staff.

Questioned by Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, Gen. Casey repeatedly defended his 21/2-year command, conceding that Baghdad fell into cycles of relentless killing during his term and that "the situation is definitely deteriorating in Baghdad." But he said much of Iraq has made progress.

"I believe the president's new strategy will enhance the policy that we have," he said of Mr. Bush's Jan. 10 plan to send 21,500 additional troops into Iraq, most to Baghdad.

As Gen. Casey testified, a bipartisan group of senators put the finishing touches on a nonbinding resolution opposing Mr. Bush's troop boost. Sponsored by Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, and backed by Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat and Armed Services Committee chairman, the measure would also oppose a cutoff of war funds, an action demanded by some anti-war liberals.

It was not clear yesterday whether Mr. Warner has the 60 votes needed to clear the resolution for a floor vote.

Gen. Casey broke with comments by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, who has said the United States is not winning, and with Navy Adm. William Fallon, who told the same committee this week that the strategy was not working. Adm. Fallon is to be the next Middle East commander.

The general did not stop there. Asked about Mr. Bush's assessment that his Iraq policy was headed to "slow failure," Gen. Casey said, "I actually don't see it as a slow failure. I actually see it as slow progress."

Mr. McCain announced he had strong reservations about confirming Gen. Casey. First, he said the four-star officer continued to give him optimistic assessments on Iraq violence, only to see bloodshed increase each time. Second, he said both of Gen. Casey's campaigns to bring down violence in the capital failed in the summer and last fall because troops did not hold the neighborhoods they cleared of Shi'ite and Sunni insurgents.

"The result of these and other missteps have been unprecedented levels of violence in Iraq and a pervasive lack of security that prohibits political and economic activity," the senator said.

When Mr. McCain read a 2004 quote from Gen. Casey saying Iraq forces would be able to take over security and curb violence by December 2005, the witness responded, "That obviously has not panned out."

The general defended himself repeatedly. He said some of his favorable predictions came before al Qaeda bombed the Shi'ite golden dome mosque in Samara a year ago. U.S. commanders blame the attack for provoking Shi'ite reprisals, and then Sunni counterattacks that swelled into constant killings in and around Baghdad.

The senator also clashed with the general on troop strength.

Gen. Casey, who last fall opposed any troop increase because he wanted the Iraqis to take over security, said he recommended only two additional brigades during the White House review. Mr. Bush opted for five.

But he endorsed the ultimate plan, saying, "I believe that this five-brigade plan gives great flexibility" to his successor, Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus.

He said he does not consider Iraq a failure because all but three of 18 provinces -- Baghdad, Anbar and Diyala -- experience relatively low levels of violence. He also said the Iraqi Security Force has taken control of some regions.

"We just have a fundamental disagreement, General Casey, with facts on the ground and with what has happened in Iraq over now one of the longest wars in our history and where we are today," said Mr. McCain, who advocated an even bigger troop increase than the Bush plan.

Gen. Casey also differed with Adm. Fallon, who is to oversee Iraq as commander of U.S. Central Command, on whether the central question of whether the new strategy will work.

"I believe that it can work," he told Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent and a hawk on Iraq.

Adm. Fallon had specifically declined to endorse the plan during his confirmation hearing.

As Army chief of staff, Gen. Casey would switch from commanding troops in the field to making sure they are recruited and equipped. He would take over an Army that has been hard-pressed to fight in Afghanistan since 2001 and in Iraq since March 2003.

Pressed by commanders, Mr. Bush has approved increasing the active Army to 540,000 soldiers and adding billions of dollars to replace worn-out weapon systems.

"But from what I see in Iraq, senator, the Army is far from broken," said Gen. Casey. He was the Army's No. 2 general when tapped by then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld as the first four-star officer to run Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0126149

"I have mentored three Iraqi prime ministers in political-military interactions. I've dealt with three different ambassadors, four coalition corps commanders. I have learned an awful lot about strategic leadership," Gen. Casey said.

Senators Challenge Gen. Casey On Iraq War (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the Bush administration's nominee to be the Army chief of staff, got an unusually harsh reception yesterday from some members of the Senate Armed Services Committee for his performance as the top U.S. commander in Iraq over the past 30 months, but he still appears likely to be confirmed to lead the Army.

"You'll need to explain why your assessment of the situation in Iraq has differed so radically from that of most observers and why your predictions of future success have been so unrealistically rosy," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). "I question seriously the judgment that was employed in your execution of your responsibilities in Iraq. And we have paid a very, very heavy price in American blood and treasure because of what is now agreed to by literally everyone as a failed policy."

It is rare for a nomination for a military service chief to be even mildly controversial, but Casey is leaving a job as top U.S. commander in Iraq just as Congress is debating the war effort more intensely than it has since before the invasion of the country in March 2003. Democratic members of the committee left the argument largely in the hands of the panel's Republicans, who are deeply split over Iraq policy.

McCain and Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) expressed skepticism about Casey, but several other GOP members -- James M. Inhofe (Okla.), Jeff Sessions (Ala.) and John W. Warner (Va.) -- showed support for him. Sessions argued that Casey's time in command in Iraq would make him a "more effective, sensitive, knowledgeable chief of staff for the Army."

Casey pushed back hard, disputing gloomy assessments of the situation in Iraq and standing by his own relatively optimistic view. "I do not agree that we have a failed policy," he said. He also said he still expects Iraqi security forces to assume responsibility for keeping order across the country by the end of this year. McCain sharply reminded him that in 2004 he made a similar prediction about the end of 2005.

When Graham used the term "last chance" to characterize the Bush administration's plan to bring security to Baghdad by doubling the number of U.S. troops there and having some of them live in outposts across the city, Casey objected. "I don't think it is the absolute last chance, but it certainly is the best chance right now that we have," he said.

He also told skeptical committee members that "the situation in Iraq is winnable. It's very winnable."

He disagreed with some senators' assessment of the strained state of the Army. "From what I see in Iraq . . . the Army is far from broken," he said.

Despite their dissatisfaction with Casey's handling of Iraq, most committee members appear inclined to vote for him, mainly out of the belief that he inherited a difficult and deteriorating situation when he became the top officer in Iraq in July 2004. "The consequences of what I believe has been a failed strategy should be shared at far higher level," said Sen. James Webb (D-Va.), a Vietnam War veteran who was Navy secretary during the Reagan administration.

Summarizing the day's proceedings, Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) , chairman of the Armed Services Committee, told reporters after the hearing that he thought the majority of its members would vote to confirm Casey. "He should not be held responsible for the key mistakes which were made going into the Iraq war, and the way policy was set by civilian leaders," Levin said in explaining the views of the majority.

Casey also expressed a careful opinion about a previous Army chief of staff, Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, who ran afoul of the Bush administration in the spring of 2003 for saying that the Pentagon's plan to occupy Iraq lacked sufficient troops. Shinseki was publicly rebuked by then-Deputy Defense Secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz, and a year later retired still angry. "I don't think he was treated well," Casey said.

"I think he was treated miserably," responded Levin, who had asked Shinseki at a February 2003 hearing how many troops would be needed to occupy Iraq.

War Supporter McCain Laments 'Missteps' In Iraq (WP)

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has been a firm supporter of the Iraq war and of President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Baghdad in the coming months. In comments at yesterday's confirmation hearing for Gen. George W. Casey Jr. to be the Army chief of staff, however, he expressed stark concerns about the war. An excerpt:

Things have gotten markedly and progressively worse, and the situation in Iraq can now best be described as dire and deteriorating. I regret that our window of opportunity to reverse momentum may be closing.

DOJ_NMG_0126150

The bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra last February sparked sectarian violence throughout Iraq, and Baghdad in particular. Yet in the face of this dramatic change in the Iraqi security environment, our military strategy remained essentially unchanged. Instead of conducting a traditional counterinsurgency campaign, our troops focused on training and equipping Iraqis, hoping in vain that they could do the job. After repeated elections and political events demonstrated that the democratic process would not on its own bring down the level of violence, our troops did not begin focusing on protecting the population. Instead, coalition and Iraqi forces launched Operation Together Freedom in June 2006. This operation aimed at securing Baghdad failed, yet the coalition launched Operation Together Forward II in August in a very similar fashion. The result, predictably, was a similar failure.

The result of these and other missteps have been unprecedented levels of violence in Iraq and a pervasive lack of security that prohibits political and economic activity.

General Parries Senate Attacks On Iraq Record (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — The departing American commander in Iraq defended his record on Thursday against withering criticism from some Senate Republicans and said Baghdad could be stabilized with far fewer additional troops than President Bush planned to send.

The appearance by the commander, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., before the Senate Armed Services Committee underscored the anger that dominates much Congressional sentiment on Iraq as well as the tensions between the White House and the military over Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Republicans who had lauded General Casey for most of his tenure in Iraq criticized what they described as his overly optimistic projections and his unwillingness to admit sooner that the American strategy in Iraq was not working.

General Casey spoke as the Senate moved toward a vote early next week on a nonbinding but significant resolution expressing disagreement with Mr. Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq. [Page A11.]

The general appeared before the committee as part of the confirmation process following his nomination to be the Army's chief of staff.

In a series of sharp exchanges, Senator John McCain of Arizona, the top Republican on the panel, criticized General Casey for what he said had been an overly narrow focus on training and equipping Iraqi troops and for the general's reluctance to ask for additional forces.

"While I do not in any way question your honor, your patriotism or your service to our country, I do question some of the decisions and judgments you've made over the past two and a half years," said Mr. McCain, long an advocate of sending more troops to Iraq.

But General Casey stood his ground, saying that he believed that the plan to secure Baghdad could probably be accomplished with only two additional American brigades, not the five sought by Mr. Bush. Other troops should be sent only if the new American commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, determines that they are needed, he said.

General Casey also said he disagreed with Mr. Bush's characterization of the Iraq effort last month as "maybe a slow failure."

"I actually don't see it as a slow failure; I see it as slow progress," said General Casey, whom Mr. Bush replaced to underscore a shift in strategy in Iraq and then nominated to fill the Army chief of staff position.

Mr. McCain and another Republican, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, are leading the opposition to the resolutions criticizing the Bush plan, but key Democrats threw their support on Thursday behind a proposal by Senator John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican, that could put the Senate on record against the White House strategy.

The tough questioning of General Casey came not just from some Republicans but from Democrats seeking to blame what they described as the administration's faulty strategy for the lack of progress in Iraq. But General Casey said that administration officials like former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who shared his belief in holding down troop levels, had never blocked him from asking for more forces.

"The strategy that I articulated here today is my strategy, and I believe in it," he said. "It may not have produced the results on the timelines that people expected or wanted, but I do believe that it has laid the foundation for our ultimate success in Iraq." Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham proved to be General Casey's sharpest critics on the panel, taking issue with his performance since he took command in 2004 and noting that the Bush administration's decision to dispatch more troops to Iraq to secure Baghdad represented a rejection of the general's recommendations.

Mr. McCain, a candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, also criticized General Casey for giving what he called "optimistic and rosy scenarios" about progress in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0126151

In response, General Casey conceded that the situation in Baghdad now was “definitely deteriorating.” He said he supported the new Bush strategy, which he described as an “enhancement” of his approach, and noted that he had asked for and received additional troops at least six times.

But he said that his guiding philosophy, one that was widely shared until recently by senior administration officials, had been to ask for the minimum number of American forces, both to hold down casualties and to avoid deterring Iraq’s government from taking responsibility for its own security.

The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said General Casey’s comments about wanting only two brigades, or about 7,000 troops, to secure Baghdad, reflected his initial views last year in discussions with the White House.

“There were a number of conversations, and the president — after talking with General Casey and other commanders — came to the conclusion that he preferred to have five brigades into Baghdad and 4,000 marines into Anbar,” Mr. Snow said. “What General Casey was talking about is some suggestions he’d made earlier. The president has made his decision, and it does reflect the wisdom of a number of combatant commanders and it does have the assent of General Casey.”

Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who is the committee chairman, told reporters after the hearing that General Casey had his support and that of a majority of members. A committee vote on his nomination is likely next week, Mr. Levin said.

A Congressional Budget Office estimate released Thursday concluded that sending additional troops to Iraq could cost $20 billion if the forces remained for a year but $9 billion if the forces stayed for only four months. As much as $15 billion would pay for the 15,000 support troops that the budget office assumed might be needed along with the 21,500 troops in combat units being sent by the Bush administration.

The budget office said it reached the estimate by looking at the ratio of combat troops to support troops already in Iraq. But an Army official said the estimate overstated the cost of the deployment because, with a large contingent of Army support troops already in Iraq and Kuwait, only about 3,000 support troops were likely to be required. The official said the Army did not have its own estimate of the costs.

Meanwhile, Michael McConnell, the Bush administration’s nominee to be the next director of national intelligence, said that a long-awaited intelligence analysis about Iraq would be delivered to lawmakers on Friday. The so-called national intelligence estimate will give the assessment of America’s 16 intelligence agencies about the sectarian violence and prospects in Iraq.

Casey's Iraq Leadership Is Criticized At Hearing (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — The U.S. general responsible for the Army's Iraq war strategy for the past two years was berated by leading Senate critics Thursday for American military failures in Iraq and was accused of providing unduly optimistic assessments of progress as U.S. fortunes sagged.

Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. appeared before the Senate panel weighing his nomination to be the next Army chief of staff in a hearing that was unusually tense at times as senators who support the troop increase recently ordered by President Bush took Casey to task for his leadership of the war.

"I question seriously the judgment that was employed in your execution of your responsibilities in Iraq," Sen. John McCain, R.-Ariz., told Casey. "And we have paid a very, very heavy price in American blood and treasure because of what is now agreed to by literally everyone as a failed policy."

Casey has long been a skeptic of increasing the size of the U.S. force in Iraq, and his testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee amounted to a tepid endorsement at best of Bush's new strategy.

But Casey's appearance reflected the split within the military over Bush's war plan. Many younger commanders and rising officers support the new strategy, with its emphasis on counterinsurgency methods. But some senior military leaders remain skeptical about the ability of U.S. forces to end the sectarian violence.

Although Casey is an unenthusiastic supporter of the new strategy, the White House nominated him to become the chief of staff of the Army in part to recognize his long service in Baghdad. While his new post represents a nominal promotion, it also removes him from the chain of command and limits his direct influence over Iraq policy.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., a supporter of the troop increase, asked Casey if Iraq was secure enough for him to visit downtown Fallujah.

"You could," Casey said.

"Well," Graham shot back, "I asked to go, and they wouldn't let me."

A majority of committee members appeared to support Casey's nomination. Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the chairman, said he expected a vote on Casey next week.

DOJ_NMG_0126152

"I think he is qualified to be chief of staff of the Army," Levin said, "and he should not be held responsible for the key mistakes that were made in Iraq and the way policy was set by civilians."

Casey said he supported the president's new approach and acknowledged some past mistakes. But he continued to emphasize the importance of training the Iraqis and said that the military might not need all of the 21,500 troops Bush is sending to Baghdad.

In December, Casey said he asked for two extra brigades -- about 7,000 soldiers -- to improve security in Baghdad. When Bush offered five brigades, Casey said the remaining three could serve elsewhere as a flexible reserve force.

That contrasts sharply with the plan laid out by his successor, Gen. David H. Petraeus, who is expected to move all five brigades into Baghdad once he assumes his new command in Iraq, a move expected soon.

Attempting to head off perceptions that top commanders disagree with the president, White House spokesman Tony Snow said Thursday that Casey supports the Bush plan.

"What General Casey was talking about is some suggestions he'd made earlier," Snow said. "The president has made his decision, and it does reflect the wisdom of a number of combatant commanders. And again, it does have the assent of General Casey."

On several occasions, Casey described the new strategy as an "Iraqi plan." "They came up with the plan," Casey said. "They will lead the plan."

But it was clear in questioning that the Americans had drafted or at least heavily influenced development of the "Iraqi plan."

Casey said he came to the conclusion that a buildup was needed in mid-November, after he had asked Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the day-to-day military commander, for a reassessment of security operations in Baghdad. That analysis suggested the need for the two additional brigades.

The Iraqis presented a rough security plan when Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki met in Jordan in November. However, Casey said there was no talk of extra troops.

"There was not a long discussion about the plan that they presented. They basically passed it across the table," Casey said. "And it was actually quite a short discussion."

When pressed by Levin, Casey acknowledged that al-Maliki was not enthusiastic about the American troop increase.

"He leans toward not wanting to have to bring in more coalition forces," Casey said.

Casey said he still thought two additional brigades would be enough to improve security in Baghdad. But the three additional Brigades being called to Iraq would give military commanders "flexibility," Casey said.

"I said, in my mind, the other three brigades should be called forward after an assessment has been made of the situation on the ground and whether or not there has been success in the mission in the Baghdad area," Casey said.

A year-long buildup of 20,000 additional troops in Iraq would cost $11 billion for the combat forces alone and could reach $27 billion if additional support personnel are included, the Congressional Budget Office said in an estimate issued Thursday.

The estimates, which came at the request of leading Democrats on the House Armed Services Committee, raised concerns among war critics, who said the figures were much higher than the administration had been claiming since the buildup was announced last month.

Casey faced the toughest questioning from McCain, who has long been a critic of the generals' refusal to commit more troops to restive western Iraq or to request more forces for the fight in Iraq.

However, Casey insisted that his strategy had been on the right track, angering members of the committee who support the troop increase. McCain took issue with what he said was Casey's overly optimistic portrayal.

"You'll need to explain why your assessment of the situation in Iraq has differed so radically from that of most observers," McCain said, "and why your predictions of future success have been so unrealistically rosy."

In recent weeks, Bush's top military advisers and new nominees have offered dire assessments of Iraq and have cataloged what they see as mistakes.

"So you disagree with the secretary of Defense, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Admiral Fallon that we had a failed policy?" McCain asked Casey.

"I do, senator," Casey responded. "I do not believe that the current policy has failed."

Later in the hearing, Levin took up the same line of questioning, asking Casey if he would dispute Bush's statement that the strategy followed last year was leading to "a slow failure."

Casey insisted that things were improving under his watch.

"I actually don't see it as slow failure," Casey said. "I actually see it as slow progress."

Suicide Bombers Attack Busy Market, Killing 45 (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0126153

BAGHDAD — A pair of suicide bombers detonated explosives among shoppers in a crowded outdoor market Thursday in a Shiite city south of Baghdad. The attack killed 45 people and wounded 150.

Separately, bombs and a mortar attack killed at least 17 others in both Shiite and Sunni areas of Baghdad.

The two bombers strolled into the Maktabat market in the center of Hillah around 6 p.m., when the area was packed with shoppers buying food for the evening meal.

One of the bombers detonated his explosives when he was approached by police, and the other blew himself up moments later, according to a police spokesman, Capt. Muthanna Khaled, who gave the casualty figures.

The blasts hurled the bodies of victims through the air and set fire to wooden stalls where vendors sold fruits and vegetables. Some shoppers fled, screaming in panic, while others stopped to help rescuers carry away the wounded.

Mohammed Diya of Hillah General Hospital said some of the wounded were in critical condition.

Qassim Abed Sadah, 33, a bookseller, said the first explosion blew him out of his chair. He raced to the door of his shop as the second blast occurred. "People were flying in the air," he said.

Pools of blood were scattered along the market streets, along with bits of fruits and vegetables. Paramedics wearing white gloves roamed through the area removing body parts.

No group claimed responsibility for the attack in Hillah, a Shiite city in a religiously mixed province.

Sectarian violence flared in both Shiite and Sunni areas of Baghdad, where U.S. and Iraqi forces prepared for a major security crackdown — the third in a year.

Six people died and 12 were wounded when a car bomb exploded on Rashid Street in the mostly Shiite heart of the capital.

A bomb on a public bus killed six and wounded eight in the Shiite commercial district of Karradah.

Mortar rounds slammed into the Sunni district of Azamiyah, killing five people and wounding 12.

"What have we done to be attacked like this almost every day?" asked Saad Abdul-Karim, 50, whose son was wounded when a mortar round struck their home.

Police found the bullet-riddled bodies of 33 men scattered across the Iraqi capital.

Elsewhere, a U.S. soldier died Thursday of wounds suffered two days ago in Anbar province. Three civilians were killed in separate shootings in the city of Mosul, and a policeman died in a car bombing in the city of Qaim.

Fleeing One Bomb, Iraqi Shoppers Die In Blast Of Another (WP)

By Ernesto Londono And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 1 -- The man looked suspicious.

Without speaking a word, police officer Ahmed Eid Majood, guarding one of the entrances to the bazaar in the southern Iraqi city of Hilla, lunged toward the man and wrapped his arms around his body.

At that moment, the man detonated a belt packed with explosives, killing the officer and dozens of other people Thursday afternoon, a police spokesman said. The blast sent a throng of shoppers at the covered market rushing toward another exit.

There, a second attacker detonated his bomb, laced with nails and shards of metal, killing far more people than the first, Capt. Muthana Ahmed said.

The bombers killed at least 63 people and injured more than 150, but Ahmed and hospital officials said the death toll could rise because many of the injuries being treated Thursday night were life-threatening. More than 40 Iraqi civilians and police died in other violence across the country, officials said.

The twin bombings in Hilla were the latest mass killing of Shiite Muslims in recent weeks, raising the possibility that Shiite militias would increase their retaliatory attacks against Sunnis. The U.S. and Iraqi governments are in the early stages of a new security plan intended to pacify Baghdad and some other parts of the country.

In Hilla, "people were going up and down the market as usual," said Mohammed Saaid, 39, who was working in his sweets shop. "Suddenly there was thunder and lightning, and corpses were everywhere, and people were cut into pieces."

The explosions came about a minute apart, police and witnesses said. They shattered windows and destroyed dozens of small shops that dot the marketplace near the Euphrates River.

"I was confused and terrified," Saaid said in a telephone interview shortly after the attack. "I went out of my shop to check on my neighbors, and I saw a flood of blood. Men, women, children -- all dead."

Hilla, which is about 60 miles south of Baghdad, has experienced violence since the war began, but it is one of the least scarred cities in the country. The bazaar has been targeted twice before, by a suicide bomber and an improvised explosive device, each attack killing a handful of people.

Dozens of wounded were taken to nearby Hilla Hospital, where doctors devised additional operating rooms. Scores of seriously injured people were turned away to give priority to those in more dire condition.

DOJ_NMG_0126154

"We are prepared, but not for such an amount of patients," Talib Ali, a doctor at the hospital, said in a telephone interview. "We had to call doctors who are on vacation and those who had already left for their houses."

Violence broke out at the hospital entrance as police clashed with survivors and relatives struggling to get into the seven-story building, witnesses and medical personnel said.

"Most of the wounded are in critical condition, and it's possible that many of them will die," the doctor said. "We have a shortage of bandages, and some of the wounds are being cleaned with Kleenex."

After the morgue filled up, hospital staffers laid the corpses outside in body bags, the supply of which also ran out.

Laith Shahid, 34, who owns a pickle store in the bazaar, suffered burns on his arms and serious cuts on both legs from flying debris. He was quickly examined at the hospital.

"They gave me two tubes of ointment and sent me home," he told a local journalist who relayed the comments to The Washington Post but asked that her name be withheld for security reasons.

People who live near the market began walking toward the hospital to donate blood, a witness said.

Ali Dabbagh, a spokesman for Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said Thursday that Iraq will host a regional security conference next month that will include Syria and Iran -- two neighboring countries with which the United States has declined to engage as part of its diplomatic and military efforts to secure and stabilize Iraq.

Dabbagh said at a news conference that a suspension of flights between Baghdad and Damascus, the Syrian capital, was unrelated to the security plan. Officials had said Wednesday that the suspension was a preliminary step in security efforts designed to tighten control of the borders. Dabbagh said the company that charters the flights fell behind on paperwork and would resume operations within days.

Other attacks were reported Thursday in various parts of the country. A car bomb exploded near the entrance to the law school at Salahaddin University in Tikrit, killing seven and wounding 23, according to Saad Salman, an Interior Ministry spokesman.

In Baghdad, a bomb was detonated inside a small bus in the commercial Karrada area, killing eight people and wounding 12.

In Qaim, near the Syrian border, a suicide bomber attacked near a police checkpoint, killing one officer, according to Hameed Ataallah, a doctor who treated people injured in the blast. It was the third attack on police since the U.S. military turned over control of security to local officials a month ago.

At least 25 other people were slain in mortar attacks, shootings and bombings elsewhere in the country, the ministry spokesman said.

Also Thursday, the U.S. military announced the death in combat Tuesday of a soldier in Anbar province in western Iraq. His name will be released after relatives are informed.

Special correspondents Naseer Nouri and Saad al-Izzi contributed to this report.

Iraq Suicide Bombers Kill 60 And Wound 150 In Market In Southern City (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 1 — Twin suicide bombers struck a market jammed with people in the southern Iraqi town of Hilla on Thursday, killing at least 60, wounding 150 and spraying body parts so far that the police were still scouring rooftops for them late in the night.

Residents there were catching up on their shopping after the Shiite holiday of Ashura. A student at a local high school, Ali Mohammad, said he and two friends had just left the school gym and were about to make some purchases when the first bomb went off at a checkpoint on the edge of the market. The leader of a local commando unit said the bomber set off a suicide vest when a policeman at the checkpoint discovered it during a search.

Seconds later, a second bomb went off. “I was hit in the leg, a small wound,” Mr. Mohammad said. “I was so scared, I didn’t help my friends. I just left them in the area and went home.”

Later he found them both in a local hospital, one dead, one with a leg blown off. The commando leader said the hospital was so overwhelmed with casualties that it was forced to turn some people away after dispensing whatever medicine was available.

The explosions were the latest incidents in a wash of violence that has swept over a belt of Shiite-controlled Iraq starting about 30 miles south of Baghdad and stretching about 70 miles farther south. Besides Hilla, the regional capital, the belt contains the Shiite holy cities of Najaf and Karbala.

DOJ_NMG_0126155

The reasons for the violence are unclear, although American and Iraqi officials cite increasing rivalries between armed Shiite groups, possible meddling by neighboring countries like Iran, and sectarian hatreds between Sunni and Shiite Arabs. A mixture of the two groups populates the northern part of the belt, while the southern part is overwhelmingly Shiite.

In Baghdad, which sometimes resembles a deadly dartboard where citizens can die at any time, relentless shelling, bombing and other violence killed at least 46 people. Mortar shells rained down in the Adhamiya, Qahira and Khadamiya neighborhoods, killing at least five and wounding 33, an Interior Ministry official said.

Elsewhere in the city, a suicide bomber detonated the minibus he was driving near St. Raphael Hospital in the Karada neighborhood, killing 6 and wounding 12. A parked car blew up in Rusafa Square in central Baghdad, killing three and wounding nine. The official said 30 bodies of unidentified people had been found dumped around Baghdad on Thursday, apparently the victims of death squads.

Outside Baghdad, two carloads of gunmen stormed a college at Diyala University and killed the dean and his son before driving off. And a car bomb attack on an Iraqi police and Army convoy in Qaim, a town on the Syrian border in the desert province of Anbar, killed three and wounded six.

The American military said a soldier died Thursday “from wounds due to enemy action” in Anbar. Following standard procedure, the military gave no details.

The double bombing in Hilla took place only a few hundred yards from the spot where in February 2005 a car bomb killed at least 125 people in the third-deadliest atrocity since the American-led invasion in 2003, according to tabulations kept by The Associated Press.

Suspicion later fell on a young Jordanian man who had apparently been recruited by Al Qaeda as a suicide bomber, but the connection was never proved.

Last summer, a bomb struck the same market, killing at least half a dozen people. Near the Hilla River and called the maktabat or bookstores market, the place now sells everything from vegetables to school supplies, with vendors spreading their wares on carpets and small tables in an elongated area that runs north to south.

Because of the earlier bombings, tall concrete blast walls now surround the market, gates prevent cars from entering and policemen frisk shoppers at checkpoints before they are allowed in. It was at one of those checkpoints that the first bomb exploded about 6 p.m., said Mr. Mohammad, the local student.

As people in the market frantically tried to leave — greatly constrained by the blast walls and checkpoints — the second bomber was waiting where people were funneled through one of the main gates, Mr. Mohammad said.

Huge Force Readying Crackdown In Baghdad (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, February 2, 2007

U.S. Army engineers have torn down houses and surrounded the newly cleared space with razor wire atop concrete blast walls for neighborhood bases, the first outward signs of the coming Baghdad security crackdown.

American and Iraqi commanders are pulling together a force that numbers — on paper at least — about 90,000 troops for what many see as a last-chance drive to curb the debilitating violence that has turned Baghdad into a battleground and killed — according to the United Nations — more than 34,000 civilians last year alone.

"This will be a difficult mission and time is not on our side," Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who will soon take over the U.S. command in Iraq, said in written testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee last month.

In the past eight months, two U.S.-Iraqi security missions have failed to rout gunmen, bombers, suicide attackers and the death squads that haunt Baghdad's streets after dark. The U.S. military blamed Iraq's Shiite-dominated government for its inability to muster sufficient troops.

Of the 90,000-troop force now assembling for a new try at calming the capital, more than half were to be Iraqi soldiers and police, a large majority of whom are Shiite Muslims.

It remains an open question whether those forces will be any more inclined this time to battle heavily armed fellow Shiite militiamen or Sunni insurgents, including al-Qaida in Iraq and its suicide bombers.

This operation to sweep the capital of Sunni insurgents and Shiite militiamen was widely expected to begin early this month. But a senior Iraqi general told The Associated Press this week that "preparations are not complete."

The general refused to say how many of an expected influx of about 8,000 Iraqi forces had arrived — as advertised — from the Kurdish north, the Shiite south or Fallujah, in the insurgent stronghold of Anbar province west of Baghdad.

Local commanders, however, said only about 2,000 of the additional troops had reached Baghdad or were nearby. The general and the commanders all spoke on condition of anonymity because of security reasons.

DOJ_NMG_0126156

The Baghdad security plan, announced Jan. 6 by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and four days later by President Bush, includes an infusion of 21,500 additional American troops to Iraq, 17,500 of them to Baghdad.

The U.S. Congress, with a new Democratic majority, has been embroiled for weeks in debate about sending more Americans to a conflict that already has stretched to nearly four years and taken the lives of nearly 3,100 U.S. service members and hundreds more American contract workers.

And departing U.S. commander Gen. George Casey told a Senate panel Thursday he didn't think such a large additional force was necessary.

"I believe that the job in Baghdad, as it's designed now, can be done with less than that," Casey said. "But having the flexibility to have the other three brigades on a deployment cycle gives us and gives Gen. Petraeus great flexibility."

U.S. and Iraqi officials say the United States plans to have about 41,000 troops in Baghdad and the region when all additional 17,500 American forces arrive by late spring. There are currently about 15,000 in and around the capital and an estimated 8,500 were expected to arrive from other parts of the country.

The Iraqis say they have about 22,000 troops in the capital, more than half at the airport and in two nearby towns. There about 20,000 police and Interior Ministry troops and commandos also in the city, according the Defense and Interior ministries. The additional 8,000 scheduled to arrive from elsewhere would put the total Iraqi forces at about 50,000.

But the overall Iraq troop count is an extrapolation from the number of battalions deployed or on the way. Experience has shown far fewer troops show up.

"The Iraqi numbers are probably inflated. Battalions that should contain 800 men usually have no more than 200-300, if that," said retired Army Col. Douglas Macgregor, an adviser to former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in 2003.

An Iraqi army brigade from Irbil, about 3,000 men in principle, will have at most 1,500 men when it finally arrives in Baghdad. The commander says 95 percent of the men don't speak Arabic. A brigade from Sulaimaniyah, also in the Kurdish north, has reached the Muthana Airport in central Baghdad, but it is only 1,000-men strong, not the expected 3,000.

Three brigades each were expected from the 8th and 10th army divisions in the south of the country. Some of the troops have reached positions outside Baghdad, but their force-strength was not known.

U.S. military officials have said that about one-third of any Iraqi unit is missing at any given time because soldiers must return to their home towns and villages to deliver their paychecks to families. Iraq's banking system is too primitive to allow the electronic transfer of money.

And those absences do not include soldiers missing because they don't want to serve in a particular mission. There are no laws against failure to muster for the country's new, volunteer force.

But U.S. preparations were moving ahead in Baghdad.

In the tough Ghazaliyah neighborhood, a Sunni enclave in northwest Baghdad, Army engineers put up the concrete blast walls topped with razor wire to enclose a region where six homes were cleared. The area, including open space surrounding the structures, will house the 1st Cavalry Division's Company C, 2nd Battalion, 12th Cavalry Regiment.

"Command Outpost Wildcard is under construction to allow soldiers to quickly respond to violence and crime in the area. The former residents of the homes were paid to vacate the area homes and have relocated," the military said in a statement. It could not be learned what compensation was paid to those who surrendered their homes.

A brigade of the 82nd Airborne has arrived in Baghdad as part of the Bush-ordered infusion of troops. Four more brigades were to arrive between now and the end of May. The next arriving unit was to be the 4th Brigade, 1st Infantry Division, based at Ft. Riley, Kan., which will deploy in February.

The 3rd Brigade, 3rd Infantry Division, based at Ft. Benning, Ga., will deploy in March. The 4th Stryker Brigade, 2nd Infantry Division, based at Ft. Lewis, Wash., in April, and the 2nd Brigade, 3rd Infantry Division, based at Ft. Stewart, Ga., in May.

The Marine Corps will extend two reinforced infantry battalions for approximately 60 days. Additionally, the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit (Special Operations Capable) will remain in Iraq for approximately 45 additional days. The 1st Brigade, 34th Infantry Division, Minnesota Army National Guard, will be extended in its current mission for up to 125 days and will redeploy not later than August.

Marines Battle Their Past In An Iraqi City (LAT)

By Tony Perry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

A new batch of troops tries to win over Haditha, where 24 civilians were slain by their predecessors.

HADITHA, IRAQ — More than a year after two dozen civilians were killed here in what prosecutors call an appalling case of wanton murder by four Marines, a new batch of troops is trying to win the hearts and minds of the public.

DOJ_NMG_0126157

But as they patrol the narrow, winding streets and try to protect themselves from a deadly, unseen enemy, the November 2005 incident hangs like dust in the air.

"I think about it because I want to give them the right image about Americans," said Lance Cpl. Bryan Bates, 21, of Tucson, who has picked up a working knowledge of Arabic. "I know some of them feel scared because of what happened. I try to be more friendly."

Complicating the situation is the fact that many residents don't even consider the case, which involves the most serious charges levied against Marines in Iraq, the worst transgression by U.S. forces in Haditha since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

On two occasions, Marines assigned to build trust and goodwill in Haditha were moved to the larger city of Fallouja to participate in major offensives against Sunni Arab insurgents. While the Marines were gone, insurgents flooded into Haditha, massacring police officers and other townspeople who had cooperated with the Americans.

The dozens of deaths have resulted in suspicion and hostility and made the Marine mission here exceedingly difficult and dangerous.

"The betrayal [by the U.S.] of the tribes and the local leadership … has created a climate that we've struggled mightily to make right," said Capt. Matt Tracy, commander of Echo Company of the Hawaii-based 2nd Battalion, 3rd Marine Regiment, which occupies a former school near the town center.

When Echo Company arrived in September, the Marines found themselves under constant attack. The company was averaging a casualty a day in its first 45 days.

"I looked at the numbers and said, 'None of us are going to survive at this rate,' " Tracy said. "I realized we had to fight a different way."

The new methods include berms around the city, controlled access points and a car registration program. If people are caught driving without registration, their keys and car batteries are confiscated.

Officers remind Haditha-bound troops to follow the rules of engagement and the laws of war, both of which call for protection of civilians. A general also lectures them on not being slow to protect themselves against an enemy that is well-armed and known to hide among women and children.

Navy corpsman Patrick Horgan, 36, of Aurora, Colo., said the 2005 case had made troops more cautious.

"Everybody knows to be smart about it and make sure you can take a shot safely," he said. "What happened here has definitely increased awareness about the rules, which I think is important."

But there is also a feeling that only troops who have patrolled the streets of Haditha can understand the pressures the Marines experienced in 2005.

"They were set up for an ambush, it wasn't a massacre," said Cpl. Paul Brodner, 20, of San Diego. "No Marine would do anything like that except if he were fighting for his life."

An Iraqi interpreter working for the Marines, who was with the troops in 2005, says he hopes more information about the slayings will come out during court-martials.

"The Marines were attacked and they responded," said the interpreter, who asked that he be identified only as John. "They made mistakes, but they did what you do when you're ambushed."

Lt. Col. Jim Donnellan said it was only natural that Marines now on patrol think about those members of the Camp Pendleton-based 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, who face criminal charges.

"When a Marine reads about Marines of the same age, and operating in the same city, accused of such heinous things, he can't help but have that in the back of his mind," Donnellan said.

Officers also accused

Courts-martial, which could be held this summer, will also determine the fate of four Marine officers accused of failing to thoroughly investigate the slayings. Military lawyers were in Haditha last month questioning witnesses.

Prosecutors allege that the Marines went on a rampage after one comrade was killed and two were wounded by a roadside bomb. Defense attorneys say the troops were following regulations that allow for throwing fragmentation grenades into a room where armed insurgents are thought to be hiding.

In the months after the invasion of Iraq, the Marines had been making headway in Haditha, a community of about 50,000 along the Euphrates River where many of the male residents worked on the railroad, the hydroelectric dam and the phosphate and concrete plants, which are largely shut down now. Officials and police teamed up with the Americans to provide intelligence about the insurgency.

In April 2004, the Marines were ordered to attack Fallouja after a mob killed four American private security contractors. The men's bodies were burned and two were hung from a bridge.

After the Marines left Haditha, insurgents killed several local officials, rounded up a dozen police officers and killed them before a crowd at a soccer field. They also kidnapped a group of police recruits and beheaded nine of them.

DOJ_NMG_0126158

The Marines returned after the White House halted the assault on Fallouja. But the fight was renewed in November 2004, and again the Marines left for the larger city about 100 miles down the Euphrates.

For a second time, murder and brutality ensued in Haditha, including an attack on a female doctor whose hands were chopped off because she wore a short-sleeved blouse.

When the Marines returned in 2005, doors were closed to them and the insurgents were in control.

Police Chief Col. Farouk Tayh Hardan is a former army officer whose brother was among the police recruits kidnapped. He's a hard-liner who would prefer to kill insurgents without such niceties as arrests and trials.

The 2005 case, he said, was tragic but understandable in the chaos of war. Many Haditha residents, he noted, are former Iraqi military officers.

"They know that any military makes mistakes, including with innocent children," he said. "We hope it never happens again, particularly with women and children."

Since the berms went up and the car registration effort began, attacks against U.S. troops have dropped sharply. Sheiks have encouraged tribe members to join the police force and hundreds have done so.

Roadside bombing

Still, duty in Haditha and two smaller cities remains one of the most dangerous assignments in Iraq. Since September, Donnellan's 900-man battalion has suffered 19 deaths, and 132 troops have been wounded. The relative peace was shattered in mid-January when two Marines were severely wounded by a roadside bomb while on a walking patrol.

The 2nd Battalion is scheduled to leave in early spring and another Marine unit has been assigned to take its place. But the long-term prospects for Marines in Haditha are unclear, as the White House reevaluates its strategy for Baghdad and Al Anbar province.

"The last thing any Marine wants is to leave prematurely and see these people suffer, again," Capt. Tracy said.

What happened on Nov. 19, 2005, may also have exacerbated a tendency among Haditha residents to believe tales about Marine misconduct, some thought to be circulated by insurgents or their sympathizers.

Each week Donnellan holds an open meeting with sheiks and others. Much of it is devoted to dispelling rumors or, if one seems plausible, promising to investigate.

Among the recent rumors: The Marines forced women to kneel before them, the Marines shot and killed an Iraqi police officer, the Marines threw oranges at women, an Iraqi police officer shot a colleague and the Marines have done nothing.

"I listen and realize some of it is just … hyperbole that is part of their culture, but some of it is that there is really something bothering them," Donnellan said. "There's a lot of history here, and a lot of it is bad."

tony.perry@latimes.com

Who's To Blame For The Killing (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

This week the internecine warfare in Iraq, already bewildering -- Sunni vs. Shiite, Kurd vs. Arab, jihadist vs. infidel, with various Iranians, Syrians and assorted freelancers thrown into the maelstrom -- went bizarre. In one of the biggest battles of the war, Iraqi troops reinforced by Americans wiped out a heavily armed, well-entrenched millenarian Shiite sect preparing to take over Najaf, kill the moderate Shiite clergy (including Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani) and proclaim its leader the returned messiah.

The battle was a success -- 263 extremists killed, 502 captured. But the sight of the United States caught within a Shiite-Shiite fight within the larger Shiite-Sunni civil war can lead only to further discouragement of Americans, who are already deeply dismayed at the notion of being caught in the middle of endless civil strife.

There are, of course, many reasons for these schisms. Some, like the fundamental division between Sunni and Shiite, are ancient. Some of the wounds are more contemporary, most notably the social devastation and political ruin brought upon the country by 30 years of Saddamist totalitarianism and its particularly sadistic persecution of Shiites and Kurds.

America comes and liberates them from the tyrant who kept everyone living in fear, and the ancient animosities and more recent resentments begin to play themselves out to deadly effect. Tens of thousands of Iraqis have died, the overwhelming majority of them killed by Sunni insurgents, Baathist dead-enders and their al-Qaeda allies who carry on the Saddamist pogroms.

Much of their killing -- the murder of innocent Shiites in their mosques and markets -- is bereft of politics. It is meant to satisfy instead an atavistic hatred of the Shiite heresy. The late al-Qaeda leader in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, was even chided by headquarters in Afghanistan for his relish in killing Shiites for the sport of it.

Iraqis were given their freedom, and yet many have chosen civil war. Among all these religious prejudices, ancient wounds, social resentments and tribal antagonisms, who gets the blame for the rivers of blood? You can always count on some to find the blame in America. "We did not give them a republic," insists Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria. "We gave them a civil war."

DOJ_NMG_0126159

Of all the accounts of the current situation, this is by far the most stupid. And the most pernicious. Did Britain "give" India the Hindu-Muslim war of 1947-48 that killed a million souls and ethnically cleansed 12 million more? The Jewish-Arab wars in Palestine? The tribal wars of post-colonial Uganda?

We gave them a civil war? Why? Because we failed to prevent it? Do the police in America have on their hands the blood of the 16,000 murders they failed to prevent last year?

Thousands of brave American soldiers have died trying to counter, put down and prevent civil strife. They fight Sunni insurgents in Fallujah, Ramadi and Baghdad, trying to keep them from sending yet one more suicide bomber into a crowded Shiite market. They hunt Shiite death squads in Baghdad to keep them from rounding up random Sunnis and torturing them to death. Just this week, we lost two helicopter pilots who were supporting the troops on the ground fighting the "Soldiers of Heaven" outside Najaf to prevent the slaughter of innocents in a Shiite-Shiite war within a war.

Our entire strategy has been to fight one side and then the other to try to prevent sectarian violence -- a policy that has been one of the leading reasons Americans are ready to quit and walk away. They can understand one-front wars, but they can't understand two-, three- and four-front wars, with Americans fighting any and all in sequence and sometimes in combination.

And at the political level, we've been doing everything we can to bring reconciliation. We got the Sunnis to participate in elections and then in parliament. Who is pushing the Shiite-Kurdish coalition for a law that would distribute oil revenue to the Sunnis? Who is pushing for a more broadly based government to exclude Moqtada al-Sadr and his sectarian Mahdi Army?

We have made a lot of mistakes in Iraq. But when Arabs kill Arabs and Shiites kill Shiites and Sunnis kill all in a spasm of violence that is blind and furious and has roots in hatreds born long before America was even a republic, to place the blame on the one player, the one country, the one military that has done more than any other to try to separate the combatants and bring conciliation is simply perverse.

It infantilizes Arabs. It demonizes Americans. It willfully overlooks the plainest of facts: Iraq is their country. We midwifed their freedom. They chose civil war.

letters@charleskrauthammer.com

U.S. Says Iran Meddles In Iraq But Is Delaying Release Of Data (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — President Bush's national security advisers have ordered a delay in publication of evidence intended to support Washington's contention that Iran supplies lethal technology and other aid to militias in Iraq, senior administration officials said Thursday.

The decision was described by officials who were struggling to explain why American officials in Baghdad have twice canceled plans to present the evidence, delays that have raised questions about the quality of the intelligence.

Some administration officials said there was a continuing debate about how well the information proved the Bush administration's case.

One official who has reviewed elements of the briefing said the decision to delay it — made by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser — was also motivated by concern about potentially disclosing the sources of the intelligence, and by a debate over what might be the most politically opportune moment to press the case that Iran is the source of some of the most deadly attacks on American and Iraqi forces.

Ten days ago the American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, told reporters that within a few days the United States would disclose its evidence that Iran was supplying the militias. He had been angered by an accusation by the Iranian ambassador in Baghdad that Washington had no evidence of illicit Iranian activity.

That event was put off, rescheduled for the middle of this week. The briefing was to have consisted of a PowerPoint presentation showing weapons picked up in Iraq, their serial numbers and other evidence tying them to manufacture in Iran.

But on Thursday American officials said that the briefing in Baghdad had been postponed again, until next week at the earliest, and that it had been reduced in size. For example, they said, it will not include details of evidence gathered when Iranians were seized in a raid in Baghdad at the end of December.

Some American allies who have seen some of the evidence say it still falls short of an air-tight case. But the main reason for the delay appears to be rooted in the delicate politics of dealing with Iran.

"We don't want to create the impression that we are steaming toward confrontation," said one senior State Department official familiar with the debate. "Some people are worried about how quickly the rhetoric has ratcheted up."

DOJ_NMG_0126160

President Bush, in an interview on Wednesday with The Wall Street Journal editorial board, said the United States had "made it clear to the Iranians that if we catch them moving weapons, they'll be dealt with." But he quickly added that he was not seeking to "escalate the conflict," and said he was certain "we can solve this peacefully."

During an interview on NPR on Thursday, R. Nicholas Burns, an under secretary of state, said that the United States had been tracking Iran's support for Shiite militias in Iraq for approximately two years, and that "there's been increased evidence over that time that Iran has given this kind of assistance to the Shia insurgency groups."

The debate about how, when and whether to release the claims about Iran's activities in Iraq is also an echo of Washington's continuing debate about whether the administration has the credibility to make public evidence about Iran's nuclear program — including data that it has shared with allies but not with the public.

In the most recent case, State Department officials have cautioned that the evidence must be rock-solid. The Pentagon has pressed for its release, to make clear why it is aggressively pursuing Iranians with military or paramilitary connections in Iraq.

The result has been a scramble, in which intelligence agencies have been trying to vet the Pentagon's presentation to ensure that it does not contain claims that are not backed by solid evidence.

"We are trying to scrub this document, because the last thing we want to be accused of is cherry-picking," said one American official familiar with the intelligence about Iran.

Some administration officials admit they are in a bind: on one hand, the longer the White House issues heated statements aimed at Iran without backing them up with facts, the more the administration's case is called into question.

At the same time, rushing to produce a flimsy case that is ultimately discredited could be more damaging in the long run, as was the case with Colin L. Powell's speech to the United Nations Security Council in February 2003, when he was secretary of state, outlining what he portrayed as irrefutable evidence that Iraq possessed chemical and biological weapons.

Curbing Iran In Iraq Gets Trickier (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon And Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Senior Bush administration officials said the U.S. won't block Iran's efforts to establish financial institutions in Iraq, a decision that sets up a delicate balance in U.S. efforts to limit Iranian influence there.

U.S. approval of Iran's economic engagement with Iraq is complicated by allegations by some White House and Pentagon officials that Tehran is training and arming Shiite militias and may be directly targeting American soldiers inside Iraq.

U.S. officials said they are investigating some American and Iraqi claims that Tehran may have played a role in the killings last month of five U.S. soldiers in the Iraqi city of Karbala.

The administration's tough new posture toward Iran is alarming many lawmakers, intelligence officials and military officers, who worry that the White House is exaggerating Iran's connection to attacks inside Iraq in order to justify a future military assault against Iran.

Senior U.S. officials acknowledged yesterday that they had no direct evidence to support this claim, and Iran has long denied accusations that it is supplying weapons to Shiite groups in Iraq or that it has expanded its paramilitary operations inside the country.

The Bush administration has made such charges before but has never been able to provide clear evidence substantiating the allegations. Pentagon and State Department officials this week said they would make public some information proving the connection between Tehran and Iraqi militias, but they have yet to do so.

These officials said the complexity and brazenness of the Karbala attack, in which the assailants disguised themselves in U.S. uniforms in order to enter a compound and abduct American soldiers, is raising suspicions of Iranian involvement.

"It looked like five Americans were taken [in exchange for] for five Iranians," said one U.S. intelligence official working on Iran. Last month, American troops arrested five Iranian diplomats in Irbil, Iraq, on charges they were supplying explosives to Shiite militias -- a charge Tehran denies.

On the economic front, however, U.S. officials said yesterday they aren't going to attempt to prevent Iran from expanding its trade and financial ties with Iraq.

In late January, Iran's ambassador to Iraq surprised U.S. officials by telling the New York Times that Tehran was preparing to significantly increase its financial and trade ties to Iraq. This would include the establishment of at least one branch of Iran's national bank in Iraq, the diplomat said.

U.S. officials had initially reacted coolly to the Iranian plans, but in interviews yesterday, senior Bush administration officials said the U.S. accepted the Iranian economic moves and would make no effort to block them.

Expanded Iranian trade and finance ties with Iraq could help spur economic development and growth in Iraq, the officials said. They also noted that the two countries have the potential to become significant trading partners.

DOJ_NMG_0126161

"We want the Iraqis to have cooperative, fruitful relations with their neighbors," one official said. "We have no problem with a bank and economic relations. That's fine."

The willingness to allow Iranian banks to operate in Iraq comes as the U.S. is trying to shut down Iranian financial activity elsewhere in an effort to pressure Tehran to abandon its alleged nuclear-weapons program.

This senior official cautioned, however, that the administration would oppose any effort by Iran to expand its military assistance to Iraq's government and security forces. Iranian officials in Baghdad in recent days have discussed sending weapons, equipment and military trainers to Iraq in an effort to underpin the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite.

U.S. charges of Iranian involvement in the Karbala attack come as the administration tries to rally public support behind its increasingly aggressive military posture toward Iran. In recent weeks, the U.S. has deployed a second aircraft-carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf and erected Patriot antiballistic-missile batteries in the region, both as warnings to Tehran.

U.S. officials said the two largest Shiite militias in Iraq -- the Badr Brigades, linked to the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and the Mahdi Army of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr -- were receiving sophisticated, late-model rocket-propelled-grenade launchers and roadside bombs from Iran. These weapons have been used in lethal attacks on U.S. and British forces in southern Iraq, U.S. officials said.

"What we're finding in terms of stockpiles and weapons -- you can connect the dots back to Iran," one official said.

The Pentagon and U.S. intelligence agencies are particularly focused on the movement of representatives of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps' elite Qods Force, which focuses on operations outside Iran's borders. Many U.S. intelligence officials believe that it is the Qods Force specifically that has been providing arms and funding to Shiite militias in Iraq. Some intelligence officials also believe the Qods Force has established paramilitary camps inside Iraq to teach Shiite militants how to use advanced weaponry and how to conduct sophisticated types of ambushes, kidnappings and assassinations.

The arrests of Iranian officials in Irbil last month and in Baghdad in December directly targeted the Revolutionary Guards and Qods Force, said U.S. officials. The Pentagon continues to hold the five Iranians detained in Irbil, though the four others detained in Baghdad have been returned to Tehran.

Iraq Fears Being Caught In Middle Of U.S.-Iran Tensions (CHIT)

By Liz Sly

Chicago Tribune, February 2, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Alarmed by rising tensions between the United States and Iran, Iraqi government officials fear their country is in danger of being dragged into the middle of a new conflict between its two main allies.

In the past week, the Bush administration has ratcheted up pressure on Iran, saying it has evidence that Tehran is arming Iraqi insurgents and pledging to hunt down Iranian agents operating in Iraq. That has fueled concerns in Baghdad that Iraq will become the battleground in a showdown between Iran and the U.S., Iraqi officials say.

Iraq's Shiite-led government has warm relations with neighboring Iran, and it does not want that relationship compromised by an increasingly strident posture by Washington toward Tehran, Iraqi officials say.

"We want to maintain good relations with our neighbors, especially Iran," Iraqi government spokesman Ali al- Dabbagh told a news conference Thursday in Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone. "We have long borders with them, we have local interests with [them] and we would like to have this relationship not in the shadow of the others."

Iraq also wants to maintain good relations with the U.S., he added, stressing that Iraq does not condone attacks against U.S. forces in Iraq. "We want good relations with everyone, whether Iran or the U.S.," he said. "The problems between the U.S. and Iran must not get solved in Iraq."

Tensions between the U.S. and Iran have escalated sharply in recent weeks, with the dispatch of additional U.S. warships to the Persian Gulf and the deployment of upgraded Patriot missiles to Gulf Arab countries, fueling speculation across the region that the U.S. is gearing up for a war with Iran.

Bush administration officials insist they do not intend to go to war with Iran. They have defended the targetting of Iranians in Iraq and other moves in the region as necessary to counter Tehran's backing of Iraqi insurgents, which coincides with U.S. efforts to stop Iran from developing a nuclear weapon.

"We've been very clear we don't intend to strike into Iran, in terms of what we're doing in Iraq," Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns told National Public Radio Thursday.

But Iraq's concern is that the U.S. is taking advantage of its presence in Iraqi territory to rein in Iran's rising influence in the region, Iraqi officials say. Earlier this week, the Los Angeles Times reported that the U.S. Air Force is preparing to undertake more aggressive patrols along the Iraq-Iran border to disrupt insurgent supply lines.

DOJ_NMG_0126162

"Any escalation between Iran and the U.S. will be negative for us," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish legislator. "If you exclude the Sunnis, the majority of Iraqis think of Iran as a friend."

Many members of Iraq's Shiite-led government sought refuge in Iran from persecution during the Saddam Hussein era and Iraqi officials regularly visit Tehran. Iran's ambassador to Iraq told The New York Times earlier this week that Iran is preparing a major new military and economic assistance package for Iraq—paralleling the Bush administration's strategy to stabilize Iraq by building up the Iraqi army and police while re-energizing its reconstruction effort.

In many ways, Iraq is already serving as a proxy front in the rivalry for regional influence between Tehran and Washington. The U.S. military raided a diplomatic compound in Erbil last month, detaining five Iranians they accused of being Iranian agents aiding insurgents in Iraq. The Bush administration says it is examining a "mountain of evidence" that Iran is arming Shiite militias to attack U.S. forces.

"To the extent that anybody, including Iranians, are smuggling weapons, bringing in fighters, killing Americans, trying to destabilize the democracy in Iraq, we will take appropriate measures to defend our troops and also to defend the mission," White House spokesman Tony Snow warned this week.

Bush first announced a more aggressive stance toward Iran and also Syria when he unveiled his new strategy for Iraq last month, accusing the two countries of aiding Iraq's insurgency and implicitly rejecting recommendations by the Iraq Study Group that the U.S. open a dialogue with Iran.

Plans to announce further evidence of Iran's support for Iraqi insurgents this week have been postponed, amid reports of disputes among U.S. officials over the quality of the evidence.

The Iraqi government has also tried to make it clear that it does not support Iranian meddling in Iraq. When Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki visited Tehran last fall, he urged his hosts not to intervene in Iraqi affairs.

In an interview with CNN Wednesday, al-Maliki said he had asked both Tehran and Washington to resolve their differences elsewhere.

"We have told the Iranians and the Americans, 'We know that you have a problem with each other, but we are asking you: Please solve your problems outside Iraq,'" said al-Maliki. "We don't want the American forces to take Iraq as a field to attack Iran or Syria."

Any conflict between Iran and the U.S. would put Iraq's government in a difficult position, forced to choose between its two main benefactors, said Othman.

"There's a contradiction because America sees Iran as an enemy, whereas the Iraqi government sees Iran as a friend," he said. "The most important country with influence in Iraq right now is Iran, and these issues should be well and thoroughly discussed between America and Iraq."

The increasingly tough rhetoric from Washington has strained Iraq's relationship with the U.S. at the very moment when the two countries are supposed to be working together to implement Bush's new strategy to stabilize Iraq.

An additional 21,500 U.S. troops are headed for Baghdad and western Anbar province to bolster a new security plan aimed at quelling the steadily escalating sectarian conflict between the city's Shiites and Sunnis and combating the anti-U.S. insurgency.

Support for al-Maliki's government lies at the core of Bush's new strategy, but Washington does not consult with the Iraqi government on its threats to pursue Iranians in Iraq, complained Akram Hakim, State Minister of National Reconciliation, who belongs to the ruling Shiite coalition, the United Iraqi Alliance.

"President Bush says he supports the Iraqi government and he says he supports Prime Minister al-Maliki, but I think that going over the head of the Iraqi government on issues like this is not compatible with those statements," he said.

"When there's a contradiction between what he's doing and what he's saying, it will weaken the Iraqi government and weaken the position of the U.S. administration as well."

"For some time, we in the Iraqi government have been warning about turning Iraq into a battlefield between the U.S. and Iran," he added. "There are many problems between the U.S. and Iran, the U.S. and Syria and the U.S. and Al Qaeda, and we don't want them to make Iraq the battlefield for these problems."

Iraq Plans Summit With Iran And Syria (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi government Thursday invited Iran and Syria to Baghdad for talks next month on regional security, amid growing tension and accusations by the Bush administration of foreign meddling in Iraqi affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0126163

Iraqi officials have not invited the United States to the meeting, which also could include Iraq's other neighbors, the United Nations and the Arab League. The meeting is intended to "promote support for the government of Iraq on security and other issues," said Samir Shakir Mahmoud Sumaidy, the Iraqi ambassador to the United States.

Sumaidy, speaking in Washington, said the summit was part of a series of regional gatherings sponsored by Iraq's fledgling government that have not included nations from outside the region. It is tentatively scheduled to start March 10.

The meeting comes at a time when U.S. officials have accused Iran of meddling in Iraq. The Bush administration also has complained that Syria is allowing foreign fighters to cross into Iraq, and it is urging Sunni Arab neighbors to help stabilize the country by applying pressure on their Sunni Muslim allies in Iraq.

U.S. welcomes meeting

But U.S. officials, who have encouraged the Iraqi government to try to work through security issues and to try to win more economic and political support from its neighbors, reacted positively to the summit announcement Thursday.

"We support such an effort by the Iraqi government," said Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad. "We have ourselves worked with many of Iraq's neighbors to encourage them to support Iraq, diplomatically and politically."

Iraqi officials, while acknowledging that some Iranians have been involved in violence in Iraq, have said they do not want their country to become a military theater in the rivalries of foreign powers.

"The United States is clearly helping us with our security issues," Sumaidy said. But he added, "We don't want to be the battleground for anyone else's fighting each other, or confronting each other."

U.S. and Iraqi military officials are in discussions about American plans to go on the offensive against Iranian agents who are seen as threatening U.S. troops or Iraqis, the Iraqi ambassador said.

Iraqi forces want "maximum coordination" with the American troops on the issue, Sumaidy said. He said U.S. and Iraqi leaders, including Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new U.S. commander in Iraq, might decide that they need to conduct each operation jointly, or at least that the Iraqis be informed of each mission.

The Bush administration has delayed the release of information it says will show Iran is meddling in Iraq, raising concern from some quarters that the evidence is inconclusive.

"Iran is kind of the culprit of the week or the month," said James Dobbins, an international security expert at Rand Corp., who said the Bush administration had produced little compelling evidence that Iran was actively encouraging attacks on U.S. troops in Iraq.

U.S. officials said they were investigating a Jan. 20 insurgent raid in the Shiite Muslim city of Karbala, in which a U.S. soldier was slain and four others were captured before being killed, but have not said whether they believed Iranians were involved.

Some U.S. officials have suspected foreign involvement in the sophisticated attack on a U.S.-Iraqi security compound, which witnesses said was carried out by men wearing American-style uniforms.

"The attack is troubling," Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said, adding that an inquiry was continuing. "There was a level of sophistication to the attack that was concerning."

Whitman would not say who might have been behind the attack. "I know there has been speculation," he said, "but let's let the investigation conclude."

'Very serious' threat seen

In an interview with National Public Radio on Thursday, R. Nicholas Burns, the U.S. undersecretary of State for political affairs, said that Iran posed a "very serious" threat to American interests in Iraq.

Referring to the Karbala attack, Burns said the United States would "try to find those who are responsible and hold them accountable. But right now it's not possible to say exactly who those people were."

President Bush said in his Iraq policy speech Jan. 10 that U.S. forces would go after Iranian agents who threatened Americans. The next day, U.S. troops detained five Iranians during a raid on their office in Irbil, a major city in Iraq's Kurdish north.

Iranian officials long have operated in northern Iraq and have close business ties with Kurdish leaders there. Iranian and Iraqi officials have said the Iranian office issued travel permits and provided other services to Iraqi traders and tourists going to Iran. Iraqi leaders are trying to secure the release of the five men, Iraqi officials have said.

Despite the public face-off, Burns said military conflict with Iran was not inevitable.

"I think that if we're patient and we're skillful, we can have a diplomatic solution to these problems," he said. "We are trying for that diplomatic solution."

Although U.S. officials refuse to open talks with Syria or Iran, other diplomatic contacts in the region have intensified. This week, Zalmay Khalilzad, the outgoing U.S. ambassador to Iraq, traveled to Saudi Arabia, which sent envoys to Iran last month.

DOJ_NMG_0126164

Ex-advisers Offer Revised Iraq Plans (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, February 2, 2007

President Carter's national security adviser said Thursday the Iraq war was likely to lead to "a head-on conflict" with Iran and other parts of the Muslim world.

Zbigniew Brzezinski also told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that Bush administration policy was driven by "imperial hubris" and has proved to be a disaster on historic, strategic and moral grounds.

"If the United States continues to be bogged down in a protracted bloody involvement in Iraq, and I emphasize what I am about to say, the final destination on this downhill track is likely to be a head-on conflict with Iran and with much of the world of Islam at large," Brzezinski said.

Brent Scowcroft, national security adviser to Presidents Ford and George H.W. Bush, said a buildup of U.S. troops in Iraq "might be a positive blip" if it helped stabilize Baghdad. But he said it would not lead to fundamental changes in the situation.

"It is a tactic, not a strategy," he said.

Brzezinski set out as a plausible scenario for military collision: Iraq fails to meet benchmarks set by the U.S., followed by accusations that Iran is responsible for the failure and then a terrorist act or some provocation blamed on Iran. This scenario, he said, would play out with a defensive U.S. military action against Iran.

That, Brzezinski said, would plunge the United States into a quagmire that eventually would range across Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Proposing a massive shift in policy, Brzezinski said the U.S. should announce with no ambiguity its determination to leave Iraq "in a reasonably short period of time."

Brzezinski, a professor at the School for Advanced International Studies, said the U.S. should set with Iraqi leaders a date for the completion of the U.S. military disengagement.

Scowcroft recommended that U.S. troops gradually be deployed away from sectarian conflicts in Iraq, which should Iraqis should handle "however well or badly they are able to handle it."

U.S. troops should concentrate on training the Iraqi army, combating insurgents, limiting outside intervention and helping to protect Iraqi institutions, he said.

"That does not mean that the American presence should be reduced," Scowcroft said. "That should follow success in our efforts, not the calendar or the performance of others."

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

Night stalkers

One of the ways U.S. forces in Iraq prevent the placement of an improvised explosive device (IED) is to watch the roads.

For surveillance, they use several systems, including the slow-moving AC-130 gunship. The aircraft's cannons, machine guns and night-sight capability are the perfect systems for locating and killing IED-placing insurgents.

A video we've seen shows an AC-130 crew spotting two men who converge in their vehicles on a stretch of isolated road in Iraq. The two look around, and then one carries a weapon into a field, methodically walking off into the distance. It would appear he is calibrating how far to place the IED so our soldiers cannot see it, but close enough so the bomb kills them. The man in the second vehicle follows the same procedure.

In the meantime, the gunship's crew is describing what it sees and seeks permission to fire. A voice says, "Smoke 'em." Gunfire hits the first man, then the second. A third emerges from under one of the vehicles and is killed.

Commanders have said the best way to defeat IEDs is to prevent their placement in the first place. IEDs are responsible for 80 percent of Army casualties.

ASAT silence

Sen. Jon Kyl gave a speech to the Heritage Foundation earlier this week and discussed the fallout from China's Jan. 11 anti-satellite (ASAT) weapons test that killed a Chinese weather satellite using a kinetic missile warhead.

The Arizona Republican and veteran of the Senate intelligence committee said the Bush administration has the policy to conduct space defense of U.S. satellites but seems to lack the will.

"The question is whether we have the will to implement it," he said.

"And some recent examples that I'll cite here point to a flagging enthusiasm, I would put it, for space security," Mr. Kyl said. "Look to the administration reaction to the Chinese ASAT test. Since the test was reported, there has been no public statement by the president or any Cabinet official, no mention during the State of the Union speech, no congressional hearings have yet been scheduled, no indication has come out of the Pentagon that the space budget is being in any way revisited. The State Department has provided no specific information about what our diplomats are or are not saying in response to the Chinese provocation."

DOJ_NMG_0126165

Mr. Kyl then noted a comment from a State Department spokesman, who questioned what China's "intentions" were in the test.

"Why do we need to hear from the Chinese exactly what their intentions are?" Mr. Kyl asked. "What intention could possibly be behind the test, save for the capability to blow up satellites in space? Would the State Department believe any alternative explanation if it were given to it?"

White House National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe confirmed that the administration decided on a low-profile response. "We've had Cabinet-level discussions with the Chinese on this that, we think, have been the best course of action," he said.

Israel's Iran worries

A military source tells us the talk among Israeli military officials is how and when to counter Iran's nuclear weapons program, most likely in a pre-emptive attack on Iranian nuclear facilities.

The Israelis know that any attack will require overflying U.S.-dominated Iraq, but one solution would be to set up a secret base in another area between Iran and Israel to refuel Israel's bombers.

The Israelis in recent months have purchased large numbers of U.S. precision-guided joint direct attack munitions, or JDAM, kits for their bombs and special bunker-buster explosives that could be used to destroy underground Iranian nuclear facilities.

Our source said the Israelis know that their attack on Iran would be far bloodier and much more difficult than the daring 1981 bombing attack against Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor.

"They will have to strike during the day to make sure they get the technicians and scientists," the source told us.

Also, an anti-nuclear military strike will cause collateral damage because many of the Iranian nuclear facilities are located close to civilian population centers.

At least 13 Iranian nuclear facilities are known and can be located publicly on Google Earth mapping software. They include facilities at Tehran, Natanz, Arak, Lashkar-Abad, Isfahan, Ardekan, Bushehr and Gachin. Most are underground and have advanced air defense missiles for protection.

Key targets: the Natanz nuclear facility, a military plant about 200 miles south of Tehran that is the location of at least one centrifuge cascade that is thought to be where nuclear fuel for weapons is being developed.

The Bushehr nuclear reactor on the Persian Gulf coast also will be a key target, and any bombing there risks killing scores of Russians who are part of construction crews for the reactor facility.

The Bush administration is hardening its position on Iran but is holding Israel in check from attacking. That said, in 1981, the United States had no warning of the Osirak raid until after the F-16s and F-15s were in the air.

Iranian enigma

Our colleague David R. Sands traveled last month with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates to Iraq and Afghanistan. He filed this report:

It seems our British cousins are having as much trouble as the Pentagon in trying to figure out the Iranians. Two senior British military officers in the Middle East, briefing reporters traveling with Mr. Gates, painted two very different pictures of Tehran's recent record.

The Royal Navy's Commodore Keith Winstanley, Britain's senior naval commander in the region from Jordan to India and deputy commander of the U.S.-led coalition fleet in the Persian Gulf, said there has been no sign of an Iranian reaction in the Gulf to President Bush's decision to dispatch a second carrier strike group to the region, a move widely seen as a warning to Tehran.

"We are not seeing any change in Iranian behavior since the president's announcement," said Commodore Winstanley. "Much of what their naval forces do appears to be defensive in nature.

"If all you do is listen to the rhetoric of [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad, you would think the Iranians are very forward-leading militarily, but it's not so. Our everyday interactions with them in the Gulf are actually extremely cordial."

But Maj. Chris Ormond-King, a spokesman for the British military deployment in Basra, southern Iraq's largest city, said Iranian meddling is palpable among the Shi'ite militias there, even if conclusive evidence is difficult to come by.

"We know that Iranian influence is here, even if we can't prove it. It's money, it's technical support, it's equipment. Our gut feeling is that, yes, there is Iranian influence here."

DOJ_NMG_0126166

The major added, "It's like when you see a car going down the road. You may not be able to prove it's speeding, but when it gets from one place to another so quickly, you can tell."

Iran Leader Calls Nuclear Sanctions Ineffective (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 1 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, under increasing criticism at home, said Thursday that his nation was becoming a superpower and that the United Nations sanctions would not deter it from pursuing its nuclear program.

"We are rapidly becoming a superpower," Mr. Ahmadinejad told reporters after laying flowers on the tomb of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini on the 28th anniversary of the revolution he led in 1979.

"Our strength does not come from military weapons or an economic capability," the ISNA news agency quoted him as saying. "Our power comes from our capability to influence the hearts and souls of people, and this scares them," he added, referring to the West.

"That's why they are using psychological warfare and impose sanctions. But the language of sanctions belongs to the past."

He made no reference to contradictory remarks this week by President Jacques Chirac of France about whether it would be acceptable for Iran to have a nuclear program.

Mr. Ahmadinejad spoke as some conservatives in Iran joined moderates to warn that his dismissiveness toward sanctions by the United Nations Security Council over Iran's nuclear program could have dangerous consequences. The Security Council resolution, passed on Dec. 23, prohibits trade in goods and technology related to Iran's nuclear program. The measure is aimed at curbing Iran's uranium enrichment program, which Iran says is for peaceful purposes but the United States and some European countries contend is for making nuclear weapons.

The recent criticism of Mr. Ahmadinejad has led to speculation that Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the supreme religious leader who has the ultimate authority on all state matters, is allowing such talk in an effort to contain him.

In his only reference to the resolution, Ayatollah Khamenei said Iran would not give up its right to a nuclear program.

Dozens of moderate politicians and several conservatives gathered last week at the office of Mehdi Karroubi, a former speaker of Parliament, to discuss their concerns over the future of Iran.

"Those who don't worry are either unaware of what is happening" or showing that they lack wisdom, said Ismail Gerami Moghadam, a member of Parliament who was at the meeting, the independent daily Etemad Melli reported.

The state-run daily Keyhan joined critics of Mr. Ahmadinejad last week and said "any threat should be taken seriously." The newspaper, which had repeatedly suggested that Iran withdraw from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and proceed with its nuclear program, would be expected to support the president's position.

On Thursday in Vienna, headquarters of the International Atomic Energy Agency, diplomats said Iran had begun installing centrifuges at its uranium enrichment plant at Natanz, Agence France-Presse reported. Iran has said that it plans to install 3,000 of the machines at Natanz soon.

Mr. Ahmadinejad has promised an announcement on the nuclear program during the 10-day anniversary celebration.

Iran President Vows To Push Nuke Program (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, February 2, 2007

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad launched anniversary celebrations Thursday for Iran's Islamic Revolution with a defiant promise to push ahead with the country's controversial nuclear program.

Ahmadinejad suggested Tehran would announce next week that it is beginning to install a new assembly of 3,000 centrifuges in an underground portion of its uranium enrichment facility at Natanz that the U.S. has warned could bring further sanctions against the country.

The Iranian leader said his government is determined to continue with its nuclear program, despite U.N. Security Council sanctions imposed over its refusal to halt uranium enrichment, a process that can produce fuel to generate electricity or for the fissile core of an atomic bomb.

Kicking off 10 days of celebrations to mark the 28th anniversary of the 1979 Islamic revolution that brought hard-line clerics to power, Ahmadinejad said Iran will celebrate next week "the stabilization and the establishment of its full right" to enrich uranium at the facility.

DOJ_NMG_0126167

The chief of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, said last week that he expected Iran to announce "they are going to build up their 3,000 centrifuge facility" in February. There had been speculation the announcement could come during the revolution anniversary.

U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said Iran would face "universal international opposition" over the step. "If they think they can get away with 3,000 centrifuges without another Security Council resolution and additional international pressure, then they are very badly mistaken," Burns said last week

The installation would be a major jump in Iran's uranium enrichment program, though it could take months to set up the 3,000 centrifuges and get them working. In the process, uranium gas is spun at supersonic speeds in a connected array of centrifuges to purify it. Uranium enriched to around 5 percent is used for fuel for a nuclear reactor; enriched to 95 percent, it can be used to build a warhead.

Iran now has two cascades of 164 centrifuges each. Tens of thousands are needed for a continuous program. The status of the new centrifuges has been unclear as Iranian officials gave contradictory statements over the past month. Tehran originally said last year that the installation would begin by the end of 2006, but January came and there was no word the work had started.

On Sunday, an Iranian lawmaker said installation had begun, but he was quickly contradicted by officials from the country's Atomic Energy Organization. Mohammad Saeedi, the agency's deputy head, said, "If we begin to install centrifuges, we will publicly announce it."

Ahmadinejad's remarks Thursday signaled that Iran would begin the installation before Feb. 11 — the final day of nationwide celebrations in memory of the Islamic revolution. He has also called people to the streets that day to show support for the nuclear program.

"Enemies of the Iranian nation ... must know that their wrongful beliefs will be revealed once again during Feb. 11 rallies by the great Iranian nation," he said, according to the state-run news agency.

The United States and many Western countries accuse Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons, a charge Tehran denies. The Security Council has threatened to impose further sanctions on Iran if it continues to refuse to roll back its program.

Iran insists its program is peaceful. It ultimately plans to expand it to 54,000 centrifuges, a large operation enriching more uranium within a shorter period of time.

So far, its two linked chains of 164 machines have been operating sporadically at the above-ground portion of the Natanz facility, producing small quantities of non-weapons grade enriched uranium, International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors say.

Two smaller assemblies underground have been "dry testing" — without gas — since November, they say.

Iranian officials have turned down a request from IAEA inspectors to install cameras in the underground Natanz facility, a U.N. official familiar with Iran's nuclear dossier said in Vienna.

Ahmadinejad, whose hard-line tactics have faced criticism from both reformists and conservatives at home, also hinted Thursday that key decisions in Iran are made by Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, not him.

"The general policies of the system are made by the Exalted Supreme Leader, and the government is required to carry them out," the state news agency quoted Ahmadinejad as saying. "The president, as the head of the country's executive body, pursues and announces the nuclear position."

Iran Has Begun Assembling Centrifuges At Natanz Site: Diplomats (AFP)

By Michael Adler

AFP, February 2, 2007

Iran has begun installing centrifuges at the Natanz site where it plans 3,000 of the machines to enrich uranium in defiance of UN demands to halt this sensitive nuclear activity, diplomats said.

And at the same time it is stopping UN inspectors from installing surveillance cameras in the huge underground hall where the production lines, or cascades, of centrifuges are being set up, the diplomats said.

Both moves mark an escalation in the international showdown with Iran over a nuclear programme which the United States and others suspect is hiding secret development of an atom bomb, and on which the UN Security Council has levied sanctions to force Tehran to halt enrichment.

A diplomat in Vienna, where the UN watchdog International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) is based, told AFP "construction has started (at the underground Natanz facility) but the cascades have not yet been assembled."

Another diplomat said bringing in centrifuge parts had started last week.

But Iran has not yet assembled a complete cascade, the basic unit for beginning actual enrichment, said the diplomats, who asked not to be named due to the confidentiality of the information.

DOJ_NMG_0126168

Uranium enrichment uses centrifuges to make fuel for civilian nuclear reactors but can also produce the explosive material for atom bombs.

IAEA spokeswoman Melissa Fleming refused to comment.

Iran had last weekend given conflicting signals on its disputed nuclear work.

The Islamic republic's atomic energy agency denied the Iranians had started to install the 3,000 centrifuges, shortly after the head of parliament's foreign affairs and national security commission said they had.

Iran is building cascades in units of 164 centrifuges each.

Iran already has two such cascades running above-ground at a pilot enrichment plant at Natanz which would only produce small amounts of enriched uranium.

But the underground plant, protected in a bunker from possible air attack, could if running full tilt produce enough highly enriched uranium for one bomb in nine to 11 months, the London think tank the International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS) has said.

Diplomats said Iran was stopping UN inspectors, who are currently at Natanz, from installing surveillance cameras at the underground site.

The Iranians are "not allowing the IAEA to install the cameras inside the (underground) cascade halls (for centrifuges) in Natanz and are causing further delays in the inspectors' activity," a diplomat who closely monitors IAEA verification work told AFP.

The IAEA monitors the above-ground pilot site with cameras and visits by inspectors and is entitled under the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty to the same sort of presence at the underground facility, as the agency is mandated to monitor the use of nuclear material.

But the Iranians "have not yet introduced nuclear material (feedstock uranium gas) into the centrifuges at the underground site, so there is still time," a second diplomat said.

Another diplomat said: "The game is not over."

The first diplomat said: "The Iranians are now willing to accept the installation of cameras only outside the cascade halls, which will not enable the IAEA to monitor the entire uranium enrichment process."

But another diplomat said that "verification goals can be achieved from inside or outside cascade halls."

A fourth diplomat said: "Whenever something new is done, normally it takes time," referring to problems the IAEA has had in setting up verification equipment in other countries.

The IAEA has been investigating Iran since February 2003 after it was revealed that Tehran had hidden sensitive nuclear activities for 18 years.

But the atomic agency has been unable to conclude its inquest due to what it says is a lack of full cooperation from Iran.

The UN Security Council passed a resolution in December imposing sanctions on Iran for its refusal to halt uranium enrichment.

Iranian leaders have said Iran would make a major announcement on its nuclear programme during the 10 days of celebrations to mark the 28th anniversary of the Islamic revolution starting Thursday.

Iran could be only two or three years away from being able to produce a nuclear weapon, IISS director John Chipman said Wednesday.

Meanwhile, although US President George W. Bush has said the United States has no plans to invade Iran, Washington is isolating the Iranian regime over nuclear suspicions and allegations of complicity in attacks on US troops in Iraq.

Russia Supports A Break For Iran (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

MOSCOW -- Russia yesterday signaled that it backs a "time-out" proposed by the head of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency that calls for holding off on imposing U.N. sanctions if Tehran suspends uranium enrichment.

"We believe the initiative put forward by the IAEA head ... suggesting that Iran suspend uranium enrichment in exchange for the U.N. Security Council's reciprocal step regarding resolution 1737 deserves close attention," the Foreign Ministry said.

Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, proposed the plan at the World Economic Forum in Switzerland to end the standoff between the West and Iran over Iran's suspect nuclear program.

Iran said Sunday that it needed time to review the plan. The Security Council voted unanimously in December to impose limited sanctions on Iran after it ignored demands to halt enrichment.

Moscow May Seek Accord With Tehran On Gas Supply (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

DOJ_NMG_0126169

New York Times, February 2, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 1 — Even as the United States intensifies its efforts to isolate Iran, President Vladimir V. Putin said Thursday that Russia would consider OPEC-like cooperation with Tehran on sales of natural gas. He stopped short of endorsing price fixing, however, saying he was concerned only with ensuring stable supplies for consuming nations.

Mr. Putin reiterated Russia's opposition to Iran acquiring nuclear weapons, but his remarks underscored a widening rift with the United States and its allies over how to force Tehran to comply with United Nations Security Council resolutions.

"We think that the people of Iran should have access to modern technologies, including nuclear ones," he said, adding that "they should choose a variant that will guarantee Iran access to nuclear energy" while complying with their commitment not to build weapons under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Mr. Putin's remarks were delivered as part of his annual winter news conference, an affair that offers journalists an exhaustive, unconstrained opportunity to press him on the issues of the day. He answered 66 questions over the course of three and a half hours, largely without the rancor or prickly defensiveness that has characterized previous sessions.

In the realm of foreign affairs, he denied that Russia used its natural resources as a political tool, and he expressed new opposition to the expansion of NATO, though mildly. He criticized American negotiations to construct components of a national missile defense system in Poland and the Czech Republic, even as he confidently said Russia now possessed the missiles to thwart such defenses.

He also made his most extensive remarks on the poisoning of Alexander V. Litvinenko, the former secret service officer who died of radioactive poisoning in London in November and accused Mr. Putin himself in a deathbed statement.

He dismissed Mr. Litvinenko as a low-level officer in the "convoy troops" who "did not protect any secrets" and who had been fired after being convicted of abusing his office by beating detainees.

"Whatever he could say negatively about his service, he said it a long time ago," he said, suggesting that Mr. Litvinenko's repeated accusations of nefarious activities by Russia's secret services were baseless inventions. The question of his murderer, he said, was a matter for investigators, but he dismissed accusations by some of his own aides that Mr. Putin's enemies had killed Mr. Litvinenko in an attempt to discredit the Kremlin. "I do not believe in conspiracy theories," he said.

On issues at home, he vowed that Russia would hold democratic elections for Parliament in December and for his successor when he steps down in 2008, though he remained coy about whom, if anyone, he would support. Exuding confidence, he touted the country's economic growth and several times emphasized its progress toward democracy, a picture starkly at odds with accusations of his critics, here and abroad, that he had steadily eroded basic freedoms.

He mentioned the killing of Paul Klebnikov, the Russian-American editor of the local edition of Forbes, saying he agreed with a statement that the journalist, shot to death in 2004, had died fighting "for a democratic Russia." He also offered respect, if not praise exactly, for another slain journalist, Anna Politkovskaya, who was killed in October. He said she had "criticized the authorities fairly acutely, which is good."

Mr. Putin also sidestepped a question about a comment made this week by Mayor Yuri M. Luzhkov of Moscow that a gay rights parade proposed by activists would have been "a satanic event."

Mr. Putin said his attitude toward gay men and lesbians involved his concern about Russia's declining population, suggesting that those who did not bear children were not helping the problem.

"Having said that," he went on, "I respect and will respect the freedoms of all shades of people, of all shades of those freedoms."

On Iran, Russia has held out for a negotiated compromise, a position at odds with the Bush administration's efforts to turn Iran's leadership into political and economic pariahs.

Mr. Putin's senior aide, Igor S. Ivanov, visited Iran last week and discussed the nuclear issue, as well as potential energy cooperation with Iran, which has reserves of natural gas second only to Russia's. Mr. Putin said he hoped the visit would "remove any suspicions on the international community about Iran's alleged plans to build nuclear weapons."

Mr. Putin also endorsed an idea floated last week by the atomic energy agency's director, Mohamed ElBaradei, to suspend sanctions if Iran agreed to a suspension of uranium enrichment.

During Mr. Ivanov's visit, Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, was quoted by news agencies as saying Russia and Iran could establish "an organization of gas cooperation like OPEC." Mr. Putin responded by calling it "an interesting idea."

He went on to say that Russia opposed creating a price-setting cartel — something that European and other countries fear — but that "to coordinate our activities would be worthwhile, with an eye to the solution of the main goal of unconditionally and securely supplying the main consumers of energy resources."

Russia And Iran Discuss A Cartel For Natural Gas (WSJ)

By Russell Gold And Gregory L. White

Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Russia and Iran -- which hold nearly half the world's natural-gas reserves -- are talking about creating an OPEC-like organization for gas, a move that has the potential to unsettle energy markets and redraw geopolitical alignments.

Gas accounts for a growing share of global energy use, but the nations that produce most of it don't work together to influence markets. That's a stark contrast to the oil market, in which members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries manage output to keep prices at levels they favor.

During his annual news conference in the Kremlin yesterday, Russian President Vladimir Putin said "a gas OPEC is an interesting idea. We will think about it." His comment comes days after Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei publicly called on a visiting Kremlin official to establish a group of natural-gas producers similar to OPEC. Russia and Iran are the world's largest and second-largest holders of gas reserves, respectively.

While there are several reasons why a gas cartel isn't likely to work as well as OPEC has managed the oil markets, the talk has alarmed big gas consumers, particularly in Europe, which gets a quarter of its gas from Russia. A cartel would be less menacing economically in the short-term to the U.S., which still gets most of its gas within North America.

Still, over time, the market is becoming more internationally flexible as shipments of liquefied natural gas rise. U.S. imports of LNG have more than doubled since 2002, though they still account for a small fraction of gas consumption here. Other Western countries are seeing demand for the clean-burning fuel climb even as their home-grown supply of gas declines. These shifts have turned gas in the last few years from a humdrum commodity into a prized fuel increasingly subject to geopolitical spats.

Comparing gas prices is difficult because until recently, there hasn't been a global market for the fuel. Asian gas-delivery contracts have tended to be pegged to the price of crude oil, while in the U.S., spot gas prices are typically set by trading at a Louisiana pipeline hub. U.S. gas cost between $2 and $3 per thousand cubic feet in the 1990s, but has averaged more than twice that in recent years. A contract for the delivery of gas in March closed yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange at $7.54 per thousand cubic feet, up over the past few weeks due to the cold weather.

The prospect of Russia and Iran working together to influence markets can't be comforting for Western countries. While Russia doesn't have the same pariah status as Iran, Moscow has under Mr. Putin faced increasing criticism for using its vast energy riches as a diplomatic lever. Early last year, state-controlled gas giant OAO Gazprom cut off supplies of natural gas to neighboring Ukraine in a pricing dispute that briefly reduced the volumes delivered further down the pipeline in Europe.

Together Russia and Iran hold more than 40% of the world's known gas reserves, according to the BP Statistical Review of World Energy. Moscow has cultivated relations with Tehran in recent years, building a nuclear-power plant in Iran and last year selling it air-defense missiles. Moscow has also resisted efforts to increase international pressure on Iran over concerns about Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

In his remarks yesterday, Mr. Putin rejected charges that Russia uses energy as a political weapon and he downplayed any price-fixing rationale for creating an OPEC-like structure. "We do not intend to set up a cartel, but I think it's right to coordinate our activities," he said, "bearing in mind the key goal of absolutely reliable supplies to the main consumers of energy."

A previous effort to create an organization of gas exporters fizzled, and many are doubtful this one would succeed. The Gas Exporting Countries Forum, which included Russia, Iran and Qatar, was formed in 2001 but hasn't met since 2005. "At the moment, they haven't gotten it together to even meet, much less coordinate anything," says Jonathan Stern, director of gas research at the Oxford Institute for Energy Studies in Britain. As for talk by Russia and Iran of a gas OPEC, he says: "I'm unexcited by it."

It isn't known exactly how a gas cartel would operate, but OPEC has been a huge market force for decades. For a period in the 1970s, OPEC members set prices for their oil, and Western countries paid up. But oil demand eventually fell because of the high prices. In response, OPEC started cutting back output to influence prices and let market forces do the rest. That is still the strategy it employs today: In recent months, alarmed about falling oil prices, OPEC announced production cuts totaling 1.7 million barrels a day.

Talk of creating a gas cartel appears partly to be an outcome of dissatisfaction among gas suppliers with the emerging international gas market. After investing billions of dollars into boosting output over the past five years, "it's difficult to place all of this gas in the market at a price that they're comfortable with," says Ira Joseph, executive director of international gas at PIRA Energy, a New York-based energy consultant. The discussion of a cartel, he says, is "in large part a reflection of that."

India and China, both growing importers of tankers full of liquefied natural gas, have used their huge demand potential as leverage in negotiating long-term pricing. There is concern among gas suppliers that other Asian buyers, in particular Japanese and Korean utilities, may seek similar pricing when numerous long-term contracts begin to expire in coming years.

DOJ_NMG_0126171

While oil is traded in a global marketplace, gas is bought and sold in fragmented markets. The U.S., for instance, gets most of its gas from domestic sources as well as Canada and Trinidad. Europe gets most of its gas from the North Sea, Russia and exporters from North Africa and the Middle East.

Russia's interest in pooling its gas supply would be unusual, given that it never joined OPEC, despite being the world's second-largest oil exporter, perhaps because it didn't want to submit to quotas set by other countries. It has resisted past calls to curtail output to support prices.

Still, Mr. Putin has been working to strengthen Moscow's ties with other major gas producers. After he visited Algeria last year, Gazprom last month reached a series of cooperation agreements with Algeria's Sonatrach, Europe's No. 3 supplier. European Union Energy Commissioner Andris Piebalgs called for an explanation from Algeria and Russia, since they could use their 35% share of the European market to potentially fix prices.

Next week, Mr. Putin travels to the Persian Gulf on a trip that will include the first-ever visit by a Russian leader to Qatar, which controls the world's third-largest gas reserves.

Iran state television quoted Mr. Khamenei as saying on Monday: "Iran and Russia can establish the structure for an organization of gas cooperation like OPEC, as half of the world's gas reserves are in Russia and Iran."

Earlier this week, Qatari Oil Minister Hamad al-Attiya said on television that he thought it would be difficult to form a gas producers' organization, but didn't rule it out. He pointed out that most gas-supply contracts are typically long term because of LNG'S up-front production costs, extending more than 20 years. That would undercut any concerted effort to make short-term adjustments to production or otherwise influence prices.

In Uproar, Chirac Again Retracts Remarks On Nuclear Iran (NYT)

By Katrin Bennhold

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 1 — President Jacques Chirac, seeking to limit the diplomatic reaction over his remarks on Iran's nuclear ambitions, reaffirmed Thursday that France remained committed to preventing Iran from becoming a nuclear power.

The statement was issued within hours of the publication of an interview in which Mr. Chirac said that if Iran had one or two nuclear weapons, it would not pose a serious danger because the launching of such a weapon would lead to the immediate destruction of Tehran.

The president's office denounced the publication of his comments as a "shameful campaign" and accused American news media outlets of "using any excuse to engage in France-bashing."

The remarks, made in an interview on Monday with The New York Times, The International Herald Tribune and Le Nouvel Observateur, a weekly magazine, differed vastly from stated French policy and from what Mr. Chirac has often said.

On Tuesday, Mr. Chirac summoned the same journalists back to Élysée Palace to retract many of his remarks.

"France, along with the international community, cannot accept the prospect of a nuclear-armed Iran," said a statement from his office issued on Thursday. "The Iranian nuclear program is opaque and therefore dangerous for the region in terms of proliferation and an arms race."

Along with Britain and Germany, France has been spearheading diplomatic efforts to persuade Iran to abandon parts of its nuclear program. In December, it joined the United States and other countries in passing a United Nations Security Council resolution calling for sanctions on Iran for its refusal to stop enriching uranium.

Despite the statement on Thursday from Élysée Palace, Le Monde called Mr. Chirac's remarks on Iran a "radical turnaround that comes at a bad moment" and argued that they also risked diminishing France's credibility on the international stage.

"When the international community will reconvene in New York and again threaten Iran, people will question how credible the French position is," the newspaper said in an editorial.

Several of France's main allies in the negotiations with Iran said Thursday, at least officially, that they were reassured by the president's swift self-correction.

Reacting to the notion that a nuclear-armed Iran would not be highly dangerous, the British foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, said, "It is not a sentiment I share, and from what I understand, the French president doesn't share it anymore, either."

A German diplomat said he was confident that French policy on Iran was unchanged, while the State Department said it was satisfied that this was the case.

Less than three months before Mr. Chirac's second term runs out, some French diplomats said privately that they were concerned that he could make unilateral diplomatic overtures to Tehran in an effort to strengthen his legacy.

DOJ_NMG_0126172

Mr. Chirac recently irritated other Western leaders when he made plans to send his foreign minister to Iran to try to help resolve the crisis in Lebanon. The venture collapsed after Saudi Arabia and Egypt opposed the trip and members of his own government said it would fail.

Mr. Chirac's comments also made waves in the French presidential campaign.

The team of Nicolas Sarkozy, the interior minister and candidate for Mr. Chirac's center-right party, the UMP, was careful not to attack the president directly. Mr. Sarkozy is also one of Mr. Chirac's main rivals.

"The position of Nicolas Sarkozy is that Iran should not have access to nuclear weapons," said Pierre Lellouche, Mr. Sarkozy's foreign policy and defense adviser. "I'm not going to comment on what Mr. Chirac said; he is still the head of state."

By contrast, the opposition Socialist Party was happy to enter the fray, not least because its candidate, Ségolène Royal, was recently criticized over her stance on Iran. She had suggested that Iran should not even be given access to civilian nuclear energy.

"It is incomprehensible that a senior French politician could speak as if Iran already had a nuclear bomb," said Jack Lang, Ms. Royal's foreign policy adviser.

François Hollande, the Socialist Party leader and Ms. Royal's partner, struck a slightly different tone. "I understand that Jacques Chirac is retracting his words," Mr. Hollande was quoted as saying in Le Monde.

Chirac Assertions On Iran Force Retraction (WT/AP)

By Jamey Keaten

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

PARIS -- Did French President Jacques Chirac misspeak? Is he, at age 74 and in the waning months of his second and likely last term, losing his political touch, even his mental vigor? Or did he simply voice a fear that a nuclear-armed Iran may be a foregone conclusion?

An astounded world asked those questions after the French leader asserted it would not be "very dangerous" if Iran had one or two nuclear weapons, and that its capital, Tehran, would be "razed" if it used them on Israel -- assertions that forced Mr. Chirac into an embarrassing retraction.

Mr. Chirac, who was hospitalized for a week in 2005 for a suspected minor stroke, appeared distracted at times, grasping for names and dates, during an interview Monday, according to the International Herald Tribune, the New York Times and a French magazine, Le Nouvel Observateur.

The newspapers said his hands shook slightly and that he read from prepared, large-print notes when discussing climate change, the interview's planned main focus.

Mr. Chirac's office switched to damage control yesterday, as foreign governments asked for official clarification, opposition politicians howled in protest and experts speculated he was either joking, being brutally honest, irresponsible or simply speaking off the cuff.

The president called reporters back a day after the interview to try to have his quotes retracted. The three publications said the interview was tape-recorded and on the record.

"Sometimes one can drift off, when one believes there are no consequences. ... I honestly believed that the questions aside from the environment were off the record," Mr. Chirac said in the second interview.

On Monday, Mr. Chirac said of Iran and its nuclear program: "I would say that what is dangerous about this situation is not the fact of having a nuclear bomb. Having one or perhaps a second bomb a little later, well, that's not very dangerous."

Rather, Mr. Chirac said, the danger lies in the chances of proliferation or an arms race in the Middle East, should Iran build a nuclear bomb.

"Where will [Iran] drop it, this bomb? On Israel?" Mr. Chirac asked. "It would not have gone 200 meters into the atmosphere before Tehran would be razed."

Mr. Chirac reversed course in the second interview.

"I retract it, of course, when I said, 'One is going to raze Tehran.' It was of course a manner of speaking in my mind. I don't imagine that we could raze Tehran," he said.

Yesterday, his office released a statement saying France, "along with the international community, cannot accept the prospect of an Iran equipped with a nuclear weapon."

Leading candidates to replace Mr. Chirac in presidential elections in April and May quickly sought to distance themselves from the president.

Bombing In Paris (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0126173

Barring a surprise, Jacques Chirac's 45-year run in politics is likely to end later this year when the French elect a new leader. They're certainly going to miss him in Tehran.

The French president gave a fitting valedictory in an interview published yesterday in the New York Times, International Herald Tribune and Le Nouvel Observateur. Speaking Monday, Mr. Chirac reversed years of public rhetoric by proclaiming himself indifferent to a nuclear-armed Iran. "Having one [atomic bomb], maybe a second one a little later, well, that's not very dangerous," Mr. Chirac said. "Where will [Iran] drop it, this bomb? On Israel? It would not have gone 200 meters into the atmosphere before Tehran would be razed to the ground."

His aides quickly realized their man had committed the gaffe of saying what everyone thought he really believed, and so left out those passages from an official interview transcript. The journalists also got a return call from the president on Tuesday, in which he noted that "I should have paid better attention to what I was saying and understood that perhaps I was on the record."

We can guess they needed no such clarification in Tehran. On or off the record, Mr. Chirac was merely confirming what the mullahs have long believed, which is that the Europeans simply aren't serious about preventing them from going nuclear.

Monsieur le president's version of mutual assured nuclear destruction could also stand some parsing. He seems to think that Tehran would never launch an attack for fear it would be annihilated in return. But assuming Israel were destroyed first, what other country would risk a counterattack itself by nuking millions of Iranian civilians to avenge Israel? France? The same country that wouldn't even let U.S. jets fly over its territory to drop a few conventional bombs on Libya? We doubt many Israelis will share Mr. Chirac's faith in nuclear deterrence against Islamists who prize martyrdom.

Mr. Chirac won't make public his political intentions before March, but in one recent poll only 2% of the French want him on the ballot again. Privately, Chirac aides believe that only a foreign policy crisis -- say, over Iran -- could revive his political career. His remarks this week make it more likely that Iran will become a crisis, but at least we can hope he won't be around to make it any worse.

Between State And Revolution (WSJ)

By Amir Taheri

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

"Mizanan, ya na?" (Will they hit or not?) In Tehran these days, this question is the talk of the town. The "they" is seldom spelled out. Yet everyone knows that it refers to the United States.

The question is wreaking havoc on Iran's fragile economy by fomenting an atmosphere of uncertainty even before the sanctions imposed by the U.N. Security Council start to bite. Many in Tehran expect the Security Council to decree even tougher sanctions in March when the ultimatum for the Islamic Republic to halt its uranium enrichment program will end.

The Khomeinist leadership is divided over the reality of the threat, and over ways of dealing with it. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad claims that the U.S. is in no position to do much damage, and counts on the new Democratic majority in Washington -- he calls them "the wise people" -- to restrain George W. Bush.

The bulk of the Khomeinist leadership, including the "Supreme Guide" Ali Khamenei, however, take the threat seriously and are preparing public opinion for a climb-down by the Islamic Republic. The American naval build-up in the Persian Gulf, the new U.S. offensive against Iran's agents and armed clients in Iraq, Tehran's failure to seize power in Beirut through its Hezbollah proxy, and plummeting oil prices are all cited by Ayatollah Khamenei's entourage as reasons why a climb-down might be necessary.

Sometime in the next few weeks, Iran is likely to offer a "compromise formula" under which it would suspend its enrichment program, as demanded by the Security Council, in exchange for a suspension of sanctions. This will be accompanied by noises from Tehran about readiness to help the U.S. in Iraq, plus possible concessions in Lebanon and over the Palestine-Israel issue.

The expected climb-down is sure to bring back the Baker-Hamilton "realists" with fresh calls for offering the mullahs a seat at the high table. It would also prompt the guilt-ridden "idealists," who blame the U.S. for whatever goes wrong in the world, to urge "Bush the warmonger" to engage the Islamic Republic in a constructive dialogue, whatever that might mean. The French and the Russians would applaud the mullahs and urge the Americans to be "reasonable."

So, what should the Bush administration do when, and if, the mullahs unveil their compromise formula? First is to see the mullahs' move as deja vu all over again. Each time the mullahs are in trouble they become the essence of sweet reasonableness. They deploy their traditional tactics of taqiyah (obfuscation), kitman (dissimulation) and ehtiat (caution) to confuse the "infidels" and divide their ranks. The Iranian leadership did this in the early days of the Khomeinist revolution in 1979 by persuading the clueless Jimmy Carter that the ayatollah was the only force capable of preventing Iran from falling into communist hands. In 1984 and '85, they seduced the Reagan administration with an offer of releasing the American hostages in

DOJ_NMG_0126174

Beirut in exchange for the secret U.S. arms deliveries Iran needed to stop the Iraqi advance. In 1987 they stopped their attacks on Kuwaiti oil tankers in the Persian Gulf after an American task force sunk the Revolutionary Guard's navy in a 10-hour battle.

In 1988, fear of an even bigger U.S. military attack persuaded Ayatollah Khomeini to "drink the cup of poison" by agreeing to end his eight-year war with Iraq. In 1998, the mullahs offered a "grand bargain" to the Clinton administration as a means of averting U.S. retaliation for the Iranian-sponsored killing of 19 American soldiers in an attack in Khobar, Saudi Arabia.

The second point to bear in mind is that a suspension of uranium enrichment will cost the Islamic Republic nothing. Iran does not have any nuclear power plants, and thus does not need enriched uranium anyway. Even if the country does not have secret parallel nuclear facilities, it could always resume weapons-making activities once it is no longer under pressure.

Successive U.S. administrations have assumed that the problem with the Khomeinist regime lies in its behavior, which they hoped to modify through traditional carrot-and-stick diplomacy. The problem with the regime, however, is its nature, its totalitarian ambitions and messianic claims. Being an enemy of the U.S., indeed of all democracies, is in its political DNA. A scorpion stings because it is programmed by nature to do so. A regime that is the enemy of its own people cannot be a friend of others.

The threat that Khomeinism poses to stability in the Middle East and, beyond it, to international peace, will not be removed until Iran once again becomes a normal nation-state with the interests and ambitions of normal nation-states.

For more than a quarter of a century, Iran has suffered from an affliction faced by most countries that experience revolution. The conflict between state and revolution makes the development and practice of moderate domestic and foreign policies difficult, if not impossible. Leading a revolution is like riding a bicycle: One keeps going for as long as one continues to pedal, regardless of the destination. To stop pedaling means to fall.

As a nation-state, Iran may be a rival and competitor for other nations. But it would not be an existential threat. As a revolution, however, Iran can, indeed must, be such a threat not only to its neighbors but also to a world that it regards as "the handiwork of Jews and Crusaders."

The Khomeinist revolution has not succeeded in destroying the plurimillennial idea of Iran as a nation-state. But each time the Khomeinist revolution found itself on the defensive, the Western powers, including the U.S., helped it restore its legitimacy and regain its breath. The same illusions that produced the détente, which arguably prolonged the life of the Soviet Union, have also helped the Khomeinist revolution survive long after its sell-by date.

Today, Iran is once again facing the schizophrenia imposed on it through the conflict between state and revolution. A majority of Iranians, including many in the ruling elite, wish Iran to re-emerge as a nation-state.

The U.S. has no interest in helping the Khomeinist revolution escape the consequences of its misdeeds. This does not mean that there should be no diplomatic contact with Tehran or that pressure should be exerted for the sake of it. Nor does it mean that military action, "to hit or not to hit," is the only question worth pondering with regard to the Islamic Republic.

No one should be duped by a tactical retreat in Tehran or a temporary modification of the regime's behavior. What is needed is a change in the nature of the regime. The chances of setting such change in motion have never been as good, and the current showdown should be used to communicate a clear message: As a nation-state, Iran can and will be a friend. As a revolution, it would always remain a foe.

Mr. Taheri is author of "L'Irak: Le Dessous Des Cartes" (Editions Complexe, 2002).

The Oil-Addicted Ayatollahs (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

MOSCOW

There may be only one thing dumber than getting addicted to consuming oil as a country — and that is getting addicted to selling it. Because getting addicted to selling oil can make your country really stupid, and if the price of oil suddenly drops, it can make your people really revolutionary. That's the real story of the rise and fall of the Soviet Union — it overdosed on oil — and it could end up being the real story of Iran, if we're smart.

It is hard to come to Moscow and not notice what the last five years of high oil prices have done for middle-class consumption here. Five years ago, it took me 35 minutes to drive from the Kremlin to Moscow's airport. On Monday, it took me two and half hours. There was one long traffic jam from central Moscow to the airport, because a city built for 30,000 cars, which 10 years ago had 300,000 cars, today has three million cars and a ring of new suburbs.

How Russia deals with its oil and gas windfall is going to be a huge issue. But today I'd like to focus on how the Soviet Union was killed, in part, by its addiction to oil, and on how we might get leverage with Iran, based on its own addiction.

Economists have long studied this phenomenon, but I got focused on it here in Moscow after chatting with Vladimir Mau, the president of Russia's Academy of National Economy. I mentioned to him that surely the Soviet Union died because oil fell to $10 a barrel shortly after Mikhail Gorbachev took office, not because of anything Ronald Reagan did. Actually, Professor Mau said, it was "high oil prices" that killed the Soviet Union. The sharp rise in oil prices in the 1970s deluded the Kremlin into overextending subsidies at home and invading Afghanistan abroad — and then the collapse in prices in the '80s helped bring down the overextended empire.

DOJ_NMG_0126175

Here's the story: The inefficient Soviet economy survived in its early decades, Professor Mau explained, thanks to cheap agriculture, from peasants forced into collective farms, and cheap prison labor, used to erect state industries. Beginning in the 1960s, however, even these cheap inputs weren't enough, and the Kremlin had to start importing, rather than exporting, grain. Things could have come unstuck then. But the 1973 Arab oil embargo and the sharp upsurge in oil prices — Russia was the world's second-largest producer after Saudi Arabia — gave the Soviet Union a 15-year lease on life from a third source of cheap resources: "oil and gas," Professor Mau said.

The oil windfall gave the Brezhnev government "money to buy the support of different interest groups, like the agrarians, import some goods and buy off the military-industrial complex," Professor Mau said. "The share of oil in total exports went from 10-to-15 percent to 40 percent." This made the Soviet Union only more sclerotic. "The more oil you have, the less policy you need," he noted.

In the 1970s, Russia exported oil and gas and "used this money to import food, consumer goods and machines for extracting oil and gas," Professor Mau said. By the early 1980s, though, oil prices had started to sink — thanks in part to conservation efforts by the U.S. "One alternative for the Soviets was to decrease consumption, but the Kremlin couldn't do that — it had been buying off all these constituencies," Professor Mau explained. So "it started borrowing from abroad, using the money mostly for consumption and subsidies, to maintain popularity and stability." Oil prices and production kept falling as Mr. Gorbachev tried reforming communism, but by then it was too late.

The parallel with Iran, Professor Mau said, is that the shah used Iran's oil windfall after 1973 to push major modernization onto a still traditional Iranian society. The social backlash produced the ayatollahs of 1979. The ayatollahs used Iran's oil windfall to lock themselves into power.

In 2005, Bloomberg.com reported, Iran's government earned $44.6 billion from oil and spent $25 billion on subsidies — for housing, jobs, food and 34-cents-a-gallon gasoline — to buy off interest groups. Iran's current populist president has further increased the goods and services being subsidized.

So if oil prices fall sharply again, Iran's regime will have to take away many benefits from many Iranians, as the Soviets had to do. For a regime already unpopular with many of its people, that could cause all kinds of problems and give rise to an Ayatollah Gorbachev. We know how that ends. "Just look at the history of the Soviet Union," Professor Mau said.

In short, the best tool we have for curbing Iran's influence is not containment or engagement, but getting the price of oil down in the long term with conservation and an alternative-energy strategy. Let's exploit Iran's oil addiction by ending ours.

Afghans Urge Legal Amnesty For Those Involved In Wars (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 1 — Afghanistan's lower house of Parliament has approved a nonbinding resolution urging the government to grant immunity to all Afghans involved in the wars of the last 25 years.

The move brought protests on Thursday from human rights advocates and the United Nations mission in Afghanistan, who had been working with the government on a plan to address the many abuses over the last three decades.

Lawmakers said the resolution was passed in the interest of peace and stability and was intended to include even the fugitive Taliban leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, and the renegade mujahedeen leader Gulbuddin Hekmatyar.

It was approved just days after President Hamid Karzai began work on the government's reconciliation plan. He said he was ready to hold talks with Taliban leaders as Afghanistan braced for a spring offensive by insurgents linked to the Taliban, who were ousted from power in late 2001.

The lower house of Parliament, which includes many former militants and mujahedeen commanders and a handful of former members of the Taliban government and the earlier Communist leadership, passed the 12-point resolution, called the Peace and Reconciliation Charter, by a show of hands on Wednesday.

The resolution had been proposed by a group of former mujahedeen leaders and Nur ul-Hag Ulumi, a former Communist general who served during the Soviet occupation. A small number of liberal and democratic legislators left the chamber in protest before the vote.

The resolution is not a law. It was not scheduled to proceed to the upper house of Parliament or to the president. But it is a public expression of the views of those who advocate one approach to reconciliation as Afghanistan continues to grapple with an insurgency in the south and east, legislators said.

DOJ_NMG_0126176

"The main point of this scheme is how long should we fight and how long would we have violence?" Mr. Ulumi said. Despite the language about immunity, he said the resolution was not intended to advocate pardoning criminals. "This is just an invitation for peace," he said.

The measure says that those who took up arms in the past should be free from prosecution and that those who had fought the current government should be allowed to join the reconciliation process if they accept the Constitution and the laws of the land.

The resolution also denounced recent comments by the New York-based Human Rights Watch. The group, which is based in New York, named several members of Parliament who it said had been implicated in war crimes and rights abuses.

The United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan, which has a mandate to monitor human rights issues, quickly issued a statement questioning the impartiality of a resolution passed by political and factional leaders.

"For any process of national reconciliation to succeed, the suffering of victims must be acknowledged and impunity tackled," the statement said. "No one has the right to forgive those responsible for human rights violations other than the victims themselves." It said it wanted to ensure that "the rights of victims remain at the heart of this debate."

Human Rights Watch has called for the Afghan government to honor promises it made a year ago to develop a five-year Action Plan for Peace, Reconciliation and Justice, a process that Mr. Karzai officially initiated last month.

The parliamentary resolution, which was passed soon after the assembly returned from its winter break, may have been a reaction to Mr. Karzai's move. Several of the most powerful militant leaders who now hold seats in Parliament have been blamed for causing civilian suffering during the civil war of the 1990s. Members of the Communist governments, ousted in 1989, have been blamed for disappearances and torture in prisons, and indiscriminate bombing of rural areas. Members of the Taliban rule have been accused of killings and forcing many people from their homes.

"After three decades of suffering abuses, Afghans have repeatedly called for accountability for those responsible for serious human rights abuses, whether Communists, warlords, or the Taliban," Sam Zarifi, Asia research director at Human Rights Watch, said in a statement this week. "There can be no sustainable peace and security in Afghanistan without respect for the rule of law."

U.S. Donates Vehicles, Arms To Afghan Army (AP)

By Rahim Faiez

AP, February 2, 2007

The United States presented hundreds of armored vehicles and trucks and thousands of weapons to the Afghan army Thursday as Afghanistan braces for renewed fighting with Taliban-led insurgents.

The donation of 800 military vehicles and more than 12,000 weapons is part of a critical effort to build an Afghan army able to defend the country on its own and eventually allow U.S. and NATO-led forces to pull back.

"These modern technologies are a step toward the vision of the Afghan National Army: a well equipped, well-trained, well-led, self-sustaining army," U.S. Maj. Gen. Robert Durbin, who heads the training of the new force, said at a handover ceremony on a sprawling military base near the capital, Kabul.

More than 200 freshly painted Humvees, trucks and other armored vehicles were on display alongside samples of the light and heavy weapons handed over. There were also socks, underwear and gloves for the Afghan soldiers.

The donation comes ahead of the arrival of spring, when Taliban militants and other insurgents are expected to resume attacks on Afghan and foreign troops to undermine President Hamid Karzai's U.S.-backed government.

It also follows last week's announcement by U.S. officials that President Bush will ask Congress for an extra $10.6 billion to help Afghanistan strengthen its security forces and rebuild following years of war.

The money would be in addition to $14.2 billion in aid the United States has already given Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 that toppled the repressive Taliban.

Karzai, attending Thursday's ceremony, thanked the U.S. officials and said that such donations and further training would enable Afghans "to stand on our own feet."

The United States and other Western nations hope Afghan security forces will eventually be strong enough to allow them to withdraw thousands of foreign troops currently providing security.

The Afghan army is currently 40,000 strong and U.S. commanders say it is playing an increasingly important role in countering militants, often in joint operations with foreign troops.

However, officials expect it to reach its planned full strength of 70,000 only by the end of 2008 — at least two years behind an earlier target.

DOJ_NMG_0126177

Last year, insurgents launched a record number of attacks in Afghanistan, and some 4,000 people, most of them militants, died in the violence. Fighting traditionally surges in the spring when warmer weather melts snow from mountain passes and makes it easier for militants to move around.

An Afghan's Path From Ally Of U.S. To Drug Suspect (NYT)

By James Risen

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — In April 2005, federal law enforcement officials summoned reporters to a Manhattan news conference to announce the capture of an Afghan drug lord and Taliban ally. While boasting that he was a big catch — the Asian counterpart of the Colombian cocaine legend Pablo Escobar — the officials left out some puzzling details, including why the Afghan, Haji Bashir Noorzai, had risked arrest by coming to New York.

Now, with Mr. Noorzai's case likely to come to trial this year, a fuller story about the American government's dealings with him is emerging.

Soon after the invasion of Afghanistan in 2001, Mr. Noorzai agreed to cooperate with American officials, who hoped he could lead them to hidden Taliban weapons and leaders, according to current and former government officials and Mr. Noorzai's American lawyer. The relationship soured, but American officials tried to renew it in 2004. A year later, Mr. Noorzai was secretly indicted and lured to New York, where he was arrested after nearly two weeks of talks with law enforcement and counterterrorism officials in a hotel.

In fighting the war on terrorism, government officials have often accepted trade-offs in developing relationships with informants with questionable backgrounds who might prove useful. As with Mr. Noorzai, it is often not clear whether the benefits outweigh the costs.

The government's shifting views of Mr. Noorzai — from sought-after ally to notorious global criminal — parallels its evolving perspective on Afghanistan's heroin trade.

In the first years after the United States invasion in late 2001, military and intelligence officials mostly chose to ignore opium production and instead dealt freely with warlords, including drug traffickers who promised information about members of the Taliban and Al Qaeda or offered security in the chaotic countryside. But in more recent years, as poppy production has soared and financed a revived Taliban insurgency that is threatening the country's stability, the Americans have begun to take some more aggressive steps.

"In Afghanistan, finding terrorists has always trumped chasing drug traffickers," said Bobby Charles, the former top counternarcotics official at the State Department.

He and other officials acknowledge that the United States initially may have had little choice other than to turn to tribal leaders with murky motives for help in bringing order to an essentially lawless society. But Mr. Charles pushed for the Bush administration to recognize suspected drug lords like Mr. Noorzai as a long-term security issue. "If we do not now take a hard second look at counternarcotics," he said, "we will not get a third look."

Administration officials say that they are working to develop a more effective drug strategy in Afghanistan, which now accounts for 82 percent of the world's opium cultivation, according to a United Nations report last September. That could include broader eradication programs, alternative crop development and cracking down on drug lords, but any such efforts are complicated by fears that they could increase instability.

Federal prosecutors in New York handling Mr. Noorzai's case refused to comment for this article, as did spokesmen for the Drug Enforcement Administration, Central Intelligence Agency and United States Central Command.

Mr. Noorzai, who has been held in a New York jail for nearly two years, has pleaded not guilty to charges that he smuggled heroin into New York and denies any involvement in drug trafficking. His New York lawyer, Ivan Fisher, argues that the arrest hurt the government's ability to gain information about the escalating Taliban insurgency.

"Haji Bashir has been making efforts to reach working agreements with the Americans in Afghanistan since the 1990s," Mr. Fisher said.

Several intelligence, counterterrorism and law enforcement officials confirm that American officials met repeatedly with Mr. Noorzai over the years. Because they provided few details about the substance of the talks, it is difficult to determine how useful Mr. Noorzai's cooperation proved to be. He was not paid for his information, and the relationship was considered more informal, the officials said.

At times, there was confusion within the government about what to do with Mr. Noorzai. In 2002, while he was talking to the American officials in Afghanistan, a team at C.I.A. headquarters assigned to identify targets to capture or kill in Afghanistan wanted to put him on its list, one former intelligence official said. Like others, he would only speak on condition of anonymity because such discussions were classified.

DOJ_NMG_0126178

The C.I.A. team was blocked, the former official recalled. Although he never received an explanation, the former official said that the Defense Department officials and American military commanders viewed counternarcotics efforts in Afghanistan at the time as a form of "mission creep" that would distract from the fight against terrorism.

Mr. Noorzai, a wealthy tribal leader in his mid-40s who lived with three wives and 13 children in Quetta, Pakistan, and also owns homes in Afghanistan and the United Arab Emirates, is from the same region that helped produce the Taliban. A native of Kandahar Province, he was a mujahedeen commander fighting the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan in the 1980s. In 1990, according to his lawyer, he agreed to help track down Stinger missiles provided to the Afghan resistance by the C.I.A.; agency officials were worried about their possible use by terrorists.

D.E.A. officials say that at the same time, Mr. Noorzai was a major figure in the Afghan drug trade, controlling poppy fields that supplied a significant share of the world's heroin. He was also an early financial backer of the Taliban. Agency officials say he provided demolition materials, weapons and manpower in exchange for protection for his opium crops, heroin labs, smuggling routes and followers.

Mr. Noorzai was in Quetta when the Sept. 11 attacks occurred, and he returned soon after to Afghanistan, according to his lawyer. In November 2001, he met with men he described as American military officials at Spinboldak, near the Afghan-Pakistani border, Mr. Fisher said. Small teams of United States Special Forces and intelligence officers were in Afghanistan at the time, seeking the support of tribal leaders.

Mr. Noorzai was taken to Kandahar, where he was detained and questioned for six days by the Americans about Taliban officials and operations, his lawyer said. He agreed to work with them and was freed, and in late January 2002 he handed over 15 truckloads of weapons, including about 400 antiaircraft missiles, that had been hidden by the Taliban in his tribe's territory, Mr. Fisher said.

Mr. Noorzai also offered to act as an intermediary between Taliban leaders and the Americans, his lawyer said. Mr. Noorzai said he helped persuade the Taliban's former foreign minister, Wakil Ahmad Mutawakil — the son of the mullah in Mr. Noorzai's hometown — to meet with the Americans. In February 2002, the Taliban official surrendered after what press accounts described as extensive negotiations and was sent to the prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. He was freed in 2005.

Mr. Noorzai also persuaded a local tribal figure, Haji Birqet, to return to Afghanistan from Pakistan, the lawyer said. But he said the Americans, falsely warned that Mr. Birqet and Mr. Noorzai were plotting to attack United States forces, killed Mr. Birqet and wounded several family members in a raid on his compound.

Saying that his credibility had been hurt by the imprisonment of Mr. Mutawakil and that he was angered by the attack on Mr. Birqet, Mr. Noorzai broke off contact with the Americans and fled to his home in Pakistan, according to Mr. Fisher.

The government officials could not confirm whether Mr. Noorzai had in fact played a role in those negotiations. There may be another explanation for his exile, however. In May 2002, one of his tribal commanders was killed in an American raid along a drug-smuggling route that the Americans suspected was used to help the Taliban, and Mr. Noorzai may have feared for his own safety.

Nearly two years later, in January 2004, Mr. Charles, the State Department official, proposed placing him on President Bush's list of foreign narcotics kingpins, for the most wanted drug lords around the world.

At that time, Mr. Charles recalled in an interview, no Afghan heroin traffickers were on the list, which he thought was a glaring omission. He suggested three names, including Mr. Noorzai's, but said his recommendation was met with an awkward silence during an interagency meeting. He said there was resistance to placing Afghans on the list because countering the drug trade there was not an administration priority. Mr. Charles persisted, and in June 2004, Mr. Noorzai became the first Afghan on the list.

Two months later, a team of American contractors working for the Federal Bureau of Investigation contacted Mr. Noorzai and arranged a series of meetings with him in Pakistan and Dubai, according to several government officials and Mr. Noorzai's lawyer. They wanted to win his cooperation and learn about Al Qaeda's financial network and perhaps the whereabouts of the former Taliban leader Mullah Muhammad Omar. The Americans met with Mr. Noorzai, but the talks fizzled because F.B.I. agents who were supposed to join them were unable to do so, one official said.

In 2005, the contractors, by then working for the D.E.A., reconnected with Mr. Noorzai and once again met with him in Dubai.

This time, however, the objective had changed. Mr. Noorzai had secretly been indicted by a federal grand jury in New York on drug smuggling charges in January 2005. Now the contractors needed to persuade Mr. Noorzai to come to the United States.

Mr. Fisher said the Americans were particularly interested in gaining Mr. Noorzai's help in tracking the flow of money to the Taliban and Al Qaeda. They were seeking information about Mullah Omar and other Taliban figures. The Americans asked Mr. Noorzai to come to the United States to meet with their superiors, he added.

DOJ_NMG_0126179

Mr. Noorzai's lawyer said his client agreed to make the trip only after receiving assurances that he would not be arrested. Mr. Fisher also says that he has obtained transcripts from tape recordings made by the government at the sessions.

Mr. Noorzai flew to New York in April 2005 and was taken to an Embassy Suites hotel, where he was questioned for 13 days before being arrested, his lawyer said.

Mr. Noorzai has been charged with conspiring to import more than $50 million worth of heroin from Afghanistan and Pakistan into the United States and other countries. The indictment says that he imported heroin to New York in the late 1990s and that unnamed co-conspirators also did so in 2001 and 2002.

U.S. Reconfigures The Way Casualty Totals Are Given (NYT)

By Denise Grady

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

Statistics on a Pentagon Web site have been reorganized in a way that lowers the published totals of American nonfatal casualties in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Dr. Michael Kilpatrick, deputy director of force health protection and readiness at the Defense Department, said the previous method of tallying casualties was misleading and might have made injuries and combat wounds seem worse and more numerous than they really were.

The old method lumped many problems under the label "casualties," including illnesses, minor injuries and injuries from accidents, as well as wounds sustained in combat. But the public may assume that every casualty is a war wound, Dr. Kilpatrick said, so the site was changed to avoid misunderstandings.

On Monday, the bottom line of the Defense Department's Web page on casualties in Iraq listed a total of 47,657 "nonmortal casualties."

By Tuesday, the same page no longer showed a total for nonmortal casualties. The bottom line is now "total — medical air transported," and the figure is 31,493.

The new total excludes 16,164 troops who were wounded but did not require medical air transport because their injuries were minor. The total does include combat wounds, nonhostile injuries and diseases serious enough for medical transport.

Half the nonhostile injuries are from vehicle accidents, and a third are sports injuries from activities like basketball, Dr. Kilpatrick said. About 50 disease categories — including mental problems and gastrointestinal illnesses — have led to medical evacuations. Dr. Kilpatrick said that 85 percent of those who were flown out for medical reasons eventually returned to duty.

"It may be a few weeks, or it may be a year or more," he said.

Concern at the Pentagon about public perceptions of the wounded increased last month after Linda Bilmes, a Harvard professor, published an opinion article in The Los Angeles Times mentioning 50,508 "nonmortal woundings" in Iraq and Afghanistan. That number came from a Web page posted by public affairs employees at the Department of Veterans Affairs.

But officials from both agencies said that figure had been posted by mistake, lumping combat and noncombat injuries as well as illnesses and labeling them all "woundings" instead of casualties.

"If public affairs people at the V.A. misunderstood, we thought the public would misunderstand it, too," Dr. Kilpatrick said.

Both Web sites were changed.

Paul Sullivan, director of research and analysis of Veterans for America, said the changes actually meant the Pentagon was trying to conceal the rising toll of injuries and illness.

Mr. Sullivan, formerly a project manager at the Department of Veterans Affairs, also said that the department was not prepared to provide the health care that returning veterans would need for mental and physical disabilities.

DOJ:

US Admits Misconduct In Mob Slaying Case (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 2, 2007

Says prosecutor was disciplined

An internal Justice Department investigation concluded that a federal prosecutor in Boston "engaged in professional misconduct and exercised poor judgment" while prosecuting a federal racketeering case against the hierarchy of the New England Mafia during the early 1990s, according to a letter filed in federal court yesterday.

In response to a critical letter from the judge who presided over the high-profile case, a Justice Department official wrote back that "disciplinary action" had been taken against Assistant US Attorney Jeffrey Auerhahn because of his misconduct in prosecuting Mafia capo Vincent Ferrara and mob associate Pasquale Barone .

Chief US District Judge Mark L. Wolf had found three years ago that Auerhahn had withheld evidence in a 1985 gangland slaying.

Yet the internal probe remains shrouded in secrecy as federal authorities, citing employee privacy rights, refused yesterday to detail their findings or disclose what disciplinary action had been taken against Auerhahn, a longtime prosecutor who currently handles counterterrorism cases.

In a Jan. 23 letter to Wolf , Associate Deputy Attorney General David Margolis wrote that the Justice Department was "preparing a more detailed response" to an earlier letter from Wolf.

Auerhahn did not return calls from the Globe yesterday seeking comment.

Samantha Martin , a spokeswoman for US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan, citing Department of Justice regulations protecting employees' privacy, said, "We are prohibited from commenting on any internal personnel matters beyond what is available in the public record."

Boston lawyer Bernard Grossberg , who represented Barone in the criminal case, said that the government has an obligation to reveal what punishment it meted out to Auerhahn, so that the public can assess whether it was appropriate.

"How are they going to give Patsy Barone back the 10 years he served on a clearly unconstitutional conviction?" Grossberg asked. "Did they find [Auerhahn's] conduct was deliberate? In order for there to be some closure, if at all, you have to know what the disciplinary action was."

Barone pleaded guilty to manslaughter in state court for the 1985 North End slaying of his friend Vincent "Jimmy" Limoli and was sentenced to five years. But the government's allegation that the slaying was carried out at the behest of the Mafia -- and Ferrara, in particular -- led to Barone's 1993 federal conviction of murder in aid of racketeering. He was sentenced to life in prison.

Just as Ferrara and four reputed mobsters, including New England Mafia boss Raymond "Junior" Patriarca, were ready to go to trial on federal racketeering charges in 1992, they agreed to plead guilty to various charges under deals that spared them even longer sentences. As part of his plea, Ferrara admitted that he had ordered Limoli's slaying, yet he later insisted he was innocent of that charge. He was sentenced to 22 years in prison.

In 2003 Wolf found that Auerhahn had improperly and possibly illegally withheld key evidence from defense lawyers by failing to disclose that a witness had recanted his claim that Ferrara ordered Limoli's murder. The judge concluded that the convictions were tainted and cut the sentences of both men, leading to Barone's release in 2003 and Ferrara's release two years later.

A federal appeals court affirmed Wolf's findings last year, calling Auerhahn's conduct "outrageous."

In a highly critical letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales in December, Wolf said he had been assured by Sullivan in 2003 that the Justice Department would investigate Auerhahn's alleged misconduct and yet had heard nothing of the outcome of the probe.

"The apparent inaction of the Department of Justice regarding Mr. Auerhahn has generated considerable concern about the administration of justice in the District of Massachusetts," Wolf wrote.

In his response, Margolis wrote, "The attorney general shares your interest in the fair and impartial administration of justice, and in maintaining the tradition of integrity at the Department of Justice."

Top Fed Heads To Duty In D.C. (WT&G)

By Lee Hammel, TELEGRAM & GAZETTE STAFF

Worcester (MA) Telegram & Gazette, February 2, 2007

Casey expects one-year stint

WORCESTER— Assistant U.S. Attorney Paul G. Casey will spend the next year in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy in Washington, DC.

Mr. Casey, 41, has been a prosecutor in the Worcester branch of the U.S. attorney's office since 2002. At the conclusion of his stint at Justice Department headquarters it is expected that he will return to the Worcester office, where he has specialized in prosecuting violent gang members.

The Office of Legal Policy manages development of a variety of civil and criminal policy initiatives for the attorney general, creation of Justice Department regulations, and the department's role in the confirmation of the president's judicial nominees. Mr. Casey is scheduled to begin his duty Feb. 12 as a senior counsel in Office of Legal Policy.

The U.S. attorney intends to announce a replacement for Mr. Casey, who holds one of two full-time assistant U.S. attorney slots in the Worcester branch. In addition to David H. Hennessy and Mr. Casey, other assistant U.S. attorneys regularly prosecute cases in U.S. District Court here.

Mr. Casey said of his new assignment, "I'm honored that they asked me."

Son of a Swampscott police officer, Mr. Casey said, "I like to prosecute violent guys. I think there's a federal interest in keeping the community safe."

In part because of the employment of his father, who died in the early 1990s, he said, "I've always loved working with police departments."

That has kept Mr. Casey in the forefront of President Bush's policy, which U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan has vigorously promoted, of expanding the number of criminal cases in federal court, cases that years ago would have been prosecuted in the state courts, where penalties are less severe.

Mr. Casey is well-known to community activists who have agitated to get local violent criminals removed from the streets for longer periods of time. Mr. Casey prosecuted the Aghapour brothers, William and Nicholas, whose crimes were long the target of local activists.

He is proud of the sentences — many of them in excess of 10 years — that the targets of his prosecutions, many from Fitchburg or Worcester, have received. Even if it's a type of case that traditionally has been handled by state rather than federal prosecutors, Mr. Casey said his attitude is, "If there's a significant violent history, let's do him."

"I was drawn to the more violent guys. I embrace those kinds of prosecutions," Mr. Casey said.

Mr. Casey, who worked in prosecutors' offices across the county, said the best part of his job is the relationships he has here. He mentioned the Worcester district attorney's office and the state police attached to it, the Worcester and Fitchburg police departments, and those in the offices of the Drug Enforcement Administration, Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the FBI in this region.

Mr. Casey came to the Worcester office from the U.S. attorney's office in northern Illinois. Prior to that he was a deputy chief in the Illinois state attorney general's office and was a King County prosecutor from 1990 to 1995 in Seattle.

He received his law degree in 1990 from Boston University and a bachelor's degree from Wittenberg University in Springfield, Ohio, where he was captain of the varsity baseball team.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Senate Report Says S.E.C. Botched Hedge Fund Inquiry (NYT)

By Walt Bogdanich

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

The Securities and Exchange Commission mishandled its inquiry into suspect trades by a prominent hedge fund, then may have tried to cover up those mistakes after its chief investigator on the case complained, according to an interim Senate report released yesterday.

The report, released by the former chairmen of the Senate Judiciary and Finance Committees, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, also asked the S.E.C. or the Justice Department to consider investigating whether false testimony was given to S.E.C. officials who examined the hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management.

The report did not cite examples of what testimony might have been false.

The two Senate committees began looking into the case in July after the investigator, a commission lawyer named Gary J. Aguirre, said he was fired for complaining that the Pequot investigation had been derailed because of political considerations.

Though the S.E.C.'s handling of the Pequot matter came under fire at Senate hearings last year, yesterday's report provides the strongest condemnation yet of how that investigation was run.

"At best, the picture shows extraordinarily lax enforcement by the S.E.C.," Senate investigators concluded. "At worse, the picture is colored with overtones of a possible cover-up."

The report strongly suggests that Mr. Aguirre was fired in retaliation for his criticism. At the same time, Senate investigators said they were "deeply troubled" by the failure of the S.E.C.'s inspector general, Walter J. Stachnik, to investigate Mr. Aguirre's accusations properly.

"The I.G. spoke only to Aguirre's supervisors, accepted everything they said at face value and reviewed only documents identified by those supervisors," the report concluded. "We believe the S.E.C. must take corrective and preventative action to ensure that future investigations, internal and external, do not follow the same path as the Pequot matter."

DOJ_NMG_0126182

The S.E.C. should also consider reopening its Pequot investigation, the report states, though it takes no position on whether the fund or anyone connected to it engaged in any wrongdoing.

The S.E.C. closed its inquiry without charging anyone in connection with the Pequot inquiry.

John J. Nester, a spokesman for the S.E.C., said in a statement that because the matter was under review by other federal entities, which he did not name, the commission would have no comment.

The report, which is based largely on Senate interviews with 19 crucial witnesses and thousands of pages of internal S.E.C. records, is a victory for Mr. Aguirre, who was fired in September 2005, just days after receiving a merit pay increase.

At a Senate hearing in December, senior S.E.C. officials sought to justify his firing, arguing that he had done a poor job running the Pequot investigation and that he had been difficult to get along with. The officials asserted that Mr. Aguirre had once issued flawed subpoenas and that he had been unprofessional in the way he conducted an interview with Pequot's founder, Arthur J. Samberg.

There was scant documentary evidence to back up those charges, the report concluded. "We have noted the considerable lack of contemporaneous documents corroborating the concerns they raised," it said.

S.E.C. officials said the flawed subpoenas had seriously undermined their confidence in Mr. Aguirre. But, the report noted, those officials "produced no documents to the committees suggesting that they viewed it that way at the time."

The same held true for the examination of Mr. Samberg. In fact, the report states, one longtime S.E.C. investigator told the committee that he planned to use Mr. Aguirre's examination "as a model for how to take testimony in his training of new S.E.C. attorneys."

The report called Mr. Aguirre "a smart, hardworking, aggressive attorney who was passionately dedicated to the Pequot investigation."

Mr. Aguirre testified that his troubles at the S.E.C. began when he asked for permission to examine John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive who was a close friend of Mr. Samberg. After initially supporting Mr. Aguirre's decision, senior S.E.C. officials abruptly changed course, the report notes.

"What is troubling is how this enthusiasm waned after public reports on June 23, 2005, that Morgan Stanley was considering hiring Mack as its new C.E.O.," the report concludes.

Mr. Aguirre was told that since he had no evidence linking Mr. Mack to suspected insider trading by Pequot, calling in Mr. Mack for an interview would not be justified.

"The purpose of taking investigative testimony is not to confront a witness with accusations of wrongdoing, as Aguirre's supervisors seem to believe," the report states. "Rather it is to gather information that helps confirm or rule out working theories."

Mr. Mack and Mr. Samberg have repeatedly denied any improper conduct.

Mr. Mack's testimony was eventually taken in August 2006, more than a year after Mr. Aguirre proposed doing so.

"We are concerned about the circumstances under which it was done," investigators said. "Mack's testimony was taken five days after the statute of limitations expired, and only a few months after we initiated our inquiry into this matter."

The report concludes that the S.E.C. finally interviewed Mr. Mack to deflect public criticism for not having done it earlier.

Dell's Woes Mount As Investors File Improper-Accounting Suit (WSJ)

By Don Clark, Christopher Lawton And John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO -- Dell Inc., reeling from business problems that led to Wednesday's departure of Chief Executive Kevin Rollins, was accused in an investor lawsuit of improper accounting in its longtime partnership with chip maker Intel Corp.

The suit, which seeks class-action status on behalf of Dell shareholders, alleges that Dell's profits were inflated by hundreds of millions of dollars in quarterly rebates from Intel that Dell failed to properly account for and disclose. At times, the suit asserts, Dell was receiving as much as $1 billion a year in what the plaintiffs characterize as "secret and likely illegal" kickbacks by Intel to ensure that Dell use no other chip supplier.

In a 251-page complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Austin, Texas, the plaintiffs also allege that Dell investors were misled about serious accounting, quality and customer-service problems -- even as Dell executives sold billions of dollars in Dell shares. It accuses Intel of participating in a scheme to defraud Dell investors.

Dell declined to comment on the suit, which was prepared by the law firm of class-action specialist William Lerach. Intel, which has defended the legality of its marketing practices in response to an antitrust suit filed by rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc., flatly denied the allegations, and said it would "move quickly" to defend itself.

The suit was filed late Wednesday, about the time Dell announced Chairman Michael Dell would resume the CEO position1 in place of Mr. Rollins.

DOJ_NMG_0126183

Messrs. Dell and Rollins were among 16 individuals named in the suit. The company declined to make them available for comment.

Dell's accounting firm, PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, also was named as a defendant. Company officials did not immediately return calls seeking comment. The suit seeks class-action status on behalf of purchasers of Dell stock between February 2003 and September 2006.

Dell has been struggling with problems that include stalled sales in its core U.S. and corporate markets and changing buying habits in the PC industry. In August, Dell also disclosed that the Securities and Exchange Commission had been informally investigating the company over its revenue-recognition practices, and said it launched its own investigation into its financial accounting.

By September, the company said the probe had expanded to unspecified issues "relating to accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items." Dell said it is working with its audit committee and independent auditors to determine whether it has to restate its prior results.

Dell also said it has been subpoenaed by the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York over its financial reporting. In November, Dell was forced to delay its fiscal third-quarter earnings due to the complexity surrounding the SEC investigation.

The company's stock, which traded in late 2005 at more than $40 a share, has fallen significantly since then. The shares fell 42 cents yesterday at 4 p.m. at $23.80 in 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market trading.

Several suits seeking class-action status were filed in Austin after Dell disclosed the federal investigations of its accounting practices. The latest complaint adds allegations that focus on Dell's long-standing practice of buying microprocessor chips only from Intel, which ended last year when Dell finally emulated competitors and began also using AMD chips. Some of the charges echo those contained in AMD's 2005 antitrust suit, which also attacked rebates and subsidies paid by Intel to computer makers.

The complaint alleges that Dell received "e-Cap payments" -- standing for "exception to corporate average pricing" -- from Intel for not doing business with AMD. The approximately $1 billion a year that Dell received in such payments was spread out unevenly over the four quarters, money that would be applied to reduce the portion of Dell's expenses known as cost of goods sold, the complaint states.

Dell became very dependent upon these payments, which were made by Intel at or near the end of the Dell's quarters and had a "direct, material impact" on the computer maker's reported operating profits or profit margins, the complaint alleges.

Information about the rebates was limited to about 15 senior people at Dell, the complaint states. Intel insisted that Dell maintain secrecy about the program because it feared that if these payments became known, antitrust officials in various countries would likely take legal action against Intel, the complaint alleges.

Despite Dell's reputation as a stalwart Intel customer, the complaint asserts that Dell after 1999 each year secretly designed computers based on AMD chips. But those computers would be put on hold at varying stages of their developments, as Intel and Dell negotiated privately over terms of their relationship, the suit states.

Intel, whose business practices are being investigated by antitrust authorities in the European Union, has said its rebate programs and other tactics are fair and legal. Chuck Mulloy, an Intel spokesman, declined comment on the specific points raised in the investor complaint.

But he added: "We have conducted a preliminary review of the complaint. At first glance it appears that some of the allegations with respect to Intel appear to have been completely made up."

US Probes Siemens Bribery Scandal (FT)

By Richard Milne In Frankfurt

Financial Times, February 2, 2007

Siemens' problems escalated on Thursday night as Europe's largest engineering group revealed it is under investigation by the US Department of Justice and facing an informal inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission over its €420m bribery scandal.

The DoJ is investigating possible criminal breaches of US law by Siemens while the SEC's enforcement division is conducting an informal inquiry, Siemens said on Thursday night in its first-quarter report.

The probes are a further embarrassing blow to the German group's embattled management, who had sought contact with US authorities soon after the scandal broke to try to contain its impact.

Prosecutors in Munich – alongside several other European counterparts in Italy, Liechtenstein and Greece – are leading the investigation, which has ensnarled several former high-ranking executives and led to allegations against some current top managers.

DOJ_NMG_0126184

Siemens, which listed in the US in 2001, said it was co-operating with the DoJ and SEC and had hired an independent law firm, Debevoise, to conduct an independent inquiry into the allegations. The results of the ongoing investigation were available to US authorities, Siemens said.

The German conglomerate declined further comment.

The nature of the DoJ investigation was unclear on Thursday night but it can, in some circumstances, merely open a file because of a probe abroad by prosecutors. Equally it could be conducting its own enquiries as to whether the company has violated the US's Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, which bars paying bribes in overseas operations.

Siemens has repeatedly said that prosecutors view the company as a witness in the probe, not a suspect, and that it has been the victim of a rogue group of employees. Those Siemens employees detained and questioned allege that bribery was a normal business practice at Siemens, their lawyers say.

An informal inquiry by the SEC is the first step in a process that can lead to a formal investigation and civil penalties if the regulator believes they have found suspect information.

The two probes come as Siemens has taken a number of steps in an attempt to show it is taking the allegations seriously. It has Deloitte as a forensic accountant as well as taking on Michael Hershman, a former Watergate investigator, as an anti-corruption consultant.

Klaus Kleinfeld, Siemens' chief executive, told the FT in mid-December that the group's lawyers had been in weekly contact with the SEC with conversations on November 22, early December and then on December 6 and 13.

Prosecutors believe sham consulting contracts may have been used to divert money into slush funds that were then used to bribe officials in countries including Saudi Arabia and Nigeria to win telecoms contracts. Siemens says as much as €420m in payments in the last seven years are suspicious.

Long-Running AOL Trial Heads To Jury (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

An Alexandria jury concluded its first day of deliberations yesterday without reaching a verdict on two former AOL executives accused of conspiring to help a business partner create phony revenue as the Internet boom turned bust in early 2001.

The six-man, six-woman jury began discussing more than three months' worth of evidence yesterday morning after a marathon session of closing arguments that ended hours after the federal courthouse had closed for business Wednesday.

Prosecutors got the last word in one of the longest-running criminal proceedings in the history of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, known as the "rocket docket" for its speedy and efficient proceedings. Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles F. Connolly urged the jury shortly after 8:30 p.m. Wednesday not to follow defense lawyers' invitation to "look away from the facts" but instead to remember "a lesson we all learned from the time we were children: Simply tell the truth."

Kent D. Wakeford, former vice president of AOL's Business Affairs unit, and John P. Tuli, a former official with AOL's Netbusiness unit, have been charged with helping Las Vegas software maker PurchasePro meet revenue targets in March and April 2001 by lying to auditors and backdating contracts. At the time, both companies were struggling to meet analyst expectations and ultimately resorted to fraud to preserve the illusion of success, prosecutors said.

"These guys would rather cheat than fail," Assistant U.S. Attorney Adam Reeves told the jury Tuesday.

U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr., however, has repeatedly pared the scope of the case and the number of criminal charges. Most recently he agreed to cut multiple wire fraud counts against Tuli, Wakeford and former PurchasePro employee Christopher J. Benyo.

That means each of the defendants faces two charges: conspiracy and aiding and abetting PurchasePro's founder, Charles E. Johnson Jr., to commit securities fraud. They assert their innocence, but only Wakeford testified in his own defense and tried to distance himself from Johnson.

An outsized, colorful character accused of directing subordinates to forge documents and destroy computers, Johnson split from the case last fall after his lawyer resigned for reasons that remain secret. He will be retried later. The judge urged jurors this week to neither speculate about the reasons for Johnson's departure nor consider him in their efforts to reach a verdict.

That may be difficult if prosecutors have their way. Johnson's alleged misdeeds permeated their closing argument. They essentially sought to convict Johnson in absentia and to use him to tar the three remaining defendants, each of whom carefully avoided sitting at the empty table where Johnson once sat.

The defense teams strived to portray their clients as scapegoats in a government investigation that fell short of catching high-ranking former AOL executives who may have engineered accounting tricks and sham deals. AOL ultimately paid more than $500 million to resolve federal charges.

DOJ_NMG_0126185

Mark J. Hulkower, a lawyer for Tuli, told jurors that "there has been a complete failure of proof" in the government case. He attacked government witnesses' memory and branded a key cooperator who is serving more than four years in prison as a pathological liar whose testimony could not be believed.

Terrance Reed, a lawyer for Benyo, stressed his client's unfamiliarity with PurchasePro's accounting practices and his low rank in the corporate hierarchy. Reed urged the jury to "set yourself and Mr. Benyo free" from a trial that had been expected to conclude before Christmas.

"Obviously things are running later than usual," the judge said late Tuesday as the clock ticked. "It wouldn't be this trial if that didn't happen."

Henry W. Asbill, a lawyer for Wakeford, told jurors that his client was "stuck in the middle" between overbearing bosses and trying clients. Asbill asserted that Wakeford did not have authority to enter into major deals and that he did not benefit financially from the PurchasePro transactions. His client, he argued, was left at the defense table because "the prosecution couldn't figure out a way to charge, much less convict, any AOL senior executives who had to be the real targets during this investigation."

Prosecutors tried to protect themselves from that argument by entreating the jury that blaming the boss is not a defense. "They could be bit players and still be guilty," Reeves told the jury.

CEO Whack-a-mole (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

IN 1993, OUTRAGE OVER sky-high salaries for corporate chieftains led the Democratically controlled Congress to declare that, unlike other business expenses, salaries above $1 million couldn't be deducted from corporate taxes. The move worked so poorly that the Senate's newly restored Democratic majority is back for an encore.

The Clinton-era rules not only failed to stop executive pay from rising, they promoted a slew of accounting maneuvers — such as stock options and supplemental retirement plans — that made it even harder to discern exactly how much was being paid out. Now the Senate Finance Committee is attempting to crack down on one of those techniques.

As part of a bill to gradually raise the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour, the Finance Committee proposed an annual cap on the amount of surtax-free salary that employees could delay receiving until after they left a company. The cap would be $1 million, or the executive's average pay for the previous five years, whichever is lower. Anyone who exceeded the cap would face a sizable penalty: They'd have to pay income taxes and a 20% surtax on the deferred money even before they received it.

Deferred compensation has become an extremely popular benefit, with more than 900 of the 1,000 largest corporations reportedly using it. It typically helps high-paid executives save more for their retirements than their company's pension or 401(k) plans allow.

The issue here is not the gaudiness of executive salaries but whether the federal government should use the tax code to fight what is essentially a moralistic (and losing) battle. Publicly traded companies will pay what the market bears for top executive talent. Shareholders who object can always sell their stock. When the 1993 law capped the deductible portion of salary at $1 million, companies diverted compensation into still-deductible forms such as bonuses, stock options, deferred payments and other performance-related packages that were harder to quantify and prone to abuse. (The ongoing options backdating scandal is Exhibit A.)

There's every reason to believe that the proposed cap on deferred compensation will lead to similar shenanigans, making it harder for shareholders and even corporate directors to tell what executives are being paid, let alone whether they're earning their keep. Rather than giving corporate accountants a reason to muddy the waters again, lawmakers should undo the damage caused in 1993 by lifting the cap on deductions for executive pay. This year, new Securities and Exchange Commission rules will force firms to release easy-to-understand summaries of what executives are being paid. That kind transparency should be the goal, not the casualty, of federal tax policy.

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Agent Shows Doubts For Libby's Story (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

Long Island Newsday, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In a case that hinges on credibility, FBI agent Deborah Bond is making it clear from the witness stand just how believable she finds former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby to be: not very.

DOJ_NMG_0126186

Bond testified Thursday about interviewing Libby in 2003 about the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity and the 19-year FBI veteran refused to even use the word "said" to describe Libby's statements.

Libby told the FBI that he learned about Plame from Vice President Dick Cheney, then forgot about it and was surprised to hear it again from a reporter weeks later.

"He said that?" defense attorney Theodore Wells asked.

"That's what he claimed," Bond replied.

"He said it," Wells persisted, prompting an objection that led U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to step in.

"Did he say that?" Walton asked.

Bond didn't flinch: "He told us that, yes," she said.

Bond was the first Justice Department official to testify in the trial and is scheduled to return to the witness stand Monday.

The FBI spent three years investigating the leak of Plame's identity to the press. Nobody was charged with the leak but prosecutors say Libby obstructed the case by concocting a story he believed would shield him from prosecution.

Bond is one of the final witnesses in Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's case. He plans to play more than eight hours of Libby's grand jury testimony in court Monday and part of Tuesday.

NBC News reporter Tim Russert, who Libby said told him that Plame worked at the CIA, is expected to testify Tuesday as Fitzgerald's final witness. Russert said Plame's identity did not come up in their conversation.

Fitzgerald is expected to rest his case as early as late Tuesday afternoon. Defense attorneys say they'll call Libby and Cheney to testify.

Libby Left Out Some Facts In Interviews, FBI Agent Says (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

One of the FBI agents who interviewed I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby during the CIA leak investigation testified yesterday that the vice president's then-chief of staff did not acknowledge disclosing the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame to reporters, asserting that he was surprised when another journalist later told him about her.

FBI agent Deborah S. Bond also testified that Libby said that, while he was preparing to be interviewed by investigators in the fall of 2003, he came across a handwritten note he had made during a phone conversation with Vice President Cheney. The note made it clear that, shortly before June 12, 2003, Cheney had told Libby that Plame worked at the CIA's counterproliferation division and was married to an outspoken critic of the Iraq war.

Libby's conversation with Cheney took place nearly a month before Libby telephoned Tim Russert, NBC's Washington bureau chief. According to Bond, Libby said that, during that call, Russert mentioned that "all the reporters" knew that former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV's wife worked at the CIA. Libby told the investigators that "it was as if it was the first time he heard it," Bond said.

Coming on the seventh day of testimony in Libby's perjury trial, Bond's description of the FBI's two interviews with Libby in his White House office gave jurors their first account of what the prosecution alleges were lies that Cheney's former top aide told investigators to obscure his role in spreading classified information.

The version of events Libby related to the FBI conflicts with the accounts of several government officials and journalists who have already testified at the trial. Russert is scheduled to be the prosecution's final witness early next week.

Libby is charged with lying to FBI agents and a grand jury in the investigation of the leak of Plame's name to the news media. He is not charged with the leak itself. Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald contends that the CIA officer's identity was disclosed as part of a White House campaign to discredit her husband.

In 2002, the CIA dispatched Wilson to Africa to investigate reports that Iraq had recently tried to buy material there for making nuclear weapons. In June 2003, shortly after the Iraq war began and days before his wife's identity was leaked, Wilson publicly accused President Bush of trying to justify the war by twisting the intelligence Wilson had brought home.

Libby has pleaded not guilty to all five felony counts. He and his attorneys contend that he misremembered the conversations he had with reporters about Plame amid the crush of his work on national security issues.

Yesterday, Bond told jurors that, during the FBI interviews, Libby did not mention several significant aspects of his interactions with journalists. He told investigators about a July 8, 2003, breakfast meeting with then-New York Times reporter Judith Miller, Bond said, but did not mention another meeting with Miller two weeks earlier.

Bond said Libby also did not say that he had sought information about Plame from government officials and discussed the matter with Miller and, soon after, with Matthew Cooper, then a reporter for Time magazine.

DOJ_NMG_0126187

According to Bond, Libby told her that he did not recall discussing Wilson's wife with Miller. In Cooper's case, Bond testified, Libby said he had simply told Cooper that other reporters were saying that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA but that Libby did not know whether that was true.

Bond also said Libby "adamantly denied" that he had told then-White House press secretary Ari Fleischer about Plame. Fleischer testified earlier this week that Libby did reveal that information.

During cross-examination, defense attorney Theodore V. Wells Jr. pressed Bond to acknowledge that Libby had said during his first FBI interview that he was very concerned that his memory was bad and that he needed to review his notes to jog it. Wells also questioned the thoroughness of the agent's notes about Libby's account of a third conversation with Miller, on July 12.

Earlier yesterday, the judge presiding over the trial expressed doubts about defense arguments that Libby was made a scapegoat by the White House in 2003 as the furor over the CIA leak grew. With the jury out of the courtroom, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said that argument was undercut by evidence that then-White House press secretary Scott McClellan, at Cheney's direction, publicly denied that fall that Libby had any role in leaking information about Plame.

Walton allowed the prosecution to play small portions of videotapes of briefings from early October 2003, by McClellan, who had, by then, succeeded Fleischer as Bush's press secretary.

Libby had complained to Cheney that McClellan had, days earlier, cleared senior White House adviser Karl Rove but not Libby, according to witnesses and trial documents. Cheney then called the White House to urge McClellan to do the same for Libby, suggesting some phrases that Libby and Cheney had worked out together. According to one exhibit, Cheney scribbled on a note: "Has to happen today."

Jurors watched snippets of three McClellan briefings. In one, a few days before Libby's first FBI interview, McClellan was asked whether Libby or two other administration officials had leaked Plame's name. The videotape shows McClellan replying: "I spoke with them so I could come back and say to you, they were not involved."

Yesterday, Walton ruled that Libby's attorneys are not entitled to look at Miller's notebooks for evidence that she had spoken with sources other than Libby about Plame or Wilson.

F.B.I. Agent Says Libby Denied Being Leak Source (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — An F.B.I. agent told a jury Thursday that I. Lewis Libby Jr. “claimed” during formal interviews she conducted that he had not disclosed to two reporters the identity of Valerie Wilson, a Central Intelligence Agency operative.

The testimony from Deborah S. Bond of the Federal Bureau of Investigation came at the beginning of prosecution efforts to close the circle in its case against Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney. Mr. Libby is charged with lying to federal agents and to a grand jury investigating the leak of Ms. Wilson’s name.

By the time Ms. Bond took the stand Thursday afternoon, the jury had already heard from the two reporters — Judith Miller, formerly of The New York Times, and Matthew Cooper, formerly of Time magazine. Ms. Miller testified that Mr. Libby had told her in detail about Ms. Wilson; Mr. Cooper said that Mr. Libby had been more terse, but that he had confirmed she worked at the C.I.A.

In flat, unemotional tones, Ms. Bond recounted two interviews that she and other agents conducted with Mr. Libby in the Old Executive Office Building in October and November of 2003. In them, Mr. Libby gave answers that directly conflicted with the reporters’ accounts.

At the time, the Justice Department was in the early stages of its investigation into how Ms. Wilson’s name was leaked to the press and whether the leak was part of an effort to retaliate against her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV. Mr. Wilson had written an Op-Ed article published in The New York Times on July 6, 2003, asserting that the Bush administration had willfully distorted intelligence to justify invading Iraq.

“Mr. Libby said he had no recollection of discussing Joe Wilson’s wife with Ms. Miller” at a July 8, 2003, meeting at a Washington hotel, Ms. Bond testified. In fact, she said, “Mr. Libby claimed he had no knowledge of Joe Wilson’s wife during that time.”

Ms. Bond, a 19-year veteran of the bureau, testified that Mr. Libby had “claimed” he told Mr. Cooper he heard about Ms. Wilson from other reporters.

In an intriguing but unexplored exchange with a prosecutor, Peter Zeidenberg, Ms. Bond also said that Mr. Libby had acknowledged in one of the interviews that he might have talked to Mr. Cheney aboard Air Force Two about whether to tell the press about Ms. Wilson as part of the effort to rebut Mr. Wilson’s criticisms.

The prosecution will resume its case Monday by playing audiotapes of Mr. Libby's testimony before the grand jury in March 2004 to show a similar conflict when he denied discussing Ms. Wilson with reporters.

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor, who has said he probably will end his presentation by Tuesday, also tried to lay the groundwork to counter the bold argument put forward at the trial's beginning by Mr. Libby's defense team: that White House officials made him a scapegoat to protect Karl Rove, President Bush's chief political strategist.

On Thursday jurors also saw videotape from July 2003 showing Scott McClellan, then the White House press secretary, telling reporters that Mr. Libby had no involvement in the leak of Ms. Wilson's name. Mr. McClellan had initially declined to do so, but was ordered by Mr. Cheney to provide the same exculpatory comments he had given earlier for Mr. Rove.

In a discussion outside the presence of the jury, Mr. Fitzgerald said: "This rebuts the idea that Mr. Libby was thrown under the White House bus. The White House went out to clear him."

Judge Reggie M. Walton appeared to agree. "At this point there hasn't been any substantial evidence that was in play," Judge Walton said of the defense contention that Mr. Libby was a scapegoat.

The comments were made as both sides argued over to how much of Mr. McClellan's news conferences could be shown to the jury on videotape and how much needed to be read.

In the end, the jury was given what might have been a confusing mix; they saw Mr. McClellan's answers on a television screen. The reporters' questions that elicited the comments were read by Kathleen Kedian, a prosecutor, because the judge agreed with Mr. Libby's lawyers that the tone of the reporters was cynical and negative.

Portions Of White House Briefing Tapes Played At Libby Trial (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal Judge Reggie Walton agreed Thursday morning to let prosecutors show video clips of a White House spokesman telling reporters in 2003 that former vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby "had nothing to do" with leaking information about the wife of a Bush administration critic.

Patrick Fitzgerald, special prosecutor in Libby's perjury and obstruction trial, argued that the tapes showed that Libby had a motive for lying to investigators and grand jurors when he said a reporter had told him that Valerie Plame worked at the CIA. Prosecutors say Libby told reporters about Plame.

Then-White House spokesman Scott McClellan's statements "clearing" Libby, on Oct. 7 and Oct. 10, 2003, meant Libby "had to come up with another story" for how reporters learned Plame's identity, Fitzgerald said.

After McClellan spoke, Libby "couldn't walk back from his story" without risking being fired, Fitzgerald said. That was Libby's motive to lie, the prosecutor said.

Plame is the wife of former State Department official Joseph Wilson. In 2003, Wilson publicly accused the administration of "twisting" intelligence about Iraq's nuclear program to justify the invasion in March 2003. Administration officials told reporters he had been sent on a mission to explore Iraq's attempts to buy uranium in the African nation of Niger at the request of his CIA-based wife.

The video clips were "highly prejudicial" to Libby, defense attorney Theodore Wells told Walton, because they might suggest to jurors that Libby had leaked classified information when he spoke about Plame. Although revealing the identity of a CIA officer such as Plame can be a crime, Libby is not charged with that.

Walton agreed to edit questions from the videos in which reporters pressed McClellan on his claims that Libby and two other officials — Karl Rove and Elliot Abrams — "had nothing to do with the situation."

Later in the clips, McClellan modified his statement, saying only that Libby did not leak classified information. Libby was Vice President Cheney's chief of staff.

Wednesday, former Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper testified that Rove, a key adviser to President Bush, had told him in July 2003 that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA.

Days earlier, Wilson had written a column published in The New York Times that criticized the administration for "twisting" intelligence about Iraq.

Fitzgerald has signaled that after the clips are played, he will attempt to play audio transcripts of Libby's grand jury testimony. He also told the judge Thursday that he will attempt to introduce an agreement Libby signed before going to work for the vice president in which he promised not to disclose classified information.

No testimony is scheduled for Friday. Fitzgerald has said he plans to conclude his case Monday by calling an unnamed witness and NBC reporter Tim Russert.

Libby told the grand jury he first learned of Plame's identity in a conversation with Russert on July 10, 2003.

Russert has denied it. Eight prosecution witnesses have said they discussed Plame's CIA job with Libby before July 10, 2003.

Video Undercuts Libby's Defense (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

His assertion that he was a scapegoat clashes with the White House stance that he had no role in leaking a CIA operative's identity.

WASHINGTON — Former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's defense in his perjury trial relies on his contention that he was made a scapegoat to protect White House political strategist Karl Rove from charges of leaking the name of a CIA officer.

But that assertion was dealt a blow Thursday, when jurors were shown videotapes from 2003 of White House spokesman Scott McClellan telling reporters that Libby was not the source of the leak.

"There's no evidence of an effort to throw him under the bus," prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald told U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton, arguing — in the absence of the jury — that the tapes should be played.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators probing whether government officials illegally disclosed the identity of CIA arms-proliferation specialist Valerie Plame in the summer of 2003, soon after her husband, former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, accused the Bush administration of twisting prewar intelligence in Iraq.

His lawyers have told the jury that Libby, who was then chief of staff for Vice President Dick Cheney, feared he was being made a scapegoat to shield Rove, one of President Bush's most trusted advisors, from legal problems.

But that argument, Fitzgerald told Walton on Thursday, was undercut by the fact that McClellan told reporters that Libby wasn't involved in the leak. Over the objections of Libby's lawyers, Walton allowed the prosecution to play brief excerpts of the tapes.

McClellan ardently defended the White House during a series of briefings in early October 2003. At the time, the Justice Department was just beginning a criminal investigation into the leak, and questions were swirling about the possible involvement of administration insiders. McClellan initially told reporters that Rove had engaged in no misconduct, but the spokesman declined to be drawn into a discussion of the possible roles of others.

Libby, his lawyers have said, saw that initial reluctance as a sign that unnamed officials were conspiring to have him take the fall so Rove would emerge unscathed. Libby complained to Cheney, the lawyers have said, and a few days later McClellan changed his message, exonerating Libby and a third White House official as well as Rove.

"I spoke with those individuals … and those individuals assured me they were not involved in this," McClellan told reporters Oct. 10. When asked what "this" was, he replied: "The leaking of classified information."

On Thursday, Walton questioned defense lawyer Theodore Wells about the scapegoat theory, asking how, given the videos, "you make out a case that somehow the White House was putting his head on a platter…. I don't understand how that connection is going to be made."

Fitzgerald has alleged that Libby was involved in helping craft McClellan's language. But he noted that the statement publicly clearing Libby also put him in a private bind: Libby was concerned that he had leaked classified information about Plame, so he set out to construct a story that would insulate him from being charged with that crime, Fitzgerald said.

During his first interview with the FBI, which came four days after McClellan's last mention of the leak, Libby told investigators that he had discussed Plame with journalists and others, but he said that he was only passing on information he had heard from reporters, including Tim Russert of NBC News.

In fact, the government has alleged that Libby heard about Plame from a number of official sources — initially from Cheney himself, as well as from officials from the CIA and the State Department. Unlike passing along tips from reporters, passing along tips about Plame from official sources could constitute a crime.

"He has got to tell a story consistent with what the White House has told the world," Fitzgerald said Thursday. "He is locked in with his feet planted in cement.

"The cleanest way to take himself off the hook is to say, 'I heard it from reporters,' that 'I did not know it was true.' "

Wells has said that Libby did not lie at all, and that any misstatements to investigators were the product of memory lapses and the stress of his involvement in life-and-death national security issues.

After playing snippets of the videotapes for the jury, Fitzgerald called an FBI agent, Deborah Bond, to the stand to recount details of two interviews Libby gave to investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0126190

According to Bond, Libby acknowledged that Cheney had told him in a phone conversation around June 12, 2003, that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA, but Libby added that he had forgotten the conversation by the time he talked with journalists about Plame a few weeks later.

Bond testified that Libby also said that he and Cheney may have discussed telling reporters that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA, but that he could not be sure.

And, she added, "Mr. Libby told us he believed that the vice president had learned this information from the [then-]director of Central Intelligence, George Tenet."

The trial is adjourned until Monday. The government is expected to call Russert before resting its case early next week.

rick.schmitt@latimes.com

A Failed Cover-Up (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Why was the White House so nervous in the summer of 2003 about the CIA's reporting on alleged Iraqi attempts to buy uranium from Niger to build a nuclear bomb? That's the big question that runs through the many little details that have emerged in the perjury trial of Vice President Cheney's former top aide, Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

The trial record suggests a simple answer: The White House was worried that the CIA would reveal that it had been pressured in 2002 and early 2003 to support administration claims about Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, and that in the Niger case, the CIA had tried hard to resist this pressure. The machinations of Cheney, Libby and others were an attempt to weave an alternative narrative that blamed the CIA.

The truth began to emerge on July 11, 2003, when CIA Director George Tenet issued a public statement disclosing that the agency had tried to warn the White House off the Niger allegations. In that sense, the Libby trial is about a cover-up that failed.

What helped start the whole brouhaha was a 2003 op-ed article by former ambassador Joseph Wilson, disclosing that his fact-finding trip to Niger the previous year had yielded no evidence of Iraqi uranium purchases. His piece opened with a devastating question: "Did the Bush administration manipulate intelligence about Saddam Hussein's weapons programs to justify an invasion of Iraq?" A frantic White House tried to rebut Wilson's criticism by leaking the fact that his wife, Valerie Plame, worked at the CIA and had suggested sending him to Niger -- as if the CIA connection somehow contaminated Wilson's allegations and made the White House less culpable.

To understand the Libby case, it's important to look at the documentary evidence, which has been usefully compiled by washingtonpost.com.

The record begins with a Feb. 13, 2002, memo from a CIA briefer who had been "tasked" by Cheney on the uranium issue: "The VP was shown an assessment (he thought from DIA) that Iraq is purchasing uranium from Africa. He would like our assessment of that transaction and its implications for Iraq's nuclear program." The CIA briefer responded the next day with a comment that should have aroused skepticism on whether Iraq needed to buy any more uranium: Iraq already had 550 tons of "yellowcake" ore -- 200 tons of it from Niger. But the CIA, eager to please, asked Wilson a few days later to go to Niger to investigate the claim.

A glimpse of the pressure coming from the vice president's office emerges from a memo from CIA briefer Craig R. Schmall, after he was interviewed in January 2004 by FBI agents investigating the leak of Plame's covert identity: "I mentioned also to the agents that Libby was in charge within the administration (or at least the White House side) for producing papers arguing the case for Iraqi WMD and ties between Iraq and al Qaeda, which explains Libby's and the Vice President's interest in the Iraq/Niger/Uranium case."

CIA and State Department documents show that analysts at both agencies became increasingly skeptical about the Niger allegation and tried to warn the White House. A memo from Schmall to Eric Edelman, then Cheney's national security adviser, recalled: "CIA on several occasions has cautioned . . . that available information on this issue was fragmentary and unconfirmed." A memo from Carl W. Ford Jr., then head of the State Department's intelligence bureau, noted that his analysts had found the Niger claims "highly dubious."

The Niger issue wasn't included in Secretary of State Colin Powell's famous U.N. speech on Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, according to Ford, "due to CIA concerns raised during the coordination regarding the veracity of the information on the alleged Iraq-Niger agreement." But despite CIA warnings, Bush referred to uranium purchases from Africa in his January 2003 State of the Union address, attributing it to British sources.

So we begin to understand why the White House was worried about the CIA in the summer of 2003: It feared the agency would breach the wall of silence about the claims regarding weapons of mass destruction. Robert Grenier, a CIA official who was the agency's Iraq mission manager, told colleagues that he remembered "a series of insistent phone calls" that month from Libby, who wanted the CIA to tell reporters that "other community elements such as State and DOD" had encouraged Wilson's Niger trip, not just Cheney.

The bottom line? Grenier was asked in court last week to explain the White House's 2003 machinations. Here's what he said: "I think they were trying to avoid blame for not providing [the truth] about whether or not Iraq had attempted to buy uranium." Let me say it again: This trial is about a cover-up that failed.

Net-betting Crackdown Freezes Funds (USAT)

By Jon Swartz, Usa Today

USA Today, February 2, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — The federal crackdown on online gambling has tied up the funds of thousands of U.S. patrons of two of the largest services.

The crackdown on BetOnSports, which no longer takes sports wagers from the USA, and Neteller — an Internet payment service popular among gamblers — is intended to put a dent in the $10.6 billion industry.

And it has: Following federal charges against executives from both companies, dozens of the more than 2,300 websites that service online gambling have stopped taking U.S. wagers.

Still, the actions against BetOnSports and Neteller have left the online accounts of their U.S. customers frozen until legal issues are resolved.

"The truth is that the money is in limbo and the companies are not required to refund any money until a successful prosecution or settlement takes place," says Michael Tew, principal of gaming consultant CapitalHQ. "This could take years." Funds from other gambling sites are not tied up, Tew and others say.

Most U.S. customers of BetOnSports have been waiting to cash out money in their accounts since July, when a federal grand jury issued a 22-count indictment charging CEO David Carruthers with racketeering, conspiracy and fraud. BetOnSports handled $1.77 billion in bets during its 2005 fiscal year, with more than 90% of wagers from the USA. An attorney representing the company declined to comment.

Neteller founders Stephen Lawrence and John Lefebvre were arrested in January on a charge of conspiracy to transfer funds with the intent to promote illegal gambling.

Though money-transfer companies such as Neteller do business with financial institutions and merchants, many also allow gambling companies to transfer money collected from U.S. gamblers to bank accounts outside the USA. Neteller last month closed its U.S. Internet gambling services, erasing about two-thirds of its business.

Neteller offers few instructions for customers trying to cash out their accounts. "We are working to resolve all withdrawal issues, but in the meantime we continue to maintain these funds in trust on your behalf," says a posting on the company's website.

Neteller declined to comment. The company processed more than $7 billion in online gambling transactions in its 2005 fiscal year. FBI Agent Neil Donovan says funds from Neteller are being held in court as potential evidence. Some customers may get their money back, but he did not provide a timetable.

A law signed by President Bush in October bans the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for Internet gaming. U.S. residents place more than half of all bets to major offshore casinos.

BetOnSports has settled civil charges with the Justice Department, but not criminal charges. Carruthers' case is separate.

Notorious NYC Crack Kingpin Convicted Of Murder For Paying To Have Rivals Killed (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 2, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-A notorious crack kingpin with ties to the hip-hop industry was convicted Thursday in a federal death penalty case for paying $50,000 (â‚¬38,400) to have two rivals gunned down in 2001.

A jury deliberated five days before finding Kenneth "Supreme" McGriff guilty of murder conspiracy and drug dealing. McGriff, who was acquitted on lesser drugs and weapons charges, looked back and smiled at his supporters when the verdict was issued.

In the 1980s, McGriff founded the Supreme Team, a notoriously lucrative and ruthless drug crew that became legendary on the same Queens borough streets that later produced rap stars like Ja Rule and 50 Cent.

The defense claimed that after an earlier prison sentence for drugs, McGriff went straight in the late 1990s and pursued his dream of producing movies and music by teaming with Irv "Gotti" Lorenzo, a neighborhood friend who headed the successful Murder Inc. record label.

Prosecutors alleged McGriff, 46, instead resumed his drug dealing operations in New York and Baltimore, and used Murder Inc. to launder more than $1 million (â,¬770,000) in proceeds. When a little-known rapper named E-Money Bags shot and killed one of McGriff's friends in a 1999 dispute, the defendant allegedly paid a hit team to kill the rapper and a second man who McGriff feared might retaliate.

"That man sitting in the courtroom is one of the most dangerous, feared, ruthless gangsters in all of Queens," prosecutor Carolyn Pokorney said during closing arguments. "And when Supreme gets in a fight with somebody ... he doesn't go to the cops. He doesn't hire a lawyer. He hires a hit team to assassinate them, to blow them away, so that their moms can barely recognize them when they go down to the morgue."

The defense told jurors that both victims were known thugs who were armed when killed. It also argued that the government had built its case on the false testimony of admitted criminals hoping to see their prison time reduced.

The same jury will return next Tuesday to deliberate the death penalty against McGriff. At the least, McGriff would face a sentence of life in prison without parole.

U.S. District Judge Frederic Block surprised prosecutors last week by asking them to contact U.S. officials and ask them to reconsider their decision to seek a death sentence for McGriff, saying a penalty phase would be an "absurd" waste of time and money. The prosecutors told him this week the officials had not changed their minds.

Defense lawyer David Ruhnke said that though he was disappointed with the verdict, "We're pretty confident this jury will spare his life."

The mother of one of the victims, Karen Cameron, told reporters outside court that she opposed a death sentence for McGriff. "Death is not the answer," she said.

McGriff was originally indicted along with Lorenzo and Lorenzo's brother Chris, a Murder Inc. executive. After being granted a separate trial, the brothers were acquitted in 2005 of money-laundering charges.

McGriff succeeded in making a straight-to-video film, "Crime Partners 2000," that featured Ja Rule, Snoop Dogg and Ice-T. The movie, about two hit men, was released in 2001.

At the Supreme Team's peak, McGriff and his nephew, Gerald "Prince" Miller, employed scores of crack dealers in and around a Queens housing project and took in $200,000 (â,¬153,600) a day, authorities said.

The team used rooftop sentinels with two-way radios to thwart police. It inflicted violence against rivals and traitors, resulting in at least eight murders in 1987 alone, authorities said.

McGriff's was among three death penalty trials occurring simultaneously at the same federal courthouse.

Last month, a jury spared the life of a gang member convicted of murder. Earlier this week, a jury sentenced to death the killer of two undercover police detectives - the first federal defendant sentenced to death in New York City since 1954.

Man Convicted In 2 Killings; U.S. To Pursue The Death Penalty (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

A jury in federal court in Brooklyn yesterday convicted a notorious crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry of hiring a hit team from Harlem to murder two rivals in 2001, crimes for which he could face the death penalty.

Shortly after the verdict was delivered in United States District Court, the mothers of the two victims told reporters in the courthouse hallway that they would be uncomfortable with a death sentence for their sons' killer.

The jury's decision came just two days after a jury in the same courthouse voted in an unrelated case to execute Ronell Wilson, who had been convicted of killing two police detectives. That was the first time a federal death sentence had been handed up in New York in more than 50 years.

In the case decided yesterday, the jury, after a three-week trial, found the convicted trafficker, Kenneth McGriff, guilty of racketeering, conspiracy to distribute narcotics and other crimes. The jury acquitted him of murder in aid of racketeering and gun charges.

During the roughly 10 minutes it took for the jury forewoman to read out the verdicts on each of the 17 counts against him, Mr. McGriff, wearing a dark olive green vest and trousers, white shirt and tie, appeared relaxed and unmoved. He leaned back in his chair several times, then watched intently as the court clerk polled each juror.

After the panel, which had deliberated for three and a half days, left the courtroom, Mr. McGriff smiled broadly at friends and family members in the courtroom gallery and pursed his lips together as if to blow kisses.

The aunt of one of the victims wept as she left the courtroom.

Minutes later, standing in a hallway waiting for the elevator, the mothers of the two victims, still breathless and appearing shaken by the jury's verdict, suggested that they hoped the panel would spare Mr. McGriff's life.

DOJ_NMG_0126193

"Death is not the answer — there's been enough death," said Karen Cameron, whose son, Eric Smith, was one of the men slain by the hit team Mr. McGriff hired six years ago for $25,000 for each killing.

"I don't want anybody's death on my hands," said Bessie Singleton, the mother of the other man, Troy Singleton.

The assistant United States attorneys who prosecuted the case — Carolyn Pokorny, Jason Jones and Jeffrey Rabkin — had presented evidence that Mr. Smith was killed in retaliation for the slaying of Mr. McGriff's friend, Culbert Johnson. They alleged that Mr. Singleton was slain because Mr. McGriff feared he would retaliate for the killing of Mr. Smith.

Beginning Tuesday, the jury will hear evidence in the penalty phase, and will then weigh whether to vote to execute Mr. McGriff or sentence him to life without parole.

One of his lawyers, David A. Ruhnke, said he was disappointed with the verdict but was "pretty confident" the panel would spare his client's life.

"We're certainly grateful to learn that the victim's families are not interested in a death sentence in this case, and we'll be discussing with the government whether that changes their minds," Mr. Ruhnke said later.

The verdict came a week after the judge in the case, Frederic Block, in unusually blunt remarks from the bench, called the government's effort to seek the death penalty "absurd" and a waste of taxpayers' money. Outside the presence of the jury, he urged the prosecutors to forward his remarks to their Justice Department superiors in Washington and to ask them to abandon the endeavor.

The prosecutors told the judge earlier this week that they had passed on his concerns to the United States attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, but that they were going to pursue the death penalty.

The defense had argued that Mr. McGriff, after serving a federal prison term of six years, had abandoned crime and drugs and sought to produce music and movies with Irving and Chris Lorenzo, two rap producers for the Murder Inc. label who were known professionally as Irv and Chris Gotti.

Mr. McGriff was originally indicted in January 2005 along with the Lorenzos, who were charged with laundering drug money through the label. Their cases were separated from Mr. McGriff's, and they were acquitted in December 2005.

Chris Lorenzo was in court yesterday, and after the verdict said only, "I was here for a friend I'm supporting."

Ex-U.N. Official Jailed Pending Trial (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, The Associated Press

AP, February 2, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) — A judge revoked the bail of a former senior United Nations official and ordered him detained until his trial on bribery charges.

Sanjaya Bahel, an Indian diplomat and the former head of the U.N. commodity procurement section, has pleaded not guilty of using his influence to steer contracts worth more than $50 million to a man who rewarded him with valuable real estate. His trial is expected to begin as early as next month.

Bahel had been free on $900,000 bail, but U.S. District Judge Denise L. Cote said that was insufficient to ensure he would appear at trial. Part of his collateral included Manhattan apartments Bahel was alleged to have purchased at a discount as a reward for awarding contracts.

The man accused of offering the bribes, Nishan Kohli, has pleaded guilty and admitted that he made cash payments and real estate deals with Bahel to benefit himself and the companies he represented.

Prosecutors said Bahel was fired from the United Nations last month and no longer was lawfully in the United States.

The judge said his immigration status was "precarious" but not illegal.

Hung Jury In Coca-Cola Conspiracy Trial (NSDY/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Ap Business Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 2, 2007

ATLANTA -- A federal jury deliberating the fate of a former Coca-Cola secretary charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage maker in an effort to sell them to Pepsi told a judge Thursday it is unable to make a decision.

"We are a hung jury, have taken several polls and we feel we are unable to reach a decision," the foreperson said in a note to U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester.

Forrester did not declare a mistrial. Instead, he told the jury to take another crack at reaching a verdict Friday in the case against Joya Williams.

The jury already has deliberated nine hours over two days.

Williams, who faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted, was fired as a secretary to Coca-Cola's global brand director at the company's Atlanta headquarters after the allegations came to light.

The government says Williams stole confidential documents and samples of products that hadn't been launched from The Coca-Cola Co. and gave them to Ibrahim Dimson and Edmund Duhaney as part of a conspiracy to sell the items to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc. for at least $1.5 million.

The alleged conspiracy was foiled after Pepsi warned Atlanta-based Coca-Cola and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Dimson and Duhaney have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing. Duhaney testified previously that Williams spearheaded the scheme. Dimson did not testify.

The government says Williams was deeply in debt, unhappy in her job and seeking a big payday, so she embarked on the scheme to steal trade secrets.

Defense lawyer Janice Singer urged jurors to use their common sense. She argued that prosecutors did not prove their case beyond a reasonable doubt.

Singer suggested that Dimson and Duhaney stole the documents and product samples from Williams without her knowledge and conspired to sell them to Pepsi behind her back. Williams testified earlier this week she left a key under her doormat for one of the co-defendants, perhaps explaining how they could have gotten into her home.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said during his closing argument Wednesday that the key under the mat claim was one of many lies told by Williams.

During two days on the stand, Williams testified that she didn't steal anything from Coke, but rather took documents and product samples home to protect herself in case her boss questioned whether she was doing her job.

She also claimed that $4,000 in cash she deposited into her bank account in June 2006, just days after Dimson was given $30,000 in cash from an undercover FBI agent in exchange for Coke materials, came from a friend, not from Dimson.

But the friend, Clifton Carroll, testified Tuesday that Williams was lying; he said the most money he ever loaned her was $400, and that was after her July 5 arrest.

Williams' credibility has been an issue for the jury to weigh during its deliberations.

Camden Redevelopment Corp. Records Subpoenaed (CAMCP)

By Jim Walsh, Courier-Post Staff

Camden Courier-Post, February 2, 2007

CAMDEN -- State and federal investigators are probing a private nonprofit organization run by Randy Primas, the city's former chief executive, an official said Thursday.

The FBI and the state Attorney General's Office have subpoenaed records related to the Primas-led Camden Redevelopment Corp., according to City Council President Angel Fuentes.

The nonprofit paid $1 for six properties in Cramer Hill that had been acquired for $692,000 by a city agency, the Camden Redevelopment Authority, that was also overseen by Primas until late last year.

Primas could not be reached Thursday evening.

He previously has said the land deal was done to provide affordable housing, and not for personal gain. He said $30,000 in cash obtained as part of the deal was to be used for future audits for the nonprofit group.

The subpoenas were served to the Camden Redevelopment Agency and the Municipal Clerk's office, which retains city records, Fuentes said.

"We will cooperate fully," said the council president, who added he was unaware of the specific documents requested.

Fuentes said Theodore Z. Davis, a retired state Superior Court judge who succeeded Primas as the city's chief operating officer, "is in full support." Davis could not be reached.

David Wald, a spokesman for the state Attorney General's Office, said the agency does not confirm or deny investigations. An FBI spokesperson echoed the same comment.

The chief operating officer, who is appointed by the governor, is the city's most powerful official under a state-funded turnaround program. Primas left the $175,000 job on Dec. 8.

City Council members in November voted unanimously to approve the land sale as part of a planned $18.5 million affordable housing project by Michaels Development Co. of Marlton.

Michaels is to build the apartments and manage the project, said Joel Silver, the firm's vice president. The nonprofit organization is to own the land and lease it to Michaels for 98 years.

A majority of council members have said they did not know Primas was the nonprofit's chairman or that his organization would receive $30,000.

Arijit De, former executive director of the city's redevelopment agency and former secretary of the private nonprofit, has said the private organization received no special treatment. He could not be reached Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0126195

At a legislative hearing on Camden's turnaround effort on Tuesday, Primas said he resents the implication "that somehow I'm self-dealing. I'm not."

But, he said, "Perhaps, in hindsight, we probably wouldn't do it that way again."

Fuentes said all city administrator are to undergo mandatory ethics training in the near future. The training, to be provided by the state, is required under an ordinance that was recently approved by council, he said.

Separately, state and federal grand juries are investigating legal fees paid by the Camden Redevelopment Agency to state Sen. Wayne Bryant, D-Lawnside.

Reach Jim Walsh at (856) 486-2646 or jwalsh@courierpostonline.com

More Subpoenas Focus On Camden Redevelopment (PHI)

By Dwight Ott And Jennifer Moroz

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 2, 2007

Another wave of subpoenas from the New Jersey Attorney General's Office and the FBI has landed at the Camden Redevelopment Agency, city officials said yesterday.

The subpoenas, delivered Wednesday, were the second batch of requests for documents from the agency in the last four months, amid questions about its relationship to State Sen. Wayne Bryant (D., Camden) as well as its role in the stalled $1.2 billion Cramer Hill Redevelopment Plan, which would have displaced more than 1,000 families.

"I think it may have to do with Cramer Hill," said Theodore Z. Davis, Camden's acting state-appointed chief operating officer, referring to the latest subpoenas.

Davis and agency attorney Martin McKernan referred questions about the subpoenas to the Redevelopment Agency's new executive director, John Kromer. Kromer was out of town yesterday and could not be reached.

The Redevelopment Agency directs Camden's state-financed recovery and is the focal point for any Camden development plans.

The new request for records comes at a time when the agency has been under fire for a deal brokered by a private nonprofit corporation headed by former Camden chief operating officer Melvin R. "Randy" Primas Jr. and the former Redevelopment Agency executive director, Arijit De.

In the deal, the nonprofit Camden City Redevelopment Corp. - headed by Primas and De - partnered with the Michael's Development Co. to obtain six Camden properties. Those properties were then turned over to the city and leased from the Redevelopment Agency by Michael's for $477,000, according to Kromer. Primas' corporation was paid a $30,000 administrative fee.

The land in question was part of an $18.5 million affordable-housing project of 78 apartments for low- to moderate-income people in Cramer Hill.

The deal raised questions because Primas served as chairman of both the Redevelopment Agency and the nonprofit corporation.

Kromer said earlier this week that the Redevelopment Agency was reflecting on the ethics of the arrangement. Still, he said, other redevelopment deals in Camden have long used similar practices.

"In the future it won't be done," Kromer added.

Kromer recently replaced De, who quit as the agency's chief in December. Primas resigned as Camden's chief operating officer in November. Davis replaced him until the governor names a permanent replacement.

Mafia Boss Pleads Guilty To Racketeering (NSDY/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 2, 2007

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. -- The admitted boss of the Genovese organized crime family's South Florida operations pleaded guilty Thursday to federal racketeering charges and could spend 20 years in prison.

Renaldi "Ray" Ruggiero, 73, admitted in a plea agreement that he was a "capo" in the New York-based Mafia family and supervised a crew that committed numerous crimes including extortion, robbery, money laundering and possession of stolen property.

"I plead guilty, your honor," Ruggiero told U.S. District Judge James Cohn.

Sentencing was set for April 27 for Ruggiero, who could also be fined $25,000. Ruggiero pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy, but did not agree to cooperate with federal Mafia investigators in his deal.

DOJ_NMG_0126196

The guilty plea came after another federal judge rejected Ruggiero's attempt to throw out evidence from more than 12,000 phone calls intercepted on FBI wiretaps and 130 other undercover recordings that provide details about the group's plots and crimes.

Four other defendants in the case have also entered guilty pleas to racketeering conspiracy charges, and two others are still pending.

One of the pending cases is that of 96-year-old Albert "Chinky" Facchiano. He is also a "made" member of the Genovese family and has a long criminal history dating to the 1930s, according to federal prosecutors.

Ruggiero, who has a home in Palm Beach Gardens, had never been arrested before last June on the federal charges, according to the FBI. He became the top Genovese boss in South Florida in 2003, court documents show.

Facchiano is also named in a New York federal grand jury indictment against numerous other Genovese family members. His attorneys have filed papers asking that the New York and Florida cases be consolidated in Florida for a possible plea agreement.

Suspect Pleads Guilty To Racketeering (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 2, 2007

The Palm Beach Gardens grandfather accused of running South Florida operations for the Genovese crime family pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy Thursday in Fort Lauderdale federal court.

Renaldi Ruggiero, 73, faces up to 20 years in prison for his role in organized criminal activities that include robberies, extortion, money laundering and loan sharking between 1994 and 2006. Sentencing is set for April 27.

Another mob figure charged in the case, 96-year-old Albert "The Old Man" Facchiano, is set to plead guilty in coming weeks. The two men, who prosecutors described as members of La Cosa Nostra, and four alleged Genovese associates were charged in June. The 29-page indictment detailed a bloody assault against a South Florida businessman in October 2003 that prosecutors said Ruggiero approved.

Ruggiero was not present at the beating, which took place in a Coral Springs office, but he later described the attack in a telephone call that was taped by authorities. Ruggiero said his crew "broke [the victim's] fingers, messed up his other hand, beat him up, and told him if he did not pay him his money by next week, he'll know what to expect."

Ruggiero, who owns a Palm Beach County restaurant called Soprano's, also admitted that he helped launder purported drug proceeds and accepted stolen goods worth more than $100,000 from an undercover agent.

A November 2003 search of Ruggiero's home turned up records of about 40 loans made by Ruggiero at annual interest rates ranging from 52 percent to 156 percent, prosecutors said.

The loans were made with the understanding that any delay in paying them back could result in violence, according to authorities.

In addition to those records, the government's evidence against Ruggiero included thousands of recorded phone calls and tapes made by two undercover agents.

On Jan. 24, a federal magistrate upheld the wiretap evidence, rejecting a bid from Ruggiero's attorney to have it thrown out.

Lawyer Michael Salnick said the legal setback and serious heart problems convinced Ruggiero to enter a plea deal with the government.

Ruggiero did not agree to cooperate with investigators, Salnick said.

Salnick bristled at prosecutors' description of his client as a "capo."

"That's a TV movie term as far as I'm concerned," Salnick said. "He has admitted his involvement in certain criminal acts."

Priest Suspected In Attack Arrested (NSDY/AP)

By Amanda Lee Myers, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 2, 2007

PHOENIX -- A Roman Catholic priest accused of beating and sexually assaulting a female employee at his Las Vegas parish and fleeing to Arizona could soon be extradited to Nevada to face charges, an FBI official said.

The Rev. George Chaanine, 52, was arrested without incident Thursday by FBI agents in Apache Junction, about 30 miles east of Phoenix, said Deb McCarley, a spokeswoman for the FBI office in Phoenix.

He was being held in a county jail in Phoenix on a federal charge of unlawful flight to avoid prosecution. But that charge most likely would be dropped so Chaanine can be quickly extradited to Las Vegas, where he is wanted for attempted murder, sexual assault, kidnapping and battery with a deadly weapon, McCarley said.

DOJ_NMG_0126197

Chaanine has been a fugitive since the alleged Jan. 26 assault of 54-year-old office worker at the Our Lady of Las Vegas parish, where the priest was an administrator.

The woman told Las Vegas police that she was sitting at her desk when Chaanine broke a full bottle of wine over her head, grabbed her by the hair and dragged her down a hall toward his office.

She fought back, lost consciousness, and awoke with Chaanine touching her private parts, according to the police report. She continued fighting until Chaanine straddled her and grabbed her throat. She told detectives she began to pray for her life before the attack suddenly stopped.

The woman told police that after the attack Chaanine muttered that he was going to kill himself. He said he would call an ambulance, and left the church, she told police.

Chaanine has been suspended with pay from his position as church administrative pastor.

In a statement from the Roman Catholic Diocese of Las Vegas, Bishop Joseph Pepe praised authorities for finding Chaanine.

"We are relieved that Father Chaanine has been found and now justice can be served through the legal process," Pepe said. "We have worked closely with the authorities and are hopeful that the information we provided proved helpful."

Chaanine, a native of Lebanon, was ordained in 1996 and worked at churches in Detroit, Youngstown, Ohio, El Paso, Texas, and Wheeling, W.Va., before beginning work at Our Lady of Las Vegas in 2004, the diocese said.

* —

Associated Press writers Ryan Nakashima, Kathleen Hennessey and Ken Ritter in Las Vegas contributed to this report.

Hoosier Admits Katrina Fund Fraud (FWNS)

The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel, February 2, 2007

INDIANAPOLIS — A Bloomington man pleaded guilty Wednesday to collecting nearly $44,000 in funds meant to help Hurricane Katrina victims and $105,000 in fraudulent student college loans, federal authorities said. Alan King, 29, was charged with theft of government money, loan fraud, false use of Social Security numbers and student financial aid fraud.

Federal investigators allege King collected 12 government payments totaling $43,972 after claiming he and a family member lived at two addresses in New Orleans and one in Biloxi, Miss., during the hurricane and flood in September 2005.

2 Saucier Women Arrested In Katrina Fraud Cases (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 2, 2007

GULFPORT, Miss. - Two Saucier women are charged with multiple counts alleging they made false statements to the Federal Emergency Management Agency for disaster assistance after Hurricane Katrina.

Teresa M. Baumgart and Mandi D. Ely appeared Wednesday before U.S. Magistrate John M. Roper in Gulfport and were released on $25,000 bond each to await arraignment in federal court on Feb. 26. The charges carry maximum penalties of 25 years in prison and $500,000 in fines.

Indictments say the women claimed to live at neighboring addresses along Mississippi 67 in Saucier when the hurricane hit, though they did not live there. It also says both women claimed their homes and personal possessions were damaged.

Indictments also say Baumgart received $6,914 from FEMA in four wire transfers between Sept. 12, 2005, and Feb. 22, 2006, and Ely received $4,358 in wire transfers on Sept. 12, 2005 and Oct. 18, 2005.

Man Sentenced In Cisco Scam (BOSH)

By Jay Fitzgerald, Boston Herald General Economics Reporter

Boston Herald, February 2, 2007

A Pepperell man and former worker at Hanscom Air Force Base was sentenced yesterday to more than four years in prison for scamming Cisco Systems out of more than $4.7 million.

Nicholas Stoupis, 36, who used to work as a military contractor at Hanscom, was also ordered by U.S. Judge Richard G. Stearns to repay Cisco $3.1 million that he stole from the firm by tricking it into sending him products that he resold on the Internet by touting them as used military equipment.

Stoupis, who last year pleaded guilty to four counts of mail and wire fraud, would set up bogus e-mail accounts with Hanscom addresses, according to a press release issued yesterday by U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan.

Stoupis would then monitor Cisco's site for any recalled products, such as computer networking equipment, and ask that replacement materials be sent to his home. The products would then be sold on the Internet by Stoupis, who claimed they were previously used by the military.

Man Sentenced In Military Contract Fraud (BOS)

The Boston Globe, February 2, 2007

BOSTON --A man who worked as a military contractor at Hanscom Air Force Base was sentenced Tuesday to four years and three months in prison after pleading guilty to charges he ran a scheme to steal $4.7 million worth of products from Cisco Systems, Inc.

U.S. District Judge Richard G. Stearns also ordered Nicholas Stoupis, 36, of Pepperell, to pay $3.1 million in restitution to the California-based company, according to the U.S. Attorney's office. Stoupis also was ordered to serve three years of supervised release after his prison term.

Stoupis pleaded guilty Oct. 5 to two counts of mail fraud and two counts of wire fraud.

Prosecutors said he carried out the scheme from July 2004 through March 2006, creating e-mail accounts in the name of fictitious people using a Hanscom address, and using them to order replacements for recalled products that had been sold to the military or to contractors.

Stoupis had the goods sent to his home, then sold them over the Internet, prosecutors said.

Stoupis' attorney, Robert F. Casey Jr., did not immediately return an after-hours message seeking comment.

Woman's Bail Revoked In Child Pornography Case (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 2, 2007

A federal judge yesterday revoked the bail of a Delaware County woman accused of helping a boyfriend tape a staggering amount of child pornography.

Dorothy Prawdzik, 43, had been free on bail pending trial, but was jailed yesterday after authorities alleged that she had not been truthful with investigators, specifically that she failed to tell agents about a sexual encounter with her boyfriend, John Jackey Worman, and a 10-year-old girl.

Prawdzik's lawyer, Regina Coyne, did not deny the encounter, but said Prawdzik suffered from depression and memory loss, and did not recall the incident until confronted by investigators.

Worman is accused of taping himself having sex with children of ages from 3 months to 15 years. The FBI said it discovered on Worman's computer 11,000 movies of him having sex with children.

In a separate proceeding yesterday, Worman, 39, pleaded not guilty, and U.S. Magistrate Judge Charles Smith ordered him held without bail.

Afterward, Worman's lawyer, S. Lee Ruslander, said he did not know if his client could get a fair trial in Philadelphia, given the publicity surrounding the case. He also questioned why Worman was held on state charges for nearly a year before a federal grand jury indictment was brought.

Federal sentences for child pornography are typically stiffer than state charges. If convicted of more than one of the 51 counts in the federal indictment, Worman faces a minimum mandatory sentence of 25 years. The advisory federal guidelines also recommend an even longer sentence: life in prison.

Prawdzik and another former Worman girlfriend, Concetta Jackson, face at least 15 years in prison if convicted of just one count of aiding him.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Levy said Jackson, 44, "effectively ran a day-care center... and she bascially allowed Mr. Worman to have unsupervised control over the female children."

"Her statements to the FBI and Delaware County law enforcement officers were that she would occasionally go upstairs to check on the children because she had this uncomfortable feeling, but basically allowed it to happen."

Jackson's lawyer, Mark Wilson, said, "No one is denying that she was aware that he was taking pictures that might be inappropriate. The question is whether that knowledge is sufficient to meet criminal liability."

Wilson added: "There is no evidence that she molested anyone or that she saw it happen."

Jackson is a disabled former convenience-story employee who divorced her abusive husband in 1999, her lawyer said. She met Worman in 2002, when her landlord sent him to inspect her home. They began to date and he moved into the home in 2003.

"He became abusive toward her and essentially had her under his thumb," Wilson said.

Since the indictment, Wilson said, neighbors have yelled at her and thrown bricks and eggs at her home.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel, who presided over hundreds of sexual-abuse cases as a state judge in Lancaster, ordered Jackson confined to her home pending trial.

DOJ_NMG_0126199

In an unrelated case, Stengel yesterday sentenced a 58-year-old married father of three from Reading to 18 months in prison for possessing child pornography.

Edward E. Williams had pleaded guilty to possessing 159 images of child pornography on his computer. Williams told Stengel that he had been abused as a child and did not get sexual satisfcation from viewing the images, but looked at them to try to understand why others would.

Also yesterday, a Missouri man, Mark Wagemann, was sentenced to five years in prison for traveling to Philadelphia to meet for sex a girl he believed to be 14. He met her online.

The "girl" was an undercover FBI agent. When Wagemann was arrested at Philadelphia International Airport, Wagemann was carrying Viagra, bubble bath and a poem.

Journalists Pay Deadly Toll In Reporting News (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — The number of journalists killed or jailed worldwide has reached its highest level in a decade, with arrests rising as governments seek to control the Internet, an advocacy group said Thursday.

The survey by Reporters Without Borders, a media-advocacy group, found that 81 journalists were killed last year and more than 140 are behind bars. It was the worst year for deaths since 1994, which was marked by the Rwandan genocide, civil war in Algeria and conflict in the former Yugoslavia.

In the United States, blogger Josh Wolf was jailed in August after defying a federal judge's order to hand over his video of a protest at an economic summit of the world's industrial powers. Sudanese Al-Jazeera cameraman Sami al-Haj was imprisoned at the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, without charges on suspected al-Qaida links.

"There has never been a more dangerous time to be a journalist," said Lucie Morillon, Washington director of Reporters Without Borders. "But even more deplorable was the lack of interest, and sometimes even the failure, by democratic countries in defending everywhere the values they are supposed to incarnate."

The report said many governments seek to gain more control over the Internet, a popular medium for dissent in less democratic countries and a growing source of news in the U.S.

At least 60 people are in prison worldwide for posting criticism of their governments online.

China has been a leader among those countries in installing spyware and demanding that U.S. companies Yahoo Inc., Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Cisco Systems Inc. alter their search-engines to filter out Web sites critical of the government, the report said.

In the U.S., the report said journalists and bloggers' "freedom of expression" is at risk. It called for laws requiring that telecommunications companies treat all Internet broadband content alike.

Legislation to do that was rejected by the Senate in June, but backers are hopeful that the new Democratic-controlled Congress will change course.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, meanwhile, has said Congress should require Internet providers to preserve customer records as a way to assist prosecutors' investigations into child pornography and possibly terrorism.

"It has become vital to examine new technology from a moral standpoint and understand the secondary effects of it," the report said. "If firms and democratic countries continue to duck the issue ... we shall soon be in a world where all our communications are spied on."

Iraq was the most deadly country for journalists last year, with 39 reporters and 26 other media workers killed. Among them were two Americans — Paul Douglas of CBS and his sound man James Brolan, while the rest were Iraqis.

At least 30 journalists were arrested by Iraqi security forces during 2006. The U.S. Army arrested eight media workers, including AP reporter Bilal Hussein, who was taken into custody in April and has yet to be charged.

During the international uproar over cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad, countries did little to help journalists who were threatened or arrested, the report said.

"It was as if, fearing a fight with Arab and Muslim regimes, Europe, for one, renounced all desire to make itself heard," the report said.

The Muhammad drawings were first published in September 2005 in the Danish newspaper Jyllands-Posten and were reprinted four months later by a range of Western publications, triggering massive protests from Morocco to Indonesia and some attacks on Danish embassies.

Inmate Who Fled With Official's Wife Is Sentenced For Escape (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

DOJ_NMG_0126200

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

MANGUM, Okla., Feb. 1 — A confessed murderer who slipped out of prison with the deputy warden's wife and hid for more than 10 years before being recaptured was sentenced Thursday to the maximum seven years for escaping.

Questioned by prosecutors about details of the relationship, the escapee, Randolph F. Dial, said he could not remember.

The warden's wife, Bobbi Parker, 44, disappeared from the Oklahoma State Reformatory in Granite with Mr. Dial in August 1994. They were discovered living together in a trailer on a chicken farm in East Texas in April 2005.

"I took her with me," Mr. Dial testified under cross-examination after offering a rambling account from the witness stand of what he portrayed as plots by prison authorities to kill him.

"Did she help you or assist you?" asked an assistant district attorney, Eric Yarborough.

"I don't know," Mr. Dial responded, after acknowledging that the couple had driven off together in Ms. Parker's van. To follow-up questions, he also replied, "I don't remember."

Mr. Dial, 62, a sculptor, writer and spinner of tales, was shaggily white-haired and bearded when he appeared in state court here in western Oklahoma, telling Judge Richard Darby that heart disease and tumors left him only months to live.

But Judge Darby added seven years for escaping to his previous life sentence for murder and fined him $1,000 plus court costs and restitution, penalties that his public defender said Mr. Dial had no way of paying.

"He'll never live to see daylight out in the world again," said the lawyer, Jim Hines.

Correction officials refused to allow Mr. Dial to shake hands with one of his nine children, Roxanne Dial, 24, who was in court. In a pre-sentencing statement, Mr. Dial said he escaped in fear of his life after being put in prison with an African-American gay man he thought might have AIDS and after a leader of a white supremacist group "informed me I would be decapitated for dealing with a n-word person."

"I'll tell you what I did. I left town in 24 hours," Mr. Dial testified.

He also said Ms. Parker had told him perhaps 50 times while they were together that "if I ever came back I would be killed" and that "her husband would see to it."

The husband, Randy Parker, to whom Ms. Parker returned after she and Mr. Dial were found, dismissed the account as a fabrication. Mr. Parker said he believed his wife's account that she had been abducted and held against her will in fear of Mr. Dial's underworld connections. Mr. Parker is now facility security operations director for the Oklahoma Department of Corrections.

The case began in 1981 when a martial arts instructor, Kelly D. Hogan, was shot to death in Broken Arrow, Okla. The murder remained unsolved until 1986, when Mr. Dial confessed that he was the killer. He said in court Thursday that he had mistakenly believed that Mr. Hogan might have sold drugs to one of his children.

Mr. Dial ended up in a series of prisons. At the reformatory in Granite, he said he helped the warden design a wellness center, where, he said, he met Ms. Parker and ended up working on art projects at the Parker home.

He said security was so lax that after he and Ms. Parker drove away in her van on Aug. 30, 1994, his absence was not discovered until Ms. Parker called her mother that evening.

On Nov. 9, 2001, Mr. Dial called a Tulsa author and former homicide detective, Charles W. Sasser, who had written a book about him, "At Large." Mr. Sasser in a later postscript to his book said Mr. Dial put Ms. Parker on the phone and she said, "I'm fine; I'm happy."

Mr. Sasser said he told the F.B.I. about the call, but the pair remained elusive until April 4, 2005, when agents and Texas Rangers, acting on a tip from the television program "America's Most Wanted," surprised Mr. Dial in his trailer. Investigators said it was clear that the two had been sharing a bedroom, and they found letters the two had exchanged. Ms. Parker, it turned out, had called 911 when Mr. Dial suffered a heart attack and rode with him in the ambulance to the hospital.

Mr. Yarborough, the prosecutor, citing the pre-sentence report, dismissed Mr. Dial as not to be believed.

"The defendant definitely spins a good yarn," he quoted from the report. "It's difficult to tell where reality ends and fantasy begins."

Abducted Boy, Mom Reunited (WT)

By Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

LINTHICUM, Md. -- A young mother arrived on a flight from Missouri yesterday, shedding tears and clutching her toddler, whom authorities said was taken from her home 16 months ago by her boyfriend, a Mexican national.

"My grandma told me we would never find him," said Crystal Debrodie, of Jefferson City, Mo., upon being reunited with son Abraham Felipe Monroy, 2, at Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport.

DOJ_NMG_0126201

Authorities say Felipe Monroy, of Hyattsville, took the child Sept. 17, 2005. Mr. Monroy was charged with parental kidnapping and was being held in a Prince George's County jail. State police on Monday arrested Mr. Monroy at his most recent residence, in Riverdale.

Miss Debrodie said Mr. Monroy is not the child's biological father and is an illegal alien. Police could not confirm whether Mr. Monroy was the father or his immigration status.

Miss Debrodie's big break came in October when Prince George's County resident Nicole Baldwin became suspicious of the new child and father, who continued to change his story on the whereabouts of the boy's mother.

"I couldn't be away from my child that long," said Mrs. Baldwin, 29, who then began searching the Internet for clues. "My heart told me I had to find [the mother of] this child. If I'm an overprotective mother, that's what I'll be."

She eventually found a picture of the boy on the Web site for the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children.

"I knew it was him," said Mrs. Baldwin, who was at the reunion and also has children.

Abraham clutched a tan, wool teddy bear but showed no emotion upon reuniting with his mother.

"I thought he had gone to Mexico," said Miss Debrodie, who started crying again when she said her grandmother died last month. "My grandma is proud of me right now."

Mrs. Baldwin said she saw Mr. Monroy and the boy in a red car. She wrote the car's tag number on her hand, then called police.

With help from state police Sgt. Ron Riggin, authorities took the boy, who his mom nicknamed Dakota, into protective custody.

"Mrs. Baldwin and Sgt. Riggin have brought these happy results," said the agency's Sgt. Russell Newell, who arranged the reunion and for the boy to fly back to Missouri with his mother.

"This is good," Sgt. Riggin said. "There are a lot of bittersweet endings in these cases."

The reunion was postponed nearly two hours because social services workers were delayed in delivering the boy to the airport.

Miss Debrodie presented to her son the blue-and-pink baby blanket he carried with him while in Jefferson City.

"I asked him if he wanted to go to the house and he said 'Yes,' " Miss Debrodie said. "He wanted to go home. We're going to have a welcome-home party tonight. ...I've never been in Maryland before. I want to go back home."

Miss Debrodie said she also has two daughters, including 3-month-old Gicana, whom the boy has never seen.

While Miss Debrodie was awaiting the arrival of her son, American Airlines official Nicole Summann heard her say the trip home would end late last night because they would have to wait in Chicago for a flight to St. Louis. So Mrs. Summann arranged for an earlier flight directly to St. Louis from Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport.

"It was the thing to do," she said.

Transit Police Try To Crack Down On Robbers (WP)

By Lena H. Sun

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

The number of robberies throughout the Metro transit system increased more than 6 percent last year, prompting Metro police to form a special unit to capture criminals, officials said yesterday.

The number of robberies in the Metro system rose to 354 last year -- nearly one a day -- from 332 robberies in 2005, according to Metro crime statistics. Riders reported thefts of 32 iPods and 82 cellphones, accounting for a third of all robberies.

Metro Transit Police set up the robbery unit in early December, a time of year when criminals take advantage of longer periods of darkness. Robberies also tend to go up during the holiday season because people carry more cash and packages, officials said.

In less than two months, the special unit has arrested 21 robbery suspects, compared with six robbery arrests in the same period the previous year, according to Transit Police spokeswoman Linda Foxwell.

Transit Police Chief Polly Hanson said in a statement that she was "extremely proud" of the robbery unit and would keep it going in 2007. Also last year, a Metro police officer joined an FBI-sponsored regional robbery task force and will continue to share intelligence and tips with other area law enforcement agencies, Metro officials said.

Police officials declined to say how many officers are in Metro's robbery unit and where they work, because they do not want to reveal their methods. Although their focus is on robberies, they are also performing their other Metro police functions, officials said.

"Sometimes they're in casual clothes; sometimes they're at observation points," Foxwell said. "They use a number of deployment methods."

DOJ_NMG_0126202

Robberies also rose in the region last year. In Montgomery County, they were up significantly in the first half of 2006, with 584 robberies through June 30, a 37 percent increase over the same period in 2005. Preliminary 2006 figures in Fairfax County showed an increase in robberies of at least 6 percent, while the District's preliminary figures showed that robberies were down about 5 percent from 2005.

Metro's crime report revealed that the total number of serious crimes rose to 1,270 in 2006, up about 11 percent from 1,145 in 2005. Serious crimes include aggravated assault and robberies as well as motor vehicle theft and larceny.

The figures also showed more serious crimes taking place in parking lots, with 812 crimes reported in 2006, an increase of 14 percent from the 714 reported in 2005. Foxwell said most of the crimes in parking lots are vehicle thefts and thefts from vehicles.

Late For Court: Connecticut Case Draws Scrutiny (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

NORWALK, Conn., Feb. 1 — Some call the "failure to appear" charge a prosecutor's best friend because it is relatively easy to prove and can swiftly bring a defendant to the bargaining table. Others see the long-accepted but little-discussed practice of punishing late or absentee defendants as a crutch for overworked judges to maintain decorum and keep criminal cases from clogging their courtrooms.

Now such criminal charges are being challenged in Connecticut, where nearly 1 in 10 of the cases not involving motor vehicles that ended in convictions over the past five years included a conviction for failure to appear. Those found guilty of what could be a procedural misstep can face up to five years in prison.

Bringing the issue into the open is the case of Ayanna Khadijah, 34, who was convicted of the felony version of failure to appear after she failed to wake up from a nap and arrived 45 minutes late to court one day in August 2003. Her case is extraordinary because she fought back.

It was the only court date Ms. Khadijah missed among 45 sessions over three years defending herself against a set of drug charges that were eventually dismissed, in 2005. Ms. Khadijah, a single mother with a criminal history, received a suspended three-year sentence on the failure-to-appear charge.

She had spent the day before she was late for court at her job as a community organizer and then delivered newspapers from 1 to 8 a.m. Prosecutors argued that she should have known better than to work all night before a court appearance.

Connecticut's appellate court overturned her conviction last fall after concluding that the inadvertent doze was not a willful shirking of responsibility. But the state is appealing to the State Supreme Court for fear the widely used tool could become harder to wield.

"We thought it set a bad example," said John A. East III, a senior assistant state's attorney, who argued in court papers that rather than rely on her boyfriend to rouse her, Ms. Khadijah should have set an alarm or perhaps brewed herself a strong cup of coffee.

But Gerald B. Lefcourt, a past president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, said the case "is really right out of Catch-22." "There's no way to win when you have a system that is so inflexible and so lacking in understanding," he said.

At least 30 states treat failure to appear as a crime that stands alone, according to information in American Law Reports, with most tying the severity of the penalty to the seriousness of the underlying charge.

Statistics on how often such cases are filed or lead to convictions are hard to come by, because the Federal Bureau of Investigation lumps the information it collects into a catch-all bin it calls "other offenses."

New York State's Division of Criminal Justice Services said its records showed 444 convictions on bail-jumping last year and 465 the year before — a fraction of Connecticut's 6,539 in 2006, and fewer even than the 596 in Norwalk (these numbers include those related to motor-vehicle charges).

Asked why New York's figures were so much lower than those across the state line, a spokesman for the agency, Mark Bonacquist, said he was "not making any comment as to whether our statutes are similar to Connecticut."

Here in Norwalk, some lawyers contend that prosecutors and judges are overusing the charge to solve all manner of other problems. Norwalk ranks sixth among Connecticut's 35 courts — including many that are far larger and busier — for the total number of failure-to-appear cases disposed of last year, and had by far the highest rate of conviction on such cases, just shy of 55 percent, of the courts with the highest volumes.

"Failure to appear should be a last resort," complained Jon L. Schoenhorn, a Hartford lawyer who is the president of the Connecticut's Criminal Defense Lawyers Association. "You can only put so much pressure on parties to move cases along before the pressure is seen as an abuse of discretion."

DOJ_NMG_0126203

Alfred Blumstein, a criminologist at Carnegie Mellon University, called the Connecticut situation "mind-boggling."

"Showing up late for court is certainly inappropriate but to be convicted of it as a felony sounds so extreme," he said. If a defendant is not there when called, he wondered of the courts, "Can't they juggle their schedules a little bit?'"

Ms. Khadijah, who twice went to prison in the 1990s on drug and other charges, said she did not set out to take on the criminal justice system. Rather, she said, her focus over the last decade has been on supporting herself and her daughter, now 5, of whom she once lost custody.

"Because I'm a felon, it's hard to get a job," said Ms. Khadijah, a high school graduate who worked in a factory packing Nivea skin cream, delivered pizzas, and worked at a law firm. She has also been evicted for failure to pay rent, and sought bankruptcy protection in 2005 to cancel the $30,000 she owed her criminal lawyer, Sam Kretzmer.

The missed court date stemmed from a February 2002 police raid of the Round Tree Inn on Westport Road, where Ms. Khadijah was living. She was charged with possession of narcotics and risk of injury to a child, though she accused the police of entering her room without a warrant and claimed that the drugs they found were not hers. Court records show Ms. Khadijah kept 20 court dates over the next 18 months without a hitch.

She knows the drill cold. Dress respectfully, so court officials see that you understand the severity of the charges. Arrive early, leaving plenty of time to clear the metal detectors. Sit politely, even if you must wait all day to be called.

"We used to be there at 9 a.m. and leave at 5 p.m. every day, just like I worked there," Ms. Khadijah said of herself and her boyfriend, Darri Woodhouse, a co-defendant in the drug case.

According to her testimony in the failure to appear case, Ms. Khadijah arrived home from her Norwalk Hour paper route at 8 a.m. on Aug. 13, 2003, the second day of jury selection for the drug trial. She sat on the couch and told Mr. Woodhouse to wake her if she dozed. He didn't.

Instead she was roused by a telephone call from her lawyer about 11 a.m., 15 minutes after she had been instructed to arrive. Ms. Khadijah raced to the courthouse full of apologies, getting there at about 11:30 — minutes after Judge Susan Reynolds had dismissed jurors and ordered her charged with failure to appear in the first degree.

Ms. Kretzmer had assured the judge that her client was on her way and asked for five minutes' grace. "This is not a cocktail party," the judge replied. "This is the most important thing in her life, and she's 45 minutes late."

The judge offered to vacate the arrest if Ms. Khadijah entered a guilty plea instead of going to trial, an offer her lawyer rejected. The charges were dismissed five months later by a different judge, who agreed that the police had erred by entering without a warrant.

So prosecutors pressed on to trial in January 2004 on the lone remaining offense — failure to appear.

"It's like hitting an ant with a hammer," said Mary Anne Royle, a lawyer who has been helping Ms. Khadijah with her appeals. Mr. Schoenhorn, the leader of the state's criminal defense bar, called the decision to continue the prosecution after the drug charges disappeared "a sour-grapes type of vindictive act."

But Mr. East, the prosecutor, said "we have to be aggressive" in pursuing such cases.

"Failures to appear are a big problem in our courts," he said. "They clog up the docket and cost the state a lot of money."

Ms. Khadijah was convicted of failure to appear once before, 16 years ago, a misdemeanor that led to the first of her two stints at the York Correctional Institute in Niantic and that she said was a proper response by the system.

That conviction was used to cast doubt on her testimony in her recent failure-to-appear case.

As that case undergoes further review, both sides acknowledge that precedents on the subject are skimpy, since the issue rarely gets litigated. Both sides cite a 19-year-old Washington, D.C., case about a habitually late lawyer who overslept one day, called the court to say he would not be coming and went back to bed, according to the appellate panel's summary.

Connecticut prosecutors note that the resulting contempt charge stood on appeal, while Ms. Khadijah's lawyers use the case to highlight the contrast between the lawyer's response and her efforts to race to court once awakened.

Other lawyers reached back 23 years to find a Connecticut case, Gionfrido v. Wharf Realty, in which a plaintiff's lawyer left Middletown for Hartford on a lunch break to retrieve a file and was 26 minutes late returning to court because he "lost track of time" and hit traffic.

The Middletown judge dismissed the lawsuit moments after the lunch break ended when the plaintiff's lawyer did not show up. The Connecticut Supreme Court called the dismissal "harsh" but ruled that the lower court had not abused its discretion in light of the need to process cases "in a timely and efficient manner."

The treatment of tardy defendants is hardly uniform. On a recent morning here, some no-shows got a pass, in the form of a letter reminding them of their obligation to appear in court. Others had their bond increased. At least one was ordered rearrested.

Neatly dressed in a cowl-neck sweater, flowing skirt and brown wig to hide hair loss she said stems from stress, Ms. Khadijah arrived promptly for a 10 a.m. appearance on her most recent arrest, in December, in which she was accused of reckless driving and criminal mischief in a vacant lot. “Because I’ve been in trouble before, I’m an easy catch,” she said afterwards of her seeming inability to stay out of court.

DOJ_NMG_0126204

After 73 other names and nearly three hours, Ms. Khadijah’s name was called. She stood.

The exchange took less than one minute.

“Are you Ayanna Khadijah?” Judge Reynolds asked, as if they were meeting for the first time.

“Yes,” said the defendant.

The judge instructed the prosecution to talk to other people involved in the December case. Ms. Khadijah was told to return in four weeks for another appearance.

Kaine Dubious On Death Penalty Expansion (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

RICHMOND, Feb. 1 -- Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, who ran for office pledging to enforce the death penalty despite his personal opposition, said he has strong reservations about efforts by the General Assembly to expand the crimes that are eligible for capital punishment.

Kaine (D), speaking to Washington Post reporters and editors, questioned the need for new laws that would allow prosecutors to seek the death penalty for those who are accomplices to murder, such as Washington area sniper John Allen Muhammad, and for people who kill judges.

"I do not look at the expansion of the death penalty with a favorable eye," Kaine said of legislation moving through both houses. Noting that Virginia is second to Texas in the number of executions, Kaine said, "I would not say that the problem in Virginia is that the death penalty is not applied enough."

Kaine made the comments during a wide-ranging two-hour interview Wednesday evening in which he also discussed two contentious Northern Virginia issues: his decision to build an aboveground Metrorail line through Tysons Corner, and Dominion Virginia Power's plan to erect a high-voltage transmission line across scenic land in the outer suburbs.

The governor said he does not intend to revisit the idea of constructing a Metro tunnel under Tysons, despite efforts by community and business groups that fear the traffic and development effects of an elevated track. Although the tunnel is the best option, Kaine said, he thinks that pursuing that option would risk the loss of nearly $1 billion from the Federal Transit Administration, which would kill the project.

"Unless [the tunnel advocates] were to get the FTA to say, 'We'll give you the $900 million either way,' we're just going to be delay, delay, delay," Kaine said. "And then potentially not get the money. . . . Time is not our friend on this."

Scott Monett, head of a McLean-based group pushing for a tunnel, disputed this, saying that the FTA has not said outright that reconsidering a tunnel would cause the loss of federal funding. The timing issue is less pressing, he said, because his group has paid $3.5 million to produce engineering plans for a tunnel.

In the debate over plans for a 240-mile power line through rural Frederick, Warren, Fauquier, Prince William and Loudoun counties, Kaine said Dominion should "absolutely" find a place to build the $1.4 billion line other than the proposed route, which has provoked anger from many residents and environmental groups.

Kaine was reluctant to suggest an alternative. Asked where the route should go, the governor paused, chuckled and said: "Well, yeah. Darn."

But then Kaine said he is encouraged by a new proposal in which Dominion could build the line along existing power lines, using a circuitous route that avoids the most sensitive parts of the countryside.

"I have spoken with the Dominion folks, and I have spoken with the folks up in Northern Virginia," Kaine said. "The notion of following some existing right-of-ways . . . might actually be a real possible one."

But the Piedmont Environmental Council, the main group opposing the line, argues that Dominion has failed to prove that Virginia needs the additional electricity and does not support any of the alternatives proposed by the company. "Our position is and has been that pushing it into someone else's back yard isn't a solution," said Robert W. Lazaro Jr., the group's spokesman.

The death penalty has been a sensitive subject for Kaine since he took office about a year ago.

During the campaign against former attorney general Jerry W. Kilgore (R), Kaine pledged to carry out executions even though he said his Catholic faith leads him to oppose it. Kaine has let three executions stand and has granted one stay of execution.

"Fidelity to the rule of law is a very important moral virtue," Kaine said in the interview. "Wrestling with how you balance these things out, there's no easy answer to that."

Kaine noted that Muhammad, the convicted sniper, still received the death penalty under a terrorism statute even though prosecutors didn't prove that he pulled the trigger.

DOJ_NMG_0126205

"I go back to my question: 'Where's the problem' " with the application of capital punishment? Kaine asked. "It's like how many ways can you ban gay marriage? Virginia would like to do it nine times rather than eight times. The death penalty statute is kind of the same way."

Del. C. Todd Gilbert (R-Shenandoah), sponsor of the bill to repeal the law that makes only the person who carries out a killing eligible for execution, said a Kaine veto would be "a direct affront to victims" of crimes that involve more than one perpetrator. "When you have two people committing an act that brutal and heinous, they should be treated the same by law," Gilbert said.

Despite his skepticism about the need for an expansion of the death penalty, Kaine said it is possible that he could be persuaded to sign one of the bills this session.

He said, for example, that he might be able to accept the argument that judges are members of the law enforcement community and that killers of judges should be treated the same as killers of police officers.

"Are there really instances where there have been murder of judicial professionals but they haven't been able to be charged with capital crimes because they . . . are not law enforcement professionals?" Kaine asked. "If there is some weird gap that wasn't intended, I could see someone saying, 'See, this is a problem.' "

But, he added, "You know, I've got to be convinced there is a problem, and I've got to be convinced that the bill fixes a problem."

Staff writers Tim Craig, Alec MacGillis and Sandhya Somashekhar contributed to this report.

CIVIL LAW:

FEC To Police '527' Groups' Campaign Activities (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

The Federal Election Commission said yesterday that it will police "527" groups, political organizations that largely operated outside the new campaign finance limits during the 2004 presidential election, by looking at how the groups word their appeals for contributions, how they describe themselves, and how they spend their money.

If the groups make clear that they are advocating for or against a specific candidate, the FEC would regulate them.

"We're providing clear guidance," said FEC Chairman Robert D. Lenhard. "This makes it clear that the existing rules will be enforced."

The FEC filed the 44-page explanation of its approach in U.S. District Court yesterday in response to a lawsuit challenging the agency's effectiveness in regulating the independent groups.

Some of the groups, which are called 527s because of their designation in the tax code, raised and spent large sums of money to pay for nuanced political ads that appeared to be intended to skirt the new federal rules.

The objective of the lawsuit, filed in 2004, "was to get the FEC to issue regulations to make clear to 527 groups when they would be required to register and report as political committees" and, as a result, be limited to raising much smaller sums from individual donors, said Fred Wertheimer, an advocate of campaign finance reform who is working on the case.

The FEC said that it will continue to resist issuing specific regulations. It noted that recent fines imposed on 527 groups such as MoveOn.org and Swift Boat Veterans for Truth made clear that the agency will not tolerate 527 organizations engaging in campaign activity aimed at promoting or tearing down a presidential candidate.

Wertheimer and representatives of the Campaign Legal Center, who have been challenging the FEC on its approach, declined to react to the court filing yesterday, but said that they will be back in federal court next week to schedule a formal response.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Lawsuit Says Apartments' No-dog Policy Biased Against The Blind (AP)

AP, February 2, 2007

PHILADELPHIA - The Justice Department filed a lawsuit Thursday against the rental manager and owners of a Lancaster apartment complex, alleging their rental policies discriminate against the visually impaired.

The complaint charges that a policy forbidding residents at Barrcrest Manor Apartments to keep dogs violates the federal Fair Housing Act because the landlords were refusing housing to people who use the animals as guides.

DOJ_NMG_0126206

Department of Justice officials posing as potential renters conducted the investigation into the complex's policies.

The investigation found the apartments use discriminatory housing practices by "refusing to make reasonable accommodations in their no-dog policy when such accommodations may be necessary to afford a person with a handicap equal opportunity to use and enjoy a dwelling," the complaint said.

The suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, seeks to end the policy and asks for compensation for those it affected.

"The services of guide dogs are essential to individuals with visual impairments," Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney General for the Civil Rights Division, said in a statement. "Our fair housing testing program will continue to proactively root out violations of the Fair Housing Act and ensure nondiscriminatory treatment."

Justice Department Settles Cibola County Voting Rights Claim (AP)

AP, February 2, 2007

GRANTS, N.M. (AP) - The U.S. Department of Justice has settled voting rights claims against Cibola County.

The department announced Wednesday it had settled allegations that the county violated the Help America Vote Act and the National Voter Registration Act. Those claims had been added to a lawsuit alleging violations of the Voting Rights Act, which originally was filed in 1995, attorney Joe Diaz of Albuquerque, who represented the county, said Thursday.

Justice Department oversight of elections in the county will be extended through 2008 under a consent decree with the county.

The federal agency filed the consent decree Wednesday resolving the lawsuit. It still must be approved by a federal judge.

"I felt that the county had been complying but the Justice Department felt there were a few problems" that warranted the extension, Diaz said.

American Indians complained that their rights continued to be violated, and county officials agreed to the extension, Diaz said.

"Voting is the most sacred thing that all of us have," he said. "The commissioners and the clerk wanted to make sure things are done right. She (Clerk Eileen Martinez) didn't mind the Justice Department looking over her shoulder for another two years."

Federal law requires counties to hire interpreters and translate ballots and other election material into Indian languages. In the case of Cibola County, officials must provide voter information and assistance in Navajo and Keresan to voters who need it.

The Justice Department alleged the county failed to ensure that valid voter registration applications were processed and added to voter registration lists in a timely manner; that voters' names were not removed from the rolls without cause; and that provisional ballots were offered at elections to voters whose names were not on the voter rolls. Provisional ballots are counted after the election once officials determine the person is a qualified voter.

Miss. Voting Rights Trial On Break, Resumes Feb. 15 (AP)

AP, February 2, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - A federal judge has recessed for two weeks the trial of a black Democratic Party official in Noxubee County accused of trying to limit whites' participation in local elections.

Ike Brown, the chairman of the county's Democratic Executive Committee, is accused of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Southern states strictly enforced segregation. It is the first use of the act to allege discrimination against whites.

Noxubee County is a rural area along the Alabama line with a majority black population.

On Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee recessed the trial until Feb. 15, at which time he expects to hear from an elections expert enlisted by the Noxubee County Democrats to counter allegations by a political scientist hired by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Lee, who is hearing the case without a jury, has not indicated when he might rule.

The trial began Jan. 16 in federal court in Jackson.

Federal prosecutors want Lee to rule whites' voting rights were violated by Brown and other black Democratic Party officials in the county and to order unlawful practices stopped.

The Democrats' expert - Richard Engstrom - has said Noxubee County whites lose elections simply because they're in the minority.

"White voters clearly prefer white candidates over African-American candidates, and they frequently are on the losing end of the elections because their candidate preferences are not shared by the African-American voters," Engstrom wrote in a report he did for the Noxubee County Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0126207

However, Justice Department expert Theodore Arrington said Brown and his "political machine" have exploited the election process to ensure blacks control the county.

"Ike Brown and his associates do not uphold the law and customs that prevent bias and fraud in the administration of ... elections in Noxubee County," Arrington testified last month. "And he cannot be trusted to do so in the future. Indeed, he is behind much of that fraud."

Engstrom is a consultant at the University of North Carolina School of Law's Center for Civil Rights in Chapel Hill, N.C.

Arrington is chairman of the political science department at the University of North Carolina in Charlotte, N.C.

In letting Engstrom testify for the Democrats, Lee overruled a federal magistrate who had earlier barred the expert's testimony because he came too late into the case.

Lee said Engstrom should be heard "in the interest of fairness" for letting both sides fully present their cases.

State Appeals Justice Ruling On Chastang (MR)

By Dan Murtaugh, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), February 2, 2007

The state has filed an appeal of the U.S. Department of Justice's refusal to approve the appointment of a Mobile County commissioner, calling the decision "an affront to the state's sovereignty and federalism itself."

In a 32-page letter addressed to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez, Alabama Attorney General Troy King laid out his argument that state law should trump federal regulations when it comes to Gov. Bob Riley's 2005 appointment of Mobile County Commissioner Juan Chastang.

The Justice Department's decision "invites chaos into state governmental functioning," the letter stated.

Last month, the Justice Department ruled that the appointment violated the federal Voting Rights Act of 1965, saying it "appears to diminish the opportunity of minority voters to elect a representative of their choice."

The reasoning was that Chastang's district is majority black, while the governor is elected by a majority-white statewide populace.

Cecil Gardner, the attorney who filed the federal lawsuit challenging the appointment, said the whole point of the Voting Rights Act is to override certain state decisions when they impact minority voters.

"Where state government makes a change that is regressive as far as the voting rights of minorities are concerned, that's the purpose of the Voting Rights Act itself," he said.

A three-judge federal panel in Montgomery is awaiting the result of the state's appeal before deciding whether to strip Chastang of his office and hold a special election to fill it, as the lawsuit filed by three area Democrats is seeking.

State Reps. Yvonne Kennedy, James Buskey and Bill Clark filed the suit in 2005 in response to the Republican governor appointing the conservative Chastang to fill the commission seat vacated when Sam Jones was elected mayor of Mobile.

Chastang's district has historically elected Democrats to the commission.

If nothing else, the appeal makes it likely that Chastang will be in office at least for the immediate future. Gonzalez has 60 days to rule on the request for reconsideration, and if he doesn't overturn the ruling, the state could appeal to the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, a "time-consuming" process, King wrote.

Chastang said he is pleased with the state's efforts to keep him in office. He blamed local politics for creating the problem in the first place.

"Politics is playing a big part in this situation," Chastang said. "It's a shame we can't all get along and try to serve the people and do what's right for the people."

In his letter, King goes through 155 years of Mobile County government history in an effort to show that Riley's appointment should be ruled valid.

In 1852, the state code noted that any vacancy in the Court of County Commissioners in Mobile County would be filled by a gubernatorial appointment.

That arrangement lasted for more than 130 years, until the state passed a 1985 law allowing vacancies on the Mobile County Commission to be filled by special election. The state had that law pre-cleared by the Justice Department, as is necessitated by the 1965 federal Voting Rights Act.

In 1987, the new law came into effect, and Jones won a special election to fill a vacancy for the District 1 seat on the commission.

After that election, the new law was targeted in a lawsuit and in 1988 was ruled unconstitutional by the State Supreme Court, which said it conflicted with a general law giving the governor appointment power for such vacancies.

Then-Gov. Guy Hunt appointed Jones to the seat he had held for more than a year, and Jones kept it for the next five elections.

DOJ_NMG_0126208

In 2004, the state passed a new law allowing counties to have special elections to fill vacancies, as long as a local law is passed to establish those elections.

When Jones left office in 2005, local Democrats argued that the 2004 law meant a special election should be held to fill the seat, as dictated by the 1985 local law.

Riley, however said the 2004 state law did not revive the previous local law, and he still had appointment power in Mobile County. The Alabama Supreme Court sided with him, and he appointed Chastang.

That's when Kennedy, Buskey and Clark filed the federal lawsuit, which argued that the appointment violated the Voting Rights Act because the state never pre-cleared a change back to gubernatorial appointments after the 1985 law was ruled unconstitutional.

The federal court agreed, and forced the state to seek Justice Department pre-clearance to return to gubernatorial appointment. The Justice Department denied that request last month.

King argued that because the 1985 special election law was only used once, and then was declared unconstitutional, the pre-clearance it received should be invalidated, which would make Riley's appointment compliant with federal law.

King also attacks the Justice Department ruling on other grounds. He criticizes the logic that the appointment disenfranchised the majority-black district because Riley was elected by a majority-white population, saying that the Justice Department should look at the demographics of the entire county, which is majority-white.

Also, he writes, the Justice Department ruling "fails to acknowledge that Samuel L. Jones and Juan Chastang are African American."

King also poked fun at a section of the Justice Department ruling that said the state did not prove the voters in District 1 would have elected Chastang in a special election.

"It is not clear how the state could prove such a thing," King wrote. "(U)nknown is the identity, if any, of Mr. Chastang's fictional opponent. In our experience, the results in elections frequently turn on the identity of the candidates."

Texas Deputy To Pay Price For Defending Self (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

A Texas deputy sheriff who fired shots at a fleeing vehicle after the driver tried to run him down faces 10 years in prison for injuring one of the passengers, a Mexican national being smuggled illegally into the United States.

The U.S. attorney, who won lengthy prison terms last year for two U.S. Border Patrol agents in the shooting of a drug-smuggling suspect, also prosecuted Edwards County Deputy Sheriff Guillermo F. Hernandez, who is to be sentenced next month.

The deputy's boss, Sheriff Donald G. Letsinger, said his officer -- who had been on the job for a year -- "followed the letter of the law" in defending himself in the April 2005 incident and questioned why the government brought charges.

"This is a fine young man, and I just don't believe he committed the wrong of which he was accused," Sheriff Letsinger said. "I have never had anything hurt me so badly as this prosecution. We've got to make this right."

Rep. Ted Poe, Texas Republican, called the prosecution and conviction of Hernandez, known to his friends as "Gilmer," "another example of how the federal government is more concerned about people [who are] illegally invading America than it is about the men who protect America."

"Once again, our government is on the wrong side of the border war," Mr. Poe said.

The deputy's Dec. 1 conviction has enraged his hometown of Rocksprings, Texas, population 1,250, where "Free Gilmer" signs have been posted. The Baptist church is paying the deputy's mortgage and others have come up with costs for the family's truck, propane and water bills.

Hernandez, 25, and his wife, Ashley, have a 4-month-old daughter.

"The town is outraged that this has happened to our deputy," said the Rev. Albert Green, pastor at the First Baptist Church. "Those people were in this country illegally, and they tried to run him down. They were the criminals, but the prosecutors made our deputy out to be the criminal.

"I do not know a single person who doesn't feel Gilmer was prosecuted for doing his job," said Mr. Green, who is the deputy's pastor. "I do not know a finer, more well-behaved gentleman. He would not purposely or willfully hurt anyone."

U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton, appointed in October 2001 by President Bush, said Hernandez fired shots at the vehicle as it sped away "knowing it was occupied with the nine individuals," at least seven of whom were illegal aliens -- some of whom later were called to testify for the government.

Hernandez was convicted after a jury trial in U.S. District Court in Del Rio, Texas, 75 miles southwest of Rocksprings -- found guilty of violating "under the color of law" the civil rights of Maricela Rodriguez-Garcia, a Mexican national.

The woman was struck in the lip by bullet or other metal fragments after an 11:50 p.m. traffic stop in Rocksprings in April 2005. Reports said Hernandez fired shots at the blue Chevrolet Suburban's rear tires as it sped off after being stopped for running a red light.

Acquitted on a second count regarding injury to another passenger, he will be sentenced March 12 at the Del Rio court.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Bill Baumann, who prosecuted the case, told reporters that the law does not give law-enforcement officers the right to use "deadly force to stop a car unless it poses an imminent threat to the officer or another person. If the car is going away from you, it's not even a close call."

Mr. Sutton's office convicted Border Patrol agents Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, on charges of causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in a crime of violence and a civil rights violation. They were sentenced to 11 and 12 years, respectively.

Shana Jones, spokeswoman for Mr. Sutton, did not return calls for comment yesterday.

Sheriff Letsinger said an investigation found that Hernandez approached the vehicle and found only the driver was sitting upright and suspected the others were illegal aliens. He said the driver, after being asked to step out of the vehicle, pulled forward and turned into Hernandez -- fleeing from what the sheriff described as the deputy's "legal stop."

Thinking the driver had tried to run him over, he said Hernandez fired at the vehicle's rear tires. He said at least one of the people inside the vehicle confirmed that the driver had turned it into the deputy.

Sheriff Letsinger, with three deputies to handle all law-enforcement matters in a 2,000-square-mile county, called the Texas Rangers after the incident to investigate what happened. He said he also called the Mexican Consulate because Mexican nationals were involved, and the consulate later notified the FBI.

The Rangers' incident report, the sheriff said, noted that after firing shots, Hernandez returned to his patrol car, notified dispatch and pursued the vehicle until it crashed into a fence -- at which time the occupants, except for Mrs. Rodriguez-Garcia, fled.

Mrs. Rodriguez-Garcia, Ivonne Hernandez Morales and Candido Garcia Perez, all occupants in the vehicle, told investigators that they paid $2,000 to be taken across the Rio Grande from Acuna, Mexico. They said they later met the vehicle's driver and a guide, who were to take them to Austin and Dallas.

Sheriff Letsinger also said the Rangers and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) agents, using dogs and metal detectors, found four shell casings at the traffic stop site but none at the crash site -- discounting claims by two of the vehicle's occupants that Hernandez fired shots at them as they fled the vehicle.

The Texas Rangers did not respond to calls yesterday.

Noting that prosecutors offered the deputy probation in exchange for a guilty plea, the sheriff said, "This young man didn't do anything wrong and wasn't about to say he had. I think that speaks to his character."

In the Border Patrol case, Ramos and Compean testified that they shot Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila in the buttocks only after he assaulted Compean and pointed a weapon at both of them. Prosecutors and later a federal jury in El Paso disagreed. Aldrete-Davila abandoned 743 pounds of marijuana before fleeing back into Mexico.

Hairdresser To The Elite Faces New Lawsuit (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Andre Chreky Accused by a Second Former Employee of Sexual Harassment

Andre Chreky, a prominent Washington hairdresser who used to cut first lady Laura Bush's locks, is the target of his second sexual harassment lawsuit in a little more than four months.

An ex-employee said Chreky routinely demanded sexual favors, grabbed and touched her and made humiliating comments about her appearance and her husband's sexual prowess. When she rebuffed him, Chreky retaliated by taking away clients, refusing to accommodate her during her pregnancy and ultimately firing her, the plaintiff, Ronnie Barrett, said in the complaint filed in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

Lawyers for Chreky and his salon denied Barrett's allegations. Chreky is fighting similar charges by another former employee, Jennifer Thong, who sued in September.

Barrett claims Chreky repeatedly told her that if she wanted to go to the White House or have contact with President Bush or his family, she would have to come to the salon early in the morning, before other employees arrived. Barrett "understood this to be . . . a thinly veiled threat that if she wanted to advance in her career she needed to accede to his sexual demands," according to the lawsuit.

Barrett says that the advances and inappropriate comments began in 2003, shortly after she returned to the salon, where she had worked in the 1990s. She was fired in December 2005.

Barrett, who is seeking $4 million in damages from Chreky and his salon, said in a telephone interview with the Associated Press that she didn't leave earlier because of an agreement forbidding her to work at another salon within a radius of five miles for six months after leaving.

A lawyer for Chreky, David J. Sullivan, said in an e-mail that Barrett's account of events "simply never happened."

"Hundreds of clients and scores of employees -- as well as Mr. Chreky's wife, who manages the salon's business -- are in and out of every square foot of the salon all day long," he said.

Florida Shifting To Voting System With Paper Trail (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough And Christopher Drew

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

DELRAY BEACH, Fla., Feb. 1 — Gov. Charlie Crist announced plans on Thursday to abandon the touch-screen voting machines that many of Florida's counties installed after the disputed 2000 presidential election. The state will instead adopt a system of casting paper ballots counted by scanning machines in time for the 2008 presidential election.

Voting experts said Florida's move, coupled with new federal voting legislation expected to pass this year, could be the death knell for the paperless electronic touch-screen machines. If as expected the Florida Legislature approves the $32.5 million cost of the change, it would be the nation's biggest repudiation yet of touch-screen voting, which was widely embraced after the 2000 recount as a state-of-the-art means of restoring confidence that every vote would count.

Several counties around the country, including Cuyahoga in Ohio and Sarasota in Florida, are moving toward exchanging touch-screen machines for ones that provide a paper trail. But Florida could become the first state that invested heavily in the recent rush to touch screens to reject them so sweepingly.

"Florida is like a synonym for election problems; it's the Bermuda Triangle of elections," said Warren Stewart, policy director of VoteTrust USA, a nonprofit group that says optical scanners are more reliable than touch screens. "For Florida to be clearly contemplating moving away from touch screens to the greatest extent possible is truly significant."

Other states that rushed to buy the touch-screen machines are also abandoning them. Earlier this week, the Virginia Senate passed a bill that would phase out the machines as they wore out, and replace them with optical scanners. The Maryland legislature also seems determined to order a switch from the paperless touch screens, though it is not clear yet if it will require the use of optical scanners or just allow paper printers to be added to the touch screens.

On Monday, Representative Rush D. Holt, Democrat of New Jersey, plans to introduce a bill in Congress that would require all voting machines nationwide to produce paper records through which voters can verify that their ballots were recorded correctly. A majority of House members have endorsed the proposal, and the changes have strong support among Senate Democrats. Mr. Holt's bill would also substantially toughen the requirements for the touch-screen machines that have printers, and experts say this could give even more impetus to the shift toward the optical scanning systems.

Mr. Crist, a Republican, at times drew whoops and applause when he announced his plan at the South County Civic Center in Palm Beach County, the epicenter of the 2000 election standoff and home of the infamous "butterfly ballot" that confused many voters. The touch screens had replaced the punch-card systems that caused widespread problems that year.

"You should, when you go vote, be able to have a record of it," Mr. Crist told a few hundred mostly older citizens at the civic center, in Delray Beach, where many residents said they accidentally voted for Patrick J. Buchanan in 2000 instead of Al Gore because of the confusing ballot design. "That's all we're proposing today. It's not very complicated; it is in fact common sense. Most importantly, it is the right thing to do."

Mr. Crist's renunciation of touch-screen voting one month after he replaced Jeb Bush as governor of the nation's fourth-most-populous state, suggested that the fight for paper voting records, long a pet project of Democrats, might become more bipartisan. Mr. Crist made the announcement with Representative Robert Wexler, a Democrat from Delray Beach who has ardently led the movement for a paper trail and has attacked Republicans along the way.

"I support this plan 100 percent," Mr. Wexler said before introducing Mr. Crist. "This governor means what he says, and he's coming to Tallahassee and he's spreading the message throughout Florida that this isn't about Republican or Democrat, it's not about this ideology or that; it's about unifying people and doing what's right for the people of Florida."

The 15 Florida counties that have adopted touch-screen voting in recent years, including Miami-Dade, Broward, Palm Beach and Hillsborough, would move to optical-scan voting under the proposal before the presidential election of 2008. The plan would give them the option, however, of using touch-screen machines during the state's two-week early voting period that precedes Election Day, if the machines are modified to provide a paper trail. Those counties represent 54 percent of the state's registered voters. Broward County alone has bought about 6,000 touch-screen machines in recent years, and Palm Beach County has about 4,500.

DOJ_NMG_0126211

Mr. Crist said county election supervisors would explore how to make optical-scan voting easier for blind people and for those who speak foreign languages. In some cases, they have been able to vote without assistance on the touch-screen machines.

Asked how he felt about discarding tens of millions of dollars worth of touch-screen machines just years after they were acquired, Mr. Crist said, "The price of freedom is not cheap. The importance of a democratic system of voting that we can trust, that we can have confidence in, is incredibly important."

Election experts estimate that paperless electronic machines were used by about 30 percent of voters nationwide in 2006. But their reliability has increasingly come under scrutiny, as has the difficulty of doing recounts without a paper trail. Federal technology experts concluded late last year that paperless touch-screen machines could not be secured from tampering.

Some states had bought early versions of the paperless machines before the 2000 recount, and one of them, New Mexico, switched last year to optical scanners. But most of the machines in other states were purchased with federal money provided under a 2002 law that required states to upgrade from old punch-card and lever systems.

New York is planning to buy either screens with printers or optical scanners, New Jersey is adding paper trails to its touch screens and Connecticut is buying the optical scanners. A recent survey by Election Data Services, a Washington consulting firm, estimated that 36 percent of the nation's counties have bought electronic machines, including some with printers attached, while 56 percent have the optical scan systems.

Mr. Holt said his bill would require the return to paper ballots by next year's presidential primaries, and it would authorize $300 million in federal money to upgrade the machines. Some state and county election officials say it could be difficult to make such sweeping changes by then.

But, Mr. Holt said, "it depends on how badly we want to do it. The public is getting very impatient here."

In Sarasota County last November, more than 18,000 voters who used touch-screen machines did not have their votes recorded in the close Congressional race between Vern Buchanan, the Republican, and Christine Jennings, the Democrat. Mr. Buchanan took office last month after a recount gave him a 369-vote victory, but Ms. Jennings has sued.

Former Governor Bush, President Bush's younger brother, generally defended touch-screen voting during his tenure and said skeptics had fallen prey to "conspiracy theories." But leading up to the 2004 presidential election, the Republican Party of Florida sent out fliers urging voters to use absentee ballots because of the absence of a paper trail.

Experts say the optical scanners are less expensive than the touch-screen systems. But Kimball W. Brace, the president of Election Data Services, said optical scanning systems had had a slightly higher rate of voter error than touch screens.

Gays Should Be Allowed To Serve Openly In Military, Poll Finds (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

A new poll from Harris Interactive found that 55% of Americans think gays and lesbians should be allowed to serve openly in the military.

By comparison, 19% of the 2,337 Americans polled said gays and lesbians should be allowed to serve "only if they keep their sexual orientation a secret," and 18% said they should "not be allowed to serve in the military at all."

The survey, conducted online between Jan. 11 and 18, also measured American attitudes toward the U.S. military's "Don't Ask, Don't tell" policy, which prohibits the military from asking personnel about their sexual orientation, but allows homosexuality to be a cause for discharge from the military.

Forty-six percent of respondents said they oppose the policy, unchanged from a Harris poll in 2000, and 36% said they favor the policy, compared with 34% in the previous poll. However, the policy is supported by far more men (43%) than women (29%). And among political parties, Republicans are more likely to support this policy (51%) than Democrats (25%) or Independents (31%), while 18% of Americans remain undecided about the policy.

The poll also asked whether Americans agree with comments by John M. Shalikashvili, the former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who wrote in a recent New York Times editorial that if gays and lesbians served openly in the U.S. military, they would not undermine the efficacy of the armed forces. Fifty-seven percent of respondents said they agree with his comments, compared with 31% who disagree.

ANTITRUST:

Municipal Broker Receives Subpoenas In U.S. Probe (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Adam L. Cataldo

Bloomberg, February 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0126212

Feb. 1 (Bloomberg) -- PackerKiss Securities Inc., the firm that has handled over $49 billion of investment contracts for local governments, received two subpoenas as part of a U.S. criminal probe of bid rigging in the municipal bond market.

The Delray Beach, Florida-based firm disclosed the subpoenas in December as it applied for investment business from the state of New Jersey related to a $3.6 billion sale of bonds backed by tobacco settlement payments. Treasury officials hired Dallas-based First Southwest Co. after reviewing applications from five firms, and released the applications this week.

``As a registered broker dealer we are required to maintain all the files and records that the subpoena requested," said Mary Packer, the company's president, in a telephone interview. ``We fully cooperated in supplying these in the full knowledge they were complete and absolute."

PackerKiss is among more than a dozen banks, brokers and insurance companies that were subpoenaed in November as part of the widest antitrust probe of the municipal bond market, where more than 10,000 of states, cities and local government authorities have $2.3 trillion of bonds outstanding.

U.S. prosecutors are trying to determine if firms fixed prices on financial products used by local governments to invest bond money until it is needed to pay for projects. State and local governments sold almost $379 billion of debt last year, according to Thomson Financial.

Request for Information

New Jersey required firms to describe any pending litigation or ``federal or state investigations or audits, subpoenas or other information requests" they have received since 2002, according to the state's Dec. 18 questionnaire.

In its response, PackerKiss said it received subpoenas that ``largely request information related to transactions involving the investment or reinvestment of the proceeds of tax-exempt bonds. The company, its principals or employees have not been identified as a target of any government inquiry or investigation."

The U.S. Department of Justice's Antitrust Division and the Securities and Exchange Commission issued the grand jury subpoenas, according to PackerKiss. They were served on or about Nov. 15.

First Southwest in its response said the company is cooperating with the U.S. investigation and acknowledged ``providing requested documents and information." The firm didn't specifically acknowledge receiving a subpoena, though Hill Feinberg, Southwest's chairman and chief executive, has said the firm got one.

Most Qualified

Tom Vincz, a spokesman state Treasurer Bradley Abelow, said in a statement that the Office of Public Finance evaluated all of the responses, and recommended Southwest because it was the most qualified. The state sold the $3.6 billion of so-called tobacco debt last week and will use proceeds to pay off existing higher-cost bonds.

Sound Capital Management, based in Eden Prairie, Minnesota, Bond Logistix LLC, based in New York, and First Albany Cos., based in Albany, New York, also applied for the New Jersey reinvestment job.

Sound Capital, one of three brokers raided by U.S. investigators in November as part of the probe, said it is ``part of" of the investigation. The company didn't provide further information except to say that no sanctions or penalties had been brought against the firm or its employees.

Sound attorney John Lundquist, a lawyer with Fredrikson & Byron PA in Minneapolis, said the company wouldn't comment.

Bond Logistix said it is unaware of any administrative proceedings, audits, investigations, or subpoenas involving the firm, its owners, or employees. First Albany said that to its knowledge, neither the firm nor its owners, principals or employees were involved in any litigation of a ``material nature."

Calls to Ken Gibbs, First Albany's executive managing director, and managing directors Edward Flynn and William Torsiglieri weren't returned.

Microsoft Plans To License Instructions (AP)

AP, February 2, 2007

BRUSSELS, Belgium -- In a bid to pacify rivals and antitrust regulators, Microsoft Corp. said Thursday that it will license for the first time a series of instructions to help competitors make software products that work smoothly with its servers.

The licenses cover three sets of instructions, known as protocols, that influence the way instant messages, e-mails, shared documents and other software applications are handled by Windows-based servers. Although the offer falls short of some rivals' earlier demands, Microsoft says it shows a new willingness to cooperate.

EU regulators fined Microsoft in July for failing to submit the "complete and accurate" data it said was needed for rival server software to work with Microsoft's ubiquitous Windows desktop operating system.

Microsoft has rewritten a technical manual to try to meet EU requirements, but the European Commission has not yet said whether the company has now obeyed the original 2004 antitrust ruling ordering the company to hand over these protocols.

Microsoft claims its offer to license these three protocols marks a new approach in its dealings with rivals and antitrust regulators. In the past, it has largely given access to such information only after regulators demanded it. This time, Microsoft says it is being proactive.

The EU hasn't asked for those specific materials, only for Microsoft to enable competitors' software to be compatible. An EU spokesman couldn't be reached for comment.

United CEO Says Mergers Still Viable (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — US Airways' failed hostile bid for Delta Air Lines doesn't kill prospects for other airline mergers, United Airlines CEO Glenn Tilton said Thursday.

Speaking one day after the US Airways-Delta deal fell apart, Tilton said the circumstances of a future deal between airlines "would be different if the two companies and the boards agreed."

A strong supporter of airline consolidation, Tilton didn't address possible merger partners for his own airline, but argued a friendly merger proposal stands a much better chance of success, though politics and government policies are still potential barriers.

He noted that U.S. airlines have lost $35 billion and laid off more than 150,000 workers since the Sept. 11 attacks, and have only recently started to become profitable. Consolidation would produce stronger airlines that could sustain profitability, Tilton argues.

His view on the impact of the failed deal contrasts with that of JPMorgan airline analyst Jamie Baker, who told clients on Thursday that prospects for industry consolidation now have "ground to a halt."

US Airways, in mid-November, surprised Delta with its bid to buy it out of Chapter 11 bankruptcy. Delta management vigorously resisted the bid, saying its own plan to emerge from Chapter 11 as an independent airline provides creditors a better deal than US Airways $10 billion stock-and-cash offer.

Tilton spoke to an American Bar Association meeting on the first anniversary of United's exit from bankruptcy reorganization. Chicago-based United, the USA's No. 2 carrier, reported a $25 million profit for February through December.

Tilton said continuing resistance in Washington to industry consolidation remains an obstacle. He cited a hearing last week before the Senate Commerce Committee, where several senators questioned the potentially negative effect of a US Airways-Delta merger on fares, air service and jobs.

Tilton called on the U.S. government to make it easier for airlines to compete with foreign carriers. Now that airlines are cutting their costs in and out of bankruptcy, the government should "finish the job of deregulation" so airlines can compete globally as do other industries, he said.

Tilton is a former executive of Texaco, which merged with Chevron in 2001.

In Europe, Air France merged with Dutch airline KLM in 2004 to become the world's largest airline in terms of revenue.

"Our international competitors are merging across borders, expanding, growing more profitable, investing in new aircraft," he said.

Tilton said the U.S. government should loosen restrictions on foreign investment in U.S. airlines. He urged restrictions on flights between the USA and big foreign markets be removed. Restrictions still exist, for example, on air service between the USA and the United Kingdom and mainland China.

ENVIRONMENT:

U.N. Report Adds Pressure To Global-Warming Fight (WSJ)

By Gautam Naik, Jeffrey Ball

Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

A report being published today that more authoritatively and explicitly links human activity to global warming is expected to increase pressure on governments and companies to reduce fossil-fuel emissions.

A summary of the new report -- put together by hundreds of scientists and backed by more than 100 governments -- is expected to assert that human activity is "very likely" the cause of a global-warming trend in recent decades. It comes as governments and some of the world's biggest companies are wrestling with a big challenge: how to apportion among companies and consumers the economic pain that is expected from significantly curbing fossil-fuel emissions.

DOJ_NMG_0126214

The new document contains "a strengthening of findings, a narrowing of uncertainty and filling up of the gaps" linking human activity to long-term warming trends, said Rajendra Pachauri, chairman of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, which is publishing the report today. The IPCC was formed by the World Meteorological Organization and the United Nations Environment Program.

This summary document doesn't contain prescriptions for action, though its conclusions will inform the debate about how to respond to climate change.

Already, governments and companies are acting. The European Union two years ago began imposing emission constraints on several big industries and is in the process of tightening those restrictions. A similar battle is brewing in the U.S., where Democrats -- who recently gained control of Congress -- are discussing plans to cap greenhouse-gas emissions. U.S. electric utilities emit large quantities of carbon dioxide and are likely to be the first to be regulated.

One reason for the growing political consensus is that the data linking fossil-fuel emissions to rising temperatures are becoming more reliable. President Bush, in his State of the Union address last month, implicitly endorsed the notion that fossil-fuel emissions contribute to global warming. After laying out a series of policy proposals to encourage oil alternatives such as ethanol, he said such technologies will, in addition to curbing U.S. dependence on foreign oil, "help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

Steve Johnson, the administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, hailed the IPCC report, saying, "Although many of the findings contained in the report are not new, they are a reflection of increased certainty of observed trends and heightened reliability of climate [computer] model predictions. This is very helpful and useful to us." Similarly, Exxon Mobil Corp., which has in the past made strong public statements about remaining uncertainties in global-warming science, now says climate science is growing more robust. Exxon says it has stopped funding several groups that questioned the validity of concerns about global warming.

The new report raises a key estimate of how much the earth is likely to warm as a result of an increase in greenhouse gases. It also predicts that human-induced warming will increase the intensity of hurricanes, an issue of particular interest to the insurance industry.

The assessment states that there is a 90% chance that global warming is caused by humans, according to a person familiar with the document. The previous IPCC report, published in 2001, had said humans were "likely" the trigger for warming trends, which indicated a 66% probability of a link.

The new report also says a doubling of greenhouse gases will likely raise the planet's temperature by more than two degrees Centigrade, at a minimum, the person said. The assessment six years ago said the temperature would likely rise by a minimum of 1.4 degrees Centigrade.

The assessment states that human activity is leading to warmer oceans, which in turn is likely to give rise to more intense and damaging hurricanes.

Political Climate Shifts As Verdict On Warming Arrives (USAT)

USA Today, February 2, 2007

Perhaps it's a sign of confidence that a group of the world's top climatologists would issue a global warming report on Groundhog Day, rather than some time in July. A few years ago such a report, released just as frigid air surged into North America, might have produced some chuckles or shrugs. But not this time. Too many of the world's leaders, in government and business, see the same things as these scientists do.

Indeed, today's report by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, created nine years ago by the United Nations, makes the most compelling case yet that global warming is real, man-made and a threat to the planet. It should have the steadily dwindling group of global-warming naysayers melting away faster than the polar ice caps.

The more daunting questions, though, are what can be done about global warming, and whether it can be done soon enough to matter. So far, political resistance has prevented dramatic action. The 1997 Kyoto Protocol, which assigns mandatory greenhouse reductions, was never signed by the United States and is too lenient on developing countries such as China and India, sources of much of the growth in greenhouse gases.

Further, the window to begin fixing the problem is narrow — perhaps as little as a decade, according to NASA scientist James Hansen — while the cost of fixing it would be felt by nearly everyone. Energy prices would have to rise, and habits would need to change.

Posed against those familiar obstacles is something newer and more interesting: The political climate for change appears to be improving, perhaps radically, despite the cost.

DOJ_NMG_0126215

No longer is concern limited to scientists and environmental groups. Business leaders are joining the fray as well. Last month, 10 major companies, including General Electric, DuPont and BP, called on Congress to take action. Even President Bush, a longtime skeptic, mentioned global warming in his most recent State of the Union address.

Across Europe, global warming is now a top priority among governments and the public. In the United States, individual states have started responding out of frustration at the mismatch between federal inaction and the severity of the problem.

A rise of a few degrees in the world temperature would likely cause more severe extremes in weather, a decrease in freshwater supplies and increased coastal flooding. In the USA, where more than half of the population lives within 50 miles of a coast, that is a disturbing prospect.

This awakening is particularly encouraging because it echoes trends that have overcome severe, expensive environmental problems in the past. Odd as it might sound now, water pollution was so bad in 1969 that the Cuyahoga River in Cleveland caught fire. Air in major cities was unpleasant to breathe. Both problems were seen as enormously costly to fix. Neither proved unaffordable. The same is true for acid rain and the ozone hole.

Addressing global warming needn't bankrupt U.S. motorists. At least in the initial phases of global warming plans, the biggest change is likely to be in a reduction in the use of coal, because that fuel produces far more carbon dioxide per unit of power than other fuels.

The most commonly cited approaches are cap-and-trade system, which would impose mandatory limits and allow companies to trade them. Another is a tax on fuels based on the amount of carbon dioxide they emit.

The biggest challenge, now that so many opinion leaders in the West recognize the problem, is bringing along the developing world. Countries such as China and India have a right to the fruits of economic growth long enjoyed elsewhere. But if only the developed world adopts strict policies, then some of the most polluting industries might simply migrate abroad.

Technology holds the key. Developing countries needn't make all of the environmental mistakes made in the West if they have better technologies for power generation and transportation.

Higher energy prices would certainly have broad economic impact. But they would have benefits as well. Energy-tax revenues could be used to reduce other taxes. Reductions in greenhouse gases would likely reduce other pollutants as well.

The United States has always confronted its most serious problems, whether winning wars or taking on environmental threats. There is no reason it can't do so now with global warming. Even if it means getting started in the middle of a cold wave.

Live With Climate Change (USAT)

By Patrick J. Michaels

USA Today, February 2, 2007

It's hardly news that human beings have had a hand in the planetary warming that began more than 30 years ago. For nearly a century, scientists have known that increasing atmospheric carbon dioxide would eventually result in warming that was most pronounced in winter, especially on winter's coldest days, and a cooling of the stratosphere. All of these have been observed.

However, actually "doing something" about warming is a daunting endeavor. The journal Geophysical Research Letters estimated in 1997 that if every nation on Earth lived up to the United Nations' Kyoto Protocol on global warming, it would prevent no more than 0.126°F of warming every 50 years. Global temperature varies by more than that from year to year, so that's not even enough to measure. Climatically, Kyoto would do nothing.

In the past four years, the Senate has voted twice against "cap-and-trade" legislation — sponsored by New Mexico senators Jeff Bingaman, a Democrat, and Pete Domenici, a Republican — that would set quotas on carbon emissions and let companies buy and sell them. If adopted, their cap-and-trade law would reduce emissions by less than the Kyoto Protocol specifies. In other words, the Senate has been loath to even adopt something that does less than nothing.

The stark reality is that if we really want to alter the warming trajectory of the planet significantly, we have to cut emissions by an extremely large amount, and — a truth that everyone must know — we simply do not have the technology to do so. We would fritter away billions in precious investment capital in a futile attempt to curtail warming.

Consequently, the best policy is to live with some modest climate change now and encourage economic development, which will generate the capital necessary for investment in the more efficient technologies of the future.

Fortunately, we have more time than the alarmists suggest. The warming path of the planet falls at the lowest end of today's U.N. projections. In aggregate, our computer models tell us that once warming is established, it tends to take place at a constant, not an increasing, rate. Reassuringly, the rate has been remarkably constant, at 0.324°F per decade, since warming began around 1975. The notion that we must do "something in 10 years," repeated by a small but vocal band of extremists, enjoys virtually no support in the truly peer reviewed scientific literature.

DOJ_NMG_0126216

Rather than burning our capital now for no environmental gain (did someone say "ethanol?"), let's encourage economic development so people can invest and profit in our more efficient future.

People who invested in automobile companies that developed hybrid technology have been rewarded handsomely in the past few years, and there's no reason to think environmental speculators won't be rewarded in the future, too.

Patrick J. Michaels is senior fellow in environmental studies at the Cato Institute and author of Meltdown: The Predictable Distortion of Global Warming by Scientists, Politicians, and the Media.

Judge Looking To Release Material From Rocky Flats Grand Jury (AP)

By Jon Sarche, The Associated Press

AP, February 2, 2007

DENVER - A federal judge said Thursday he wants to release as much information as the law allows from a grand jury investigation of alleged environmental crimes at the former Rocky Flats nuclear weapons plant.

But U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch said a federal appeals court that instructed him to consider what could be released "cast us adrift in uncharted waters."

Matsch asked for guidance from attorneys for former grand jurors who want to publicize alleged misconduct by prosecutors and from government attorneys who argue none of the information can be released.

Matsch had ruled in March 2004 that grand jury secrecy rules prevented the release of testimony transcripts and other documents that 18 of the 23 former grand jurors want the public to see. He also had ruled that he didn't have the authority to release material that might not be covered by those rules.

The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last year reversed that ruling and sent the case back to Matsch, instructing him to determine what could be released.

In a hearing Thursday, government attorneys told Matsch they believed the materials cannot be released. Matsch gave them a month to file supporting arguments, saying the Colorado U.S. attorney's office should consult with Justice Department officials in Washington because the outcome of the case could affect how the agency conducts grand jury investigations in the future.

Matsch also said he wanted both sides to determine how best to notify the prosecutors who worked with the grand jury that some of the information could be released.

"These allegations being made against counsel are very serious, and the allegations being made against the Department of Justice are very serious," Matsch said.

Attorney Kenneth Peck, a former grand juror who is pursuing his case separately from the other 17 former grand jurors, said it was "ludicrous" that he and other grand jurors were prohibited from reporting what he said were possibly criminal acts by prosecutors.

Details of the allegations by the former grand jurors are sealed. But attorney Jonathan Turley, who represents 17 former grand jurors, said releasing information about the allegations could spark congressional and criminal investigations.

Rocky Flats, about 10 miles northwest of Denver, made plutonium bomb triggers from the 1950s until it was shut down in 1989. The Energy Department has said a seven-year cleanup of the site is complete, and portions are to become a wildlife refuge.

From 1989 to 1992, the grand jury reviewed evidence and heard testimony from more than 100 witnesses about alleged environmental crimes. The grand jury recommended indictments against two corporations and eight people.

Prosecutors refused to sign the indictments and instead reached a plea agreement with former plant operator Rockwell International, now part of aerospace giant Boeing Co., calling for the company to pay an $18.5 million fine.

In 1996, 18 members of the grand jury asked Matsch to release them from secrecy rules. At the time, Turley said he wanted the judge to determine if prosecutors had deliberately undermined the case to protect a government contractor.

He said the alleged misconduct should be punished, and said the grand jurors wanted to use the information to counter public statements that former prosecutors made about them after the grand jury was disbanded.

Turley submitted a sealed document in 1997 detailing the allegations, and interviewed former grand jurors under oath in closed hearings that year. He said Thursday that he was most interested in winning the release of that document and transcripts of the grand jurors' testimony.

"You have a grand jury accusing prosecutors of serious misconduct including possibly lying to Congress," Turley told Matsch. "I believe the people of the state of Colorado and of the United States have a right to know what it is that has motivated (my clients) for so long."

Peck wants Matsch to allow him to submit to legal regulators and investigative agencies an affidavit he submitted under seal detailing his allegations of prosecutorial misconduct.

DOJ_NMG_0126217

Henry Solano, who was U.S. attorney for Colorado when the grand jury was working, has denied the allegations by the former grand jurors.

CDC Issues Guidelines For Battling Flu Pandemic (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

ATLANTA, Feb. 1 -- States should be prepared to keep children out of school for three months, businesses should be prepared to operate with skeleton workforces, children should be prepared to play mostly with their siblings, and parents should be prepared to lose income as they skip work and cobble together rickety child-care arrangements.

That was the picture sketched Thursday by federal officials in a guidance for communities on how to fight pandemic influenza in the months before a vaccine becomes available -- if one ever does.

"We have tools in our tool kit that we can use now to slow down pandemic flu," said Martin S. Cetron, the director of global migration and quarantine at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the country's chief public health agency. "These are tools we just are not used to using in recent decades, when all the attention has been on magic bullets."

The 106-page document issued by the CDC outlines "non-pharmaceutical interventions" against a virus that can sometimes be caught simply by standing near an infected person. The chief strategy is to keep people physically apart as much as possible during the eight-to-10-week-long waves of illness.

States and metropolitan areas would decide when to invoke various measures, such as closing schools and banning concerts and sporting events. The guidance, notably, did not suggest restricting travel. Its authors believe that if a pandemic's effects can be blunted or spread out over time, the essential functions of the economy may be able to continue largely unchanged.

Nevertheless, without a vaccine, it will be a scary and dangerous time.

"We don't expect we would be able to protect everybody," the CDC's director, Julie L. Gerberding, said at a news conference here.

Pandemic America would be an old-fashioned place. People would spend most of their time with close relatives and a few neighbors. They wouldn't go to the movies, run to the supermarket on a whim, or hug people they barely know. The sick would be cared for at home unless they were near death. Everyone would shun the houses of the ill.

At the same time, many of today's habits and capabilities would remain.

Many adults would telecommute to work in a season of near-endless "snow days." Children would probably turn in homework over the Internet. Prescription drugs would be prescribed liberally as preventive medicines. A government-woven safety net would probably provide food, personal care and financial assistance to people who couldn't cope on their own.

The use of face masks -- popular during the epochal "Spanish influenza" of 1918 -- wasn't addressed in the "Community Strategy for Pandemic Influenza Mitigation" booklet. CDC planners are still doing research -- both experimental and historical -- to figure out how useful masks might be. They will provide guidance on their use later.

To help states, cities and towns decide when to invoke various measures, the new document outlines a five-category system for estimating a pandemic's danger. The gauge is analogous to the one used for hurricanes, although "case fatality ratio," not wind speed, is the key variable.

Case fatality ratio is the fraction of ill people who die. In the Spanish flu, which killed about 50 million people worldwide, the ratio in the United States was about 2.2 percent. (It was 10 times as high in some other parts of the world.) Spanish flu in modern America would kill about 1.8 million people; it is Category 5.

The case fatality ratio was less than 0.5 percent in 1957 and 1968, the two most recent pandemics, which rank as Category 2. In the current sputtering outbreak of H5N1 "bird flu" in Southeast Asia, the ratio is above 50 percent. But that virus doesn't have the ability to spread easily among people -- the essential feature of a pandemic strain.

Schools are society's most densely populated environments -- in square feet per person, eight times as dense as offices and more than 10 times as dense as single-family homes. In 1918, closing schools was the most effective tool for slowing the virus. Some cities experienced a roller-coaster ride of infection as schools were closed, opened and closed again.

A 2003 study found that children in day-care centers were 2.2 times as likely to get upper respiratory infections as children cared for at home. Day-care centers would be among the first institutions to close. But arrangements in which five or fewer children were cared for by a couple of families might still be safe, the study found.

Cetron warned that ignoring a pandemic's potential for societal disruption is futile. In 1918, schools eventually closed in most American cities, but it was too late in many to blunt the epidemic's mortality.

DOJ_NMG_0126218

"It's not like those things are going to go away; we're just going to face them unprepared in a Category 5 event," he said. He added, invoking the memory of Hurricane Katrina, "And we all know what happens when we aren't prepared for a Category 5 event."

Flu Advice Would Vary Under U.S. Plan (WP/AP)

By Mike Stobbe

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

ATLANTA -- In the worst case of a global flu epidemic, schools would close for three months and public events would be canceled.

In the most optimistic scenario, people merely would be told to wash their hands and stay home if they feel sick.

Those are the options the government plans to consider depending on the strength of a possible deadly flu epidemic. And the options would be graded like hurricanes: The worst case would be Category 5. The least-threatening outlook, Category 1.

Federal officials on Thursday released a grading system for flu pandemics. The steps were taken to give the public some help in deciding how anxious to get if a deadly new flu appears in the United States.

The government also is releasing a wave of radio and TV spots to remind people not to be complacent about a potential contagion.

"As avian influenza slips from the headlines, people may begin to believe that the threat is no longer real," said U.S. Secretary of Health and Human Services Mike Leavitt, in a Thursday press conference in Atlanta.

The system has been eagerly awaited by state and local health officials, who will have to make many of the decisions about how to control the impact of the next pandemic flu.

Federal officials say they don't expect a vaccine will be available for such a virus until at least six months into a pandemic. On Thursday, Leavitt granted companies protection from lawsuits for vaccines against the bird flu virus.

Under his declaration, all H5N1 vaccines developed through a grant, contract or cooperative agreement would be protected through all production stages from testing to use. The protection would run through February 2010.

And although the U.S. government has enough medicine for more than 22 million people, it's not clear that they will work against whatever virus emerges, and it's doubtful that will be enough if many of America's 300 million residents becomes ill.

So health officials plan to rely on old-fashioned measures ranging from home quarantine to closing schools and postponing sporting events. But those measures can increase a pandemic's economic fallout, and even have unintended consequences. Closing schools, for example, can keep adults home from work to care for children. And it doesn't help if older kids are sneezing on each other at the mall.

The new guidelines, from the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, don't spell out exactly what infection-control steps states should take. But they do give an idea.

For example, in a Category 1 pandemic, there's no need to dismiss schools. But in a 2 or 3, states should consider dismissing students for up to four weeks. In a 4 or 5, they should consider closing the schools for up to 12 weeks.

CDC officials said categories are important because until now many people have thought of pandemic flu in black and white terms: Either a deadly contagion is upon is, or it isn't.

"Not all pandemics are equally severe," Dr. Julie Gerberding, the CDC's director, said Thursday in unveiling the new guidelines.

The CDC copied the nation's hurricane ranking system to help people size up the situation and to help communities make what Gerberding called "real tough decisions" about when and how to cut back normal activities.

But not everything is covered in the new guidance. For example, it says little about whether sick people or healthy people should wear masks, and if they do, what kinds.

"It's not a simple matter," Gerberding said, adding that more detailed advice on masks should be coming out soon.

Flu pandemics can strike when a mutating flu virus shifts to a strain that people never have experienced. Scientists cannot predict when the next pandemic will arrive, although concern is rising that the Asian bird flu might trigger one if it starts spreading easily from person to person.

Most planning until now has focused on the worst-case scenario of an outbreak as severe as in 1918, when 50 million people worldwide died. But the 20th century's other two pandemics, in 1957 and 1968, were far less severe, claiming 2 million and 1 million lives, respectively.

The 1918 pandemic was a primary model for current pandemic flu planning. Dr. Howard Markel, a University of Michigan health historian, said he believes the government's new grading system might have made a difference back then.

Federal health officials put out guidance then, too, but cities varied on what steps they took, said Markel.

DOJ_NMG_0126219

States still have leeway, of course, and neighboring states may institute different measures in a new pandemic. But if the government comes out with clear advice, it will probably be followed more closely than it was in 1918, when governmental power was more local, he said.

"The federal government telling a local or state health board to do something was not met with warmly," he said.

Closings And Cancellations Top Advice On Flu Outbreak (NYT)

By Donald G. Mcneil Jr.

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

ATLANTA, Feb. 1 — In the event of a severe flu outbreak, schools should close for up to three months, ballgames and movies should be canceled, and working hours should be staggered so subways and buses are less crowded, the federal government said Thursday in issuing new pandemic flu guidelines to states and cities.

Health officials acknowledged that such measures would greatly disrupt public life, but argued that they would provide the time needed to produce vaccines and would save lives because flu viruses attack in waves lasting about two months.

"We have to be prepared for a Category 5 pandemic," said Dr. Martin S. Cetron, director of global migration and quarantine for the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, in releasing the guidelines. "It's not easy. The only thing that's harder is facing the consequences. That will be intolerable."

Officials are, for the first time, modeling the new guidelines on the five levels of hurricanes.

Category 1 assumes that 90,000 Americans would die, Glen J. Nowak, a spokesman for the disease centers, said. (About 36,000 Americans die of flu in an average year.) Category 5, which assumes 1.8 million dead, is the equivalent of the 1918 Spanish flu pandemic. That flu killed about 2 percent of those infected; the H5N1 flu now circulating in Asia has killed more than 50 percent of those infected but is not easily transmitted.

The new guidelines advocate having sick people and their families — even apparently healthy members — stay home for 7 to 10 days. They advise against closing state borders or airports because crucial deliveries, including food, would stop.

The report urges communities to think about ways to continue services like transportation and meal service to particularly vulnerable groups like the elderly and those who live alone.

The guidelines are only advisory, since the authority for measures like school closings rests with state and city officials, but many local officials have asked for guidance, Dr. Cetron said. The federal government has taken primary responsibility for developing and stockpiling vaccines and antiviral drugs, as well as masks and some other supplies.

The new guidelines are partly based on a recent study of how 44 cities fared in the 1918 epidemic conducted jointly by the disease centers and the University of Michigan's medical school. Historians and epidemiologists pored over hospital records and newspaper clippings, trying to determine what factors contributed to the varying impact.

A few small towns escaped the epidemic entirely by cutting off all contact with the outside, but most cities took less drastic measures. Those included isolating the sick and quarantining homes and rooming houses; closing schools, churches, bars and other gathering places; canceling parades, ballgames and other public events; staggering factory hours; discouraging use of public transport; and encouraging use of face masks.

The most effective approach seemed to be moving early and quickly. "No matter how you set up the model," Dr. Howard Markel, a leader of the study, said, "the cities that acted earlier and with more layered protective measures fared better."

Any pandemic is expected to move faster than a new vaccine can be produced; current experimental H5N1 vaccines are in short supply and are based on strains isolated in 2004 or 2005. Although the government is creating a $4 billion stockpile of the vaccine Tamiflu, it is useful only when taken within the first 48 hours, and Tamiflu-resistant strains of the flu have already been found in Vietnam and in Egypt.

"No one's arguing that by closing all the schools you're going to prevent the spread," Dr. Markel added. "But if you can cut cases by 10 or 20 or 30 percent and it's your family that's spared, that's a big deal."

School closings can be controversial, and picking the right moment is hard because it must be done before cases soar.

Several public health experts praised the guidelines, though there were objections to some aspects.

Dr. Michael T. Osterholm, director of the Center for Infectious Disease Research and Policy at the University of Minnesota, said he saw no point in worrying about exactly when to close schools, because his experience in meningitis outbreaks convinced him that anxious parents would keep children at home anyway.

"I don't think we'll have to pull that trigger," Dr. Osterholm said. "The hard part is going to be unpulling it. How do the principals know when schools should open again?"

Other experts said that children out of school often behaved in ways that still put them at risk. Youngsters are sent to day care centers, and teenagers gather in malls or at one another's houses.

DOJ_NMG_0126220

"We'll be facing the same problem, but without the teaching," said Dr. Irwin Redlener, director of the National Center for Disaster Preparedness at the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University. "They might as well be in class."

Dr. Cetron said that caring for children in groups of six or fewer would cut the risks of transmission. He also said that parents would keep many children from gathering.

"My kids aren't going to be going to the mall," he said.

The historian John M. Barry, author of "The Great Influenza" (Viking Adult, 2004), questioned an idea underpinning the study's conclusions. There is evidence, Mr. Barry said, that some cities with low rates of sickness and death in 1918, including St. Louis and Cincinnati, were first hit by a milder spring wave of the virus. That would have, in effect, inoculated their citizens against the more severe fall wave, and might have been more important than their public health measures.

Sites Of Risky Levees Listed (USAT)

By Peter Eisler

USA Today, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — Bowing to demands from news organizations, the Army Corps of Engineers revealed the locations Thursday of 122 levees nationwide that are so poorly maintained they could fail in a major flood.

Some of the substandard levees protect densely populated areas, such as Springfield, Mass., Albuquerque and Sacramento. Many others are in rural areas, where they shield valuable farmland but relatively few people.

Maj. Gen. Don Riley, director of civil works for the corps, said he does not know how many people live near the levees or what the required repairs might cost. He said communities have one year to fix the problems.

If a levee's deficiencies are not corrected, people living nearby might have to buy flood insurance.

Some local officials said they need more time to find ways to pay for the repairs, which typically cost millions of dollars.

"A year may be too short for folks to respond and to have the resources to respond," said Susan Gilson, who heads the National Association of Flood & Stormwater Management Agencies, which represents local levee operators.

In many cases, the levees were built by the corps and turned over to local communities, which are responsible for maintenance. In those cases, Gilson said, "there should be a commitment at the federal level to share costs."

Some local officials first learned of the problems this week, after USA TODAY reported Monday that the corps had found 146 levees with problems so severe that floods could overwhelm them. The corps, which inspects about 2,000 levees nationally, refused at that time to list the specific levees.

USA TODAY and the Associated Press then requested the list under the Freedom of Information Act.

The full list can be seen at news.usatoday.com.

Riley said the corps wanted to wait to release the list until it finished notifying all communities responsible for maintaining those levees. He noted that 24 levees were dropped from the earlier count because some communities have corrected the problems. He said that the corps "will likely find more (levees) that are deficient" when additional inspections and reviews are done in the coming months.

Most of the levee problems found by the corps stemmed from tree and brush growth, animal burrows and erosion, Riley said.

"What we're doing at this point is making sure the maintenance requirements are met and having meetings with the levee owners … to make sure they understand what they need to do," Riley said.

If the levees aren't fixed:

·The corps could remove the levees from its inspection and rehabilitation program. That means the communities that own the levees would be ineligible for federal assistance to repair any damage the levees might suffer in a major flood.

·The Federal Emergency Management Agency could decide not to consider the levees adequate flood controls. Properties behind those levees would then be deemed high risks for flooding, and owners could be required to buy flood insurance policies costing hundreds of dollars a year or more.

Engineers Say 120 Levees Are Flood Risk (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

More than 120 levees around the country could fail in a major flood and need to be better maintained, the Army Corps of Engineers said yesterday.

The problems that led to what the corps called "unacceptable maintenance ratings" included erosion, tree growth on or too near levees, animal burrows and shifting soil.

DOJ_NMG_0126221

California has the largest number of problems, 37, and Washington State has 19. Louisiana has no levees on the list, said Maj. Gen. Don T. Riley, director of civil works for the corps, because those on the Mississippi River are well maintained and those around New Orleans are being rebuilt and strengthened after Hurricane Katrina.

The list and more information are at www.hq.usace.army.mil /cepa/releases/leveesafety.htm.

In most cases, the corps built the levees and handed them over to local communities to maintain them.

The new assessment inevitably misses many local levees whose owners have not tried to meet federal standards and would not have been counted, General Riley said.

There is more work to be done, he said, adding, "It is a concern."

General Riley said the corps would send the information to the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which runs the National Flood Insurance Program.

If the program determines that the levees are not adequate, flood insurance rates for people living near them could increase.

The corps is looking at 2,000 levees.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Drug Kingpin Sentenced To 40 Years In Prison (AP)

AP, February 2, 2007

TAMPA, Fla. -- A Colombian drug kingpin was sentenced to 40 years in prison Thursday and must forfeit $110 million, authorities said.

Joaquin Mario Valencia-Trujillo, 49, was sentenced in federal court after being convicted in October on trafficking and money laundering charges, the Justice Department said.

Valencia-Trujillo was arrested in Bogota, Colombia, in January 2003 and later extradited to Florida. He was arrested on charges of conspiracy to import cocaine, conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine and conspiracy to engage in money laundering.

During his trial, Valencia-Trujillo was described as the supplier of over 100 tons of cocaine annually to the United States since the early 1990s until his arrest.

"The Valencia-Trujillo case serves as another example of the cooperation and commitment of the United States and Colombia to the counterdrug effort," said U.S. Attorney Paul I. Perez. "The human misery and societal cost for which this defendant is responsible immeasurable. The punishment is well-deserved and long overdue."

Telephone messages left after hours at the offices of Valencia-Trujillo's attorneys were not immediately returned.

20 Members Of Violent Street Gang Arrested In New Jersey Raids (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WEST TRENTON, N.J., Feb. 1 — Staging a series of raids that ranged from the suburbs of Philadelphia to the Jersey Shore, the police on Thursday arrested 20 members of a street gang that is accused of widespread drug dealing and gun violence in Trenton and central New Jersey, the authorities said.

Col. Joseph R. Fuentes, the New Jersey State Police superintendent, said the organization, a faction of the Bloods who referred to themselves as "Money, Sex, Murder," are considered the state's most violent youth gang and are believed to have been involved in as many as 19 of the 31 homicides in Trenton in 2005.

The raids on Thursday, which began before dawn and ended about 9:30 a.m., produced 300 grams of crack cocaine, 3 pounds of powdered cocaine and 9 illegal weapons, including a loaded Mac-11 submachine gun equipped with a silencer, the authorities said.

Most of those apprehended in the raids face charges of racketeering, conspiracy, extortion, money laundering or drug crimes; two were charged with murder. The authorities said that at least five other suspects were still being sought.

Gang members — many of them with prominently displayed dog paw tattoos on their necks and faces — were also believed to be at the center of a five-day shooting spree in March and April 2006 that left 15 people in Trenton wounded. The shootings, with one victim a 7-year-old girl who was wounded in the face, brought an outcry from community leaders.

The raids were the second major wave of arrests the New Jersey State Police have conducted since adopting a new strategy that focuses resources of more than a dozen state and federal law enforcement agencies not on the most visible gangs, but on the most violent.

DOJ_NMG_0126222

"The not-so-subtle message is this," Colonel Fuentes said. "The more you shoot, the more we will fire back with an arsenal of detectives, investigators and prosecutors."

New Jersey has seen a significant rise in gang violence in recent years as small groups of local drug dealers and street criminals have banded together in cities, suburbs and small towns across the state. While many have adopted the rules, rituals and violent street code of established national gangs, most operate independently. Lt. Col. Frank E. Rodgers, the state police deputy superintendent of investigations, said New Jersey was now home to at least 700 gangs with 20,000 members, many of whom were brought into the organizations while in prison.

In many crime-ridden neighborhoods, teenagers say they feel pressured to join gangs to protect themselves from street violence, and are then forced to commit crimes to maintain their status within the groups. The problem has become so pervasive that some communities, like the Trenton suburb of Hamilton, have enacted ordinances that make it a crime to recruit gang members near schools.

In July, the authorities carried out the largest gang-related operation in state history, arresting more than 60 members of the "Nine-Tre" set of the Bloods, who operated across the state. Evidence seized in that case led to the arrests on Thursday.

Gregory A. Paw, director of the criminal justice division in the state attorney general's office, said the Money, Sex, Murder gang used a sophisticated structure to manage a lucrative drug and cocaine business and was quick to use violence to protect and expand its operations.

Trenton's police director, Joseph J. Santiago, said that the arrests would help reduce some violence, but that the city was still plagued by far too many street gangs.

"We're going to keep coming after them," he said.

State, Federal Authorities Round Up Suspected Bloods Gang Members (NSDY/AP)

By Angela Delli Santi, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 2, 2007

TRENTON, N.J. -- State and federal agents rounded up 17 members of the Bloods street gang in a series of raids Thursday that began before dawn and spanned three New Jersey counties and Bucks County in Pennsylvania.

Authorities said gang members were arrested in Monmouth, Mercer and Ocean counties in New Jersey and in Fairless Hills, Pa., after a 10-month investigation. They are suspected members of the Sex Money Murder set of the Bloods, whose major source of money was drug trafficking.

Attorney General Stuart Rabner said the operation, the second major anti-gang initiative in seven months, is part of "a new, aggressive law enforcement model that we're using to take down the most violent street gangs."

"This enforcement angle is a critical component of an overarching gang strategy," Rabner said.

The strategy will emphasize ways to prevent at-risk youth from joining gangs, and for those who do, a focus on their re-entry into society when leaving jail after long sentences, he said.

Five-hundred packets of heroin, a half-kilo of cocaine, nine weapons and $80,000 in cash were seized in the raids, which ended around 9:30 a.m.

The suspects were taken to the state police complex in Hamilton Township, Mercer County, for processing. Bails were set from $350,000 to $1 million. The suspects face a variety of drug charges, and two suspected gang leaders are also charged with conspiracy to commit murder.

Warrants have been issued for six additional gang members, Rabner said, and four others who hadn't been identified previously were swept up in the raids.

Numerous federal, state and local police agencies were involved in the raids, known collectively as Operation Dawg Pound. The nickname was taken from the gang's own references to its members and because gang members wore a trademark tattoo of a dog's paw print.

State Police Superintendent Col. Rick Fuentes said the investigation was triggered by 19 gang-related murders in Trenton in 2005 and a five-day shooting spree in the city last March and April that wounded 15 people including a 7-year-old.

"The not-so-subtle message from us here in this room to the street gangs is this: The more you shoot, the more we will fire back with an arsenal of detectives, investigators and prosecutors.

"This has been our strategy in previous gang investigations," Fuentes said. "It's a strategy that works."

Authorities said 11 of those arrested were part of the Trenton gang, while the rest belonged to the Monmouth-Ocean gang.

Thursday's raids were similar to a gang takedown in July in which more than 60 members of the Nine Tre Gangsters were arrested in cities across the state, including four gang leaders who authorities said were directing gang activities from inside state prison.

The Nine Tre's are a notoriously violent set of the Bloods street gang.

DOJ_NMG_0126223

Fuentes said information gathered during that investigation helped launch Operation Dawg Pound.

Municipal police in the Monmouth and Ocean county towns of Asbury Park, Dover Township, Ewing, Freehold Borough, Jackson Township, Lakewood and Long Branch participated in the raids.

Bloods Targeted In Series Of Raids (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 2, 2007

More than a dozen suspected members of the Bloods street gang were arrested yesterday, and six others already in jail were served warrants, as state, county and local police completed a series of raids in Mercer, Monmouth and Ocean Counties.

Police also arrested one suspect in Fairless Hills as part of the New Jersey State Police Operation "Dawg Pound," the latest salvo in a crackdown on local members of one of the most notorious gangs in the country.

In all, 25 reputed gang members were targeted in yesterday's action. Five were listed as fugitives last night.

"The message is: The more you shoot, the more we fire back" with intense investigations, said Col. Rick Fuentes, superintendent of the New Jersey State Police.

Fuentes and New Jersey Attorney General Stuart Rabner announced the arrests during a news conference at state police headquarters in West Trenton attended by representatives of most of the 17 federal, state, county and local law enforcement agencies that took part in the investigation or yesterday's roundup.

Most of those arrested were charged with racketeering and drug trafficking. Two of the leaders of the Monmouth County gang were also charged with conspiracy to commit murder, Rabner said.

Rabner said the investigation focused on two "sets," or local branches, of the gang - one based in Trenton and the other in the Freehold area of Monmouth County.

Eleven members of the Trenton organization, which used the slogan "Sex Money Murder," and six members of the Monmouth County group were arrested or served warrants during yesterday's action. Three other people were also charged during the raids with related offenses, police said.

The five fugitives are members of the Trenton set, authorities said.

County and local police, the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration, and the state police took part in yesterday's action. In addition to the arrests, authorities seized three pounds of cocaine, one-half kilogram of crack cocaine, 500 packets of heroin ready for street sale, $100,000 in cash, and nine weapons, including a loaded Mac-11 submachine pistol.

Rabner said the gangs were structured, disciplined, and heavily involved in narcotics trafficking. He said yesterday's raids, the result of intelligence gathering, analysis, and cooperation and collaboration among law enforcement agencies, was an example of how authorities intend to "attack and dismantle" street gangs.

The operation was dubbed "Dawg Pound" because members of the Bloods traditionally sport a tattoo of a dog's paw, authorities said.

Fuentes said the investigation grew out of intelligence gathered during and after another state police operation that targeted the Nine-Trey set of Bloods in Trenton last year.

Police have attributed 19 of the 31 reported homicides in Trenton in 2005 to the Bloods and say the Bloods were behind a five-day shooting spree in the spring of 2006 in which 15 people, including a 7-year-old, were wounded.

Those charged yesterday included Antonio Merritt and Bobby Williams, both 27, who were identified as the leaders of the Trenton set. Merritt was served a warrant in the Mercer County Correctional Facility, where he is awaiting trial on separate charges related to gang activity.

Williams was picked up in Fairless Hills. He also faces a federal drug-trafficking charge, Rabner said.

Most of those arrested yesterday were in custody, with bails ranging from $250,000 to $1 million. Three juveniles picked up during the raids were to be released to the custody of their parents.

Gang Probe Brings Arrests (TTNJ)

By Kevin Shea

Trenton Times (NJ), February 2, 2007

15 suspects rounded up across three counties

When a gang's bullet slashed through both of 7-year-old Tajahni que Lee's cheeks March 31 last year as she rode her bike in front of her Trenton home, the crime not only shattered a little girl's smile but ripped through the city as well, which was still reeling from a record 31 murders in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0126224

Lee's wounding and a preceding series of gang shootings unsettled the city, but those clouds had a silver lining that that was revealed yesterday when local, county, state and federal authorities announced the end of a 10-month investigation of the gang suspected of the crimes, the Sex Money Murder Bloods.

Starting at dawn yesterday, more than 150 law enforcement officers set out in Mercer, Monmouth and Ocean counties with a stack of arrest warrants charging about two dozen suspected members with everything from racketeering to drug charges to weapon possession violations.

By the time state Attorney General Stuart Rabner announced the probe in the afternoon, officers had apprehended 15 people and served charges against six gangsters who were already behind bars on other charges. Eleven of the suspects are from Trenton's branch of the gang.

The suspects will have their first court appearances today in state Superior Court in Mercer County where prosecutors will press for a minimum of $500,000 bail for each, and in some cases $1 million, Rabner said. The suspects will come into court in handcuffs and likely leave wearing them as well, a sight Rabner wishes all young people who emulate gangsters or are thinking of joining a gang could see.

"To see the reality of what life in a gang really is," he said.

The probe was called Operation Dawg Pound, since Bloods gangsters refer to themselves as "dawgs" and favor tattoos that il lustrate dog paw markings.

The state police have led several similar gang operations in the past several years as gang violence has risen across the state. This one, Rabner and state police Superintendent Col. Rick Fuentes said, specifically came from the Lee shooting and Trenton events of March 2006. Trenton police played a leading role in the investigation, he said.

The probe would eventually confirm that the Sex Money Murder Bloods had spread to areas of Monmouth and Ocean counties, like Asbury Park, Neptune, Long Branch and Lakewood, all which have seen a rise in gang-related shootings in the past few months.

Rabner said gangs operated separate sets in the Trenton and Monmouth/Ocean areas. Antonio Merritt, 27, of Trenton, is the Original Gangster or O.G., of the Tren ton set. Valdo Thompson, 21, of Jackson is the O.G. of the Monmouth/Ocean set.

Merritt, who is in the Mercer County Corrections Center on other charges, faces charges he led an organized crime syndicate, a narcotics trafficking network and related racketeering charges.

Also snared in the probe was Bobby Williams, 27, of Southard Street, Trenton, who was appre hended early yesterday at a Falls, Pa., residence. Williams has Sex Money Murder gang affiliations, but his main impact is as a drug importer and seller authorities described as a "hybrid drug dealer" who would sell to other gang sets.

Rabner reiterated that gangs, while they are about power, colors and turf, and have an organized, hierarchical code of conduct, are fundamentally drug dealers. "They establish a network to sell this poison on our streets," he said.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents arrested Williams, who will be charged with federal drug crimes, officials said.

As for the Trenton beginnings of the investigation, Police Director Joseph Santiago said the successful overall operation amounted to a partial victory in the Lee case, which initially crumbled after city police arrested two Sex Money Murder suspects. Days after their arrests, prosecutors dismissed the case against them for lack of evi dence amid allegations that police rushed the case because of political pressure to solve it.

One of the suspects charged in Operation Dawg Pound, 23-year-old Reginald Jackson of Chesnut Street in Trenton, is be lieved to have been involved in the Lee shooting, but was not charged last year, Santiago said. He is charged with racketeering and drug charges in this case, not the Lee shooting, officials said.

"Even though the individuals were not brought to justice for that," Santiago said of the Lee shooting, "they were brought to justice in other ways," he said, referring to the operation and Jackson.

"In some sense, we have a little bit of closure," Santiago said.

Informed of the fact that Lee's shooting prompted such a massive targeting of the gang, Tajahnique's great-grandmother, Candy Lee, said, "That's great news."

Standing inside her home on Coolidge Avenue, where the girl was shot outside, Candy Lee confirmed the now 8-year-old no longer lives at the residence, and she would not comment on where she is. Saying the matter is personal, Lee referred all questions to the family's spokesman, Emmanuel Av raham, who did not immediately return phone calls yesterday seek ing comment.

The overall message to gangsters, Fuentes said is, "The more you shoot, the more we will fire back with an arsenal of detectives, investigators and prosecutors." The colonel said he'd like to stop standing at podiums, announcing such operations.

"All the gangs have to do is quiet down ... and not commit crimes," he said.

Contact Kevin Shea at kshea@nj times.com.

17 Arrested In Bloods Gang Sweep (APP)

Asbury Park Press, February 1, 2007

EWING — State, federal and local law enforcement officials arrested 17 adults in a new offensive against the Bloods street gang today.

Operation Dawg Pound targeted the gang's presence in central New Jersey — predominantly in Mercer, Monmouth and Ocean counties. Charges included conspiracy to commit murder, racketeering, distribution of CDS, and transfer of weapons.

Among those arrested were Zachery Butts of Freehold, who had been previously arrested by Lakewood police in December. A handgun possessed by Butts seized in the Lakewood arrest was traced to the murder of Keith T. Mason in Long Branch, police said. Butts was out on bail when he was arrested this morning. Charges against Butts include illegal transfer of weapons.

Evidence seized in this morning's action supported the murder charges previously filed against Valdo Thompson Jr. of Jackson and Carl Holdren of Lakewood for their role in the November 2006 slaying of Michael Montgomery in Long Branch, according to authorities.

Also arrested this morning were Wesley Kelly of Ocean Grove and Michael Gunther of Howell, both on drug charges. Two juveniles from Ocean County were also taken into custody on drug charges.

The arrests were announced by state Attorney General Stuart Rabner; State Police Superintendent Colonel Rick Fuentes; Criminal Justice Director Gregory Paw; and Gerard P. McAleer, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent in Charge. The announcment took place in the newly opened Regional Operations Intelligence Center at State Police headquarters.

"Today's operation reflects a new, aggressive law enforcement model that we're using to take down the most violent street gangs," Rabner said. "It's a model that starts with effective intelligence gathering by the State Police and other agencies, and brings in state prosecutors at the outset, to ensure that we dismantle the hierarchy of these gangs with solid cases. We will continue to work with our many law enforcement partners to target gangs terrorizing our communities."

Suspected Bloods Rounded Up In Pa., N.J. (CHCP)

Cherry Hill (NJ) Courier-Post, February 1, 2007

TRENTON — State and federal agents rounded up 20 members of the Bloods street gang in a series of raids today that began before dawn and spanned three New Jersey counties and Bucks County in Pennsylvania.

Authorities said gang members were arrested in Monmouth, Mercer and Ocean counties in New Jersey and in Bristol, Pa. They are suspected members of the Sex Money Murder set of the Bloods.

Nine weapons were seized in the raids, which ended around 9:30 a.m.

The suspects were taken to the state police complex in Hamilton Township, Mercer County, for processing.

Warrants have been issued for five additional gang members, authorities said.

Numerous federal, state and local police agencies were involved in the raids, known collectively as Operation Dog Pound.

A briefing on the operation was scheduled for this afternoon at the state police's Regional Operations Intelligence Center, known as The Rock, at the West Trenton headquarters.

The raids were similar to a gang takedown in July in which more than 60 members of the Nine Tre Gangsters were arrested in cities across the state, including four gang leaders who authorities said were directing gang activities from inside state prison.

The Nine Tre's are a notoriously violent set of the Bloods street gang.

Troopers Arrest 17 In Effort To Dismantle A Violent Gang (NSL)

By Rick Hepp, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), February 2, 2007

State Police yesterday arrested 17 suspected leaders of a violent street gang that has kept a stranglehold on vast areas of central New Jersey by employing a volatile mixture of guns and drugs.

More than 300 federal, state and local law enforcement officers fanned out in the early morning hours to dismantle two chapters of the Sex Money Murder street gang. While operating mainly in Trenton, Asbury Park and Long Branch, the chapters also trafficked cocaine and heroin in suburban towns like Dover, Ewing, Freehold, Jackson and Lakewood.

The State Police launched the investigation following a five-day shooting spree in Trenton last spring that left 15 people wounded, including a 7-year-old girl, State Police Superintendent Rick Fuentes said. Detectives quickly identified the Sex Money Murder chapters as the main gang threat in the state's capital.

"The not-so-subtle message to the street gangs is this: The more you shoot, the more we will fire back with an arsenal of detectives, investigators and prosecutors," Fuentes said.

DOJ_NMG_0126226

The suspects arrested yesterday include Antonio Merritt and Bobby Williams, both 26, both from Tren ton, whom Attorney General Stu art Rabner identified as the heads of the two chapters. Both are charged with racketeering, leading a narcotics trafficking network, leading an organized crime syndi cate and distribution of narcotics.

Merritt, who has been accused of threatening the lives of police officers in the past, was being held in the Mercer County Correctional Facility on separate drug charges when he was served yesterday with an arrest warrant, Rabner said.

Williams, meanwhile, also was charged yesterday by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents for selling $3,000 worth of crack cocaine on two separate occasions to an undercover informant. Rabner said his office asked the DEA to file the charges in federal court because the counts carry a potential life sentence for Williams if convicted.

As troopers conducted the investigation with assistance from various federal, county and local law enforcement agencies, they uncovered the gang's tendency to use murder, assaults and threats to protect their narcotics operation, Fuentes said.

Some of that evidence led to murder charges being filed against Sex Money Murder members Valdo Thompson, 21, of Jackson and Carl Holdren, 18, of Lakewood in the Nov. 21 slaying of Michael Montgomery, who was gunned down in Long Branch, according to the superintendent.

Thompson and Holdren, who have been held at the Monmouth County jail since their arrests, also were accused yesterday of conspir ing with fellow gang member Zach ery Butts to kill a rival gangster Dec. 28, authorities said. Troopers were able to disrupt the attempted murder before it occurred.

The investigation also connected a handgun seized from Butts with the murder of a 28-year-old Long Branch man, Keith Mason, who was found shot to death Dec. 14 inside his home. Three other members of Sex Money Murder have been charged in that murder.

The investigation is the second by State Police using its new "intelligence-led policing" strategy, which mixes police street smarts with computer databases to determine which criminal elements to target based on the threats they pose.

In July, the State Police ar rested 41 suspected leaders of the 9 Tre Gangsters, which was considered the state's bloodiest and most-feared street gang and sold heroin, cocaine and guns in communities from one end of New Jersey to the other.

Sex Money Murder "was No. 2 on the list" of most dangerous gangs in the state behind 9 Tre, said Lt. Col. Frank E. Rodgers, who commands the State Police investigations branch.

"I would argue that when we took them (9 Tre) off the list, then Sex Money Murder were the most violent," he said. "But we wiped these two sets out, they're gone now."

Rick Hepp may be reached at rhepp@starledger.com or (609) 989-0398.

State Police Arrest 25 Suspected Gang Members (WPVI)

WPVI-TV,, February 1, 2007

Police conducted a large-scale raid across our area Thursday morning that captured 25 suspected Blood gang members at 5 different locations in two states.

"The arrests are not just street level dealers; we have the leadership of these sets under arrest," said NJ Attorney General Stewart Rabner.

One by one, more than two-dozen gang members and associates were hauled in by police from 18 different agencies. They were arrested in early morning raids for a laundry list of offenses stemming from the sale of drugs.

Lt. Col. Frank Rodgers of the NJ State Police said, "These folks are charged with racketeering to include homicide. They'll stop at nothing."

Among those arrested today at locations in Hamilton, Trenton, Bucks, Monmouth and Ocean Counties was 27-year-old Antonio Merritt of Trenton - identified as the leader of Sex Money Murder, which is a sub set of the Bloods street gang.

After a gang-shooting spree last Spring that left fifteen wounded in five days, including 7-year-old Tajanique Lee, the Sex Money Murder set was identified as the biggest threat statewide and to the Trenton community.

Trenton Police Director Joseph Santiago tells Action News, "We knew who we were going after, we knew what they were involved in."

Residents are glad Police are taking action.

Authorities admit that these arrests will not stop gang activity.

"If there are drugs there is money and its gonna to keep the gangs going so it's a never ending struggle," Ocean County Prosecutor Tom Kelaher told reporters.

But State Police have a message for the gangs that continue the violence.

Col. Rick Fuentes had a message for gang member: "So long as you engage in criminal activity, so longs as you go to the waist band and use that gun, we're going to continue to chase you down."

DOJ_NMG_0126227

Major Gang Crackdown In The Garden State (WABC)

WABC-TV,, February 2, 2007

New Jersey authorities spent the morning executing raids and arresting dozens of suspected members in several cities.

New Jersey reporter Anthony Johnson is live in Hamilton with the story.

All of the alleged gang members were brought to the state police processing center.

After the early morning raids that took place in places like Monmouth County, Ocean County, and Mercer County. Specifically in places like, Asbury Park and Trenton, New Jersey.

State police say this is a major assault on the "Bloods" street gang, which have become notorious across the state for drug activity and gun violence.

Police are planning a news conference this afternoon in West Trenton, New Jersey. They will have all of the details about this gang arrest all across New Jersey.

'BOBO' GETS 11 YEARS ... Kittitian Man Put Away In US Jail (SKN)

Sun St.Kitts/Nevis, February 1, 2007

In about 11 years' time, Glenroy 'Bobo' Matthew could be released from a US Federal prison to be reunited with his family in St. Kitts.

Earlier this week, Matthew was sentenced by US District Court Judge, K. Michael Moore to spend 135 months behind bars, to be followed by five years of supervised release.

The punishment was handed down on Monday, three months after he pleaded guilty to conspiring to import cocaine into the United States.

According to a press release posted on the Web site of the United States Attorney's Office of the District of Florida, Matthew was the last of four defendants to be sentenced for participating in a conspiracy that was led by former Jamaican Shower Posse leader Charles "Little Nut" Miller.

"The case was the result of a joint ICE and DEA investigation of AmeriJet International employees who were using the freight air carrier to smuggle cocaine into Miami from various Carribean Islands. Matthew was the exclusive agent for AmeriJet on the island of St. Kitts. Acosta commended the tremendous investigative efforts of the ICE, DEA, Serious Crime Group New Scotland Yard and The Royal St. Christopher and Nevis Police. The case was prosecuted by Assistant United States Attorneys Russell R. Killinger and Todd Mestepey," the release added.

Matthew along with Noel 'Zambo' Heath were both extradited to the US last March in respect of charges of conspiracy to supply and to import cocaine into that country – Heath into New York and Matthew into Florida.

Heath and Matthew were picked up in the early morning hours of 22 December, 2005 and were both committed to prison to await their surrender to the government of the US to stand trial, in agreement with a Privy Council ruling that the appellants be committed without further delay.

The extradition process of Heath and Matthew began in 1996 when Prime Minister, Dr. Denzil Douglas, was then minister of foreign affairs and it was at that time too, that the case was passed over to the court for consideration.

Heath and Matthew's extradition to the US came after a 10-year legal battle which was heard at every level of the judicial structure, right up to the Privy Council which is the country's highest and final court.

According to Dr. Douglas, the extradition order took effect on 2 March, 2006 when the men were handed over to officials of the Drug Enforcement Agency of the United States.

"This court ruled that these two nationals should be extradited to answer the charges that have been laid against them in the United States.

A final review of certain issues not related to the interpretation of the law raised on behalf of Heath and Matthew by their lawyer, was conducted by the relevant ministry and this government made a decision to obey the order of the court.

"It is never a happy circumstance for a country to turn its nationals over to another country for trial in a foreign court.

"My government looked at this situation long and hard and concluded that it was in the national interest that the law, deriving from international undertakings which we had solemnly agreed to be obeyed," Dr. Douglas said.

Douglas reiterated that his government has done its duty to protect the interest of its nationals after allowing Heath and Matthew to fully exhaust their rights before the courts.

Heath's fate will be decided later.

Georgia Man Arrested For Attempted Murder In Drug Raid In New York (AP)

AP, February 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0126228

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP) A drug suspect from Georgia was charged Thursday with attempting to murder federal agents who were investigating reports of drug activity inside a Buffalo hotel room.

A federal indictment alleges that Camara Griffin of Atlanta stuck a loaded pistol into a hallway Jan. 11 at the downtown Comfort Inn and pulled the trigger after three Drug Enforcement Administration agents arrived at a room where hotel staff had reported smelling marijuana and seeing what appeared to be crack cocaine.

One of the room's occupants, Colin Greenaway of Buffalo, at first opened the door but tried to slam it shut when an agent identified himself, according to court papers.

After the agent wedged his foot in the door to hold it open, he and the two other agents ``then observed an arm holding a black handgun extend into the hallway from behind the door and sweep from side to side," an affidavit by one of the agents said.

Two of the agents said they heard two clicks as if the gun's trigger was depressed twice, the affidavit said.

The agents closed the hotel room door and after a few minutes talked Greenaway and Griffin into surrendering, Assistant U.S. Attorney Timothy Lynch said. Investigators found one ejected .40-caliber round in the room.

Griffin told authorities that he drove to Buffalo from Atlanta and was expecting a shipment of the drug Ecstasy, coordinated by Greenaway, to be delivered to him from Canada. He also acknowledged pointing the gun at agents, but said he thought they were going to rob him, the affidavit said.

In addition to attempted murder of federal agents, Griffin was charged with using a gun to interfere with DEA agents and using a gun for attempted murder. He would face up to 20 years in prison if convicted.

He and Greenaway were charged with conspiring to possess and distribute Ecstasy, and possession of a gun during a drug crime.

Greenaway also was charged with unlawfully disposing of marijuana prior to it being seized by DEA agents. Authorities said Greenaway admitted flushing marijuana down the toilet while agents were outside the door.

A third man who was at the hotel, Andre Bennett, was charged in the indictment with lying to federal agents. He identified himself as a childhood friend of Greenaway from New York City.

Former River Hill Teacher Sentenced In Drug Case (COLFL)

Columbia Flier, February 2, 2007

A former River Hill High School social studies teacher was sentenced in January to six and a half years in federal prison for a scheme to sell $50,000 worth of the drug methamphetamine.

On Jan. 19, U.S. District Court Judge Andre Davis sentenced Timothy Hartlove to 78 months in prison followed by three years of supervised release, said Marcia Murphy, a spokeswoman for Rod Rosenstein, the U.S. Attorney for the District of Maryland.

Hartlove, who taught social studies at River Hill from 2001 to September 2005, was arrested in September 2005 during a joint investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and Maryland State Police.

Authorities arrested Hartlove after he accepted a package with $50,000 worth of methamphetamine from a middleman working with agents and police, a DEA agent and spokesman said at the time of Hartlove's arrest.

In addition, a search of Hartlove's Baltimore residence turned up methamphetamine, Ecstasy, marijuana and a quart of GHB, a substance known as the "date rape drug," the agent said.

In April 2006, Hartlove pleaded guilty to charges that he conspired to distribute the methamphetamine.

School officials terminated Hartlove's contract with the school system in November 2005. While at River Hill, Hartlove taught Advanced Placement courses, coached the debate team and served as an adviser to the school's Gay Straight Alliance.

--ÊJennifer Surface

Man pleads guilty in July Columbia stabbing

A 26-year-old Baltimore man this week pleaded guilty to assault charges in connection with a July 2006 stabbing that occurred near the Columbia mall.

At a Jan. 29 hearing before Howard County Circuit Court Judge Diane Leasure, Montaque Edward Butler pleaded guilty to first-degree assault in the July 11, 2006 incident.

A crew working in the mall parking lot called police at about 3:30 a.m. July 11 to attend to a man who was suffering from multiple stab wounds, according to police.

The man, Leonard Marvin Brooks, of the 10200 block of Sherman Heights Place, in Columbia, had that morning fled his house following a domestic argument with his longtime friend, Butler, in which Butler stabbed Brooks in the neck and arm with a large kitchen knife, according to a statement read into the court record by Howard County Assistant State's Attorney David Lank.

DOJ_NMG_0126229

Butler attacked Brooks inside Brooks' townhouse, which is near the mall, after which Brooks ran to the mall parking lot calling for help, according to the statement. Brooks was transported to the University of Maryland Shock Trauma Center in Baltimore, where he was treated and released.

Howard County police arrested Butler at about 4 a.m. July 11, after he was observed walking near the intersection of Route 29 and Broken Land Parkway, in Columbia, with blood stains on his hands and clothing, police said.

Leasure is scheduled to sentence Butler March 5, said Wayne Kirwan, the spokesman for Howard County State's Attorney Timothy McCrone.

Prosecutors will seek a 15-year term for Butler, according to the statement Lank read in court.

-- Jennifer Surface

CA board to discuss president's contract

The Columbia Association Board of Directors will discuss CA President Maggie Brown's contract renewal at a closed meeting on Saturday, Feb. 3, board members said this week.

The meeting is closed because it involves a personnel matter.

The 10-member board is facing a 5-5 split on whether to give Brown --Êwho has been CA's president since 2001 --Êa three-year contract extension or to limit the extension to a year.

Brown's contract, which currently pays her $183,000 annually, expires April 30. Any decision on her renewal would need to receive a majority of votes from board members.

However, board vice chairman Philip Marcus, of Kings Contrivance, and members Philip Kirsch, of Wilde Lake; Gail Broida, of Town Center; Barbara Russell, of Oakland Mills; and Cynthia Coyle, of Harper's Choice, have said they will not approve extending Brown's contract for more than a year.

The five say they favor hiring someone who is better trained in certain management skills they believe the president needs, Marcus said.

On the other hand, board chairman Tom O'Connor, of Dorsey's Search, and members Henry Dagenais, of Long Reach; Pearl Atkinson-Stewart, of Owen Brown; Patrick von Schlag, of River Hill; and Miles Coffman, of Hickory Ridge, support renewing Brown's contract for a three-year term because they believe Brown's performance has been strong.

Von Schlag requested at the board's Jan. 25 meeting that O'Connor call the special closed session, and other board members agreed. The session is needed to allow the board a chance to hammer out a compromise on Brown's contract, Von Schlag said.

--ÊAndrei Blakely

Senior centers getting faster Internet service

Howard County's nine senior centers and four senior-plus sites now have faster Web service for seniors who take classes using the computer.

The upgrades came after county technology office staff linked the senior centers into the county's existing service, said Ira Levy, the county's director of technology.

The sites were previously user dial-up Internet service, which is much slower, Levy said.

"It was a big issue because some teachers were reluctant to teach courses that require images," he said.

For example, in a genealogy class it would take 20 minutes to load one document, Levy said.

The new technology will make it easier for seniors to shop and communicate with friends and family, he said.

"With a senior community that has challenges with transportation and mobility, this teaches them to be more self-sufficient," he said.

--Nate Sandstrom

County GOP seeks Board of Elections members

The Howard County Republican Central Committee is seeking two Republicans interested in serving on the Howard County Board of Elections.

As minority party, Republicans are entitled to nominate one regular board member and one alternate member. Alternate members vote at monthly meetings at which regular members can not attend.

As majority party, Democrats have two regular board memberships and one alternate member.

To qualify, a nominee must have been a registered voter in Howard County for the last five years. Board of Elections members are not allowed to participate in political activity during their four-year terms.

Republicans interested in serving can submit questions or a resume, including the reasons they are interested in the positions by e-mailing Trent Kittleman at trentkittleman@comcast.net no later than 5 p.m. on Feb. 5.

--Nate Sandstrom

DOJ_NMG_0126230

Similar Bombs In KC, Chicago (KCS)

By Mark Morris, The Kansas City Star

The Kansas City Star, February 2, 2007

A federal investigation is searching for possible ties between the explosive devices.

Federal agents on Thursday investigated whether similar bombs, each accompanied by a note and found a day apart in Kansas City and Chicago, were connected.

Authorities disarmed an explosive device in a downtown Chicago business Thursday afternoon, said Wanda Shipp, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Postal Inspection Service.

It resembled a pipe bomb found Wednesday morning in a Kansas City investment company's mail facility, she said.

A threatening note accompanied the Kansas City bomb. The device in Illinois also was accompanied by a note, though Shipp would not characterize it as "threatening."

The close timing of the discoveries was worrisome. Typically, postal inspectors investigate only a few instances of explosive devices sent through the mail each year, according to the agency's annual reports. One exception was 2004, when inspectors chased down 21 incendiary letters that a Nevada prisoner sent to state officials.

Dan Taylor, a regional spokesman for postal inspectors in St. Louis, said investigators were searching for links between this week's bombs.

"Any type of mail bomb complaint or investigation is the highest priority case the postal inspection service looks at," Taylor said.

The Chicago bomb was at a business at 311 South Wacker Drive, a 65-story skyscraper near the Sears Tower, Shipp said.

Bomb squads from the Chicago Police Department and agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives defused the bomb, Shipp said. No one was injured.

In Kansas City, three federal law enforcement agencies continued working the case of the pipe bomb discovered Wednesday at an American Century Investments postal facility.

Postal Inspector Don Obritsch said investigators from his agency, the FBI and ATF were aggressively pursuing leads.

"The guys are working on it feverishly," Obritsch said. "It's a big deal to us."

An alert American Century mail handler discovered the bomb about 11 a.m. Wednesday. Employees at the mail facility near 34th Street and Broadway opened a package and saw a "threatening note and what appeared to be a suspicious device," said FBI spokesman Jeff Lanza.

Police were called, and a bomb squad defused the weapon, Lanza said.

American Century spokesman Chris Doyle said the company was back to normal Thursday but was considering ways to enhance safety procedures.

"The security and safety of our employees is the most important thing," Doyle said. "We're going to do what it takes to keep our employees safe."

Though Obritsch described Wednesday's bomb as an "actual I.E.D., improvised explosive device," he said it appeared more designed to frighten than kill.

"This was the real deal, but it was not primed to go off," Obritsch said. "To some extent, it was a device meant to scare people."

Michael P. Schmitz, an ATF spokesman, said that even if the sender didn't intend for the bomb to go off, it still posed a threat.

"If the components were there, it's dangerous," said Schmitz. "It could have blown up at a postal facility because it got too hot or there was too much friction. The fact that this didn't explode doesn't make it less of a case or a violation."

Lanza said law enforcement is not ready to comment on whether the bomb was addressed to an individual or the company. Obritsch said that investigators have not established a clear motive.

Those interested in learning more about how to screen suspicious mail or packages can call the Postal Inspection Service's local office at (913) 266-2400 or go to www.usps.com/postalinspectors.

Gang Members, Others Arrested On Gun Violations (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 2, 2007

SAN DIEGO – Eight gang members and five other men who sold weapons to a man posing as an illegal-gun dealer but who was working on behalf of federal authorities were charged with weapons violations Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0126231

Eleven men were arrested Thursday. The other two were at Richard J. Donovan Correctional Facility in Otay Mesa on parole violations, officials said.

They are scheduled to appear Friday in San Diego federal court, and could face prison sentences of up to 10 years.

The arrests came as a result of a 9-month undercover operation that focused on buying guns from gang members in San Diego, Spring Valley and Lemon Grove, said Dan Dzwilewski, head of the FBI's San Diego office.

“San Diego gang members routinely buy and sell firearms as a commodity,” he said, noting several of the guns had been stolen in other states.

Ballistics testing linked one of the weapons to an East County homicide, investigators said, but would not give any details on that killing.

The weapons included semi-automatic pistols, revolvers, sawed-off shotguns and rifles.

The investigation was called “Operation Colt .45” and included the FBI, San Diego Sheriff's Department, San Diego Police Department and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Onell Soto: (619) 293-1280; onell.soto@uniontrib.com

Gun Dealer Pleads Guilty To Violation (CTPOST)

By MICHAEL P. MAYKO

Connecticut Post, February 2, 2007

Weapons charge could lead to jail term

BRIDGEPORT — Frank D'Andrea leaned against a wall outside a federal courtroom, nervously tried to manage a smile before saying, "I'm glad it's over."

With one word — "guilty" — D'Andrea, 62, of Soundview Drive, Shelton, ended his 36-year career as a federally licensed firearms dealer who operated stores in Bridgeport, Stratford and Milford.

Come April 20, D'Andrea faces anywhere from 37 to 46 months in prison and a $10,000 fine when U.S. District Judge Janet C. Hall sentences him for possessing a unregistered explosive device.

The device — a .12 gauge Cobra shotgun with a motorized barrel called a Streetsweeper — was found behind an office during an April 2005 audit conducted at the Stratford store by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosive Devices.

But that charge was only one of 12 in a federal indictment returned last spring against the gun dealer. In December, Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Reynolds vowed to go back before the grand jury and indict D'Andrea on more charges if a plea-bargain deal was not worked out.

Over the years, D'Andrea, a frequent critic of stronger gun laws, was no stranger to the ATF. They cited him in 1998 for record-keeping violations and issued him warning letters for similar problems in 2000 and 2001.

Yet, they also sought his help as a witness in some federal prosecutions.

It wasn't until U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor stepped in with his Project Safe Neighborhoods program that D'Andrea was prosecuted.

It began with the April 2005 audit of D'Andrea's Gun Case on Barnum Avenue. They found numerous record-keeping problems, including the unreported loss or theft of 74 firearms. That investigation led to a bigger probe in which one man was prepared to testify that he bought at least 18 guns for convicted felons at D'Andrea's store. Another, Frankie "The Terminator" Estrada, once Bridgeport's most violent and richest drug dealer, was ready to tell a jury he paid people to buy AK-47s, AR-15s, Streetsweepers and pistols from the store to arm his operation.

It continued in September 2005, when O'Connor had a billboard reading "Buy A Gun for a Criminal, Go To Federal Prison" installed just doors away from the Barnum Avenue store.

"Gun store operators are the first line of defense for helping to control the flow of illegal guns onto the streets," O'Connor said. "Those who blatantly disregard federal firearms possession and reporting laws will be investigated and prosecuted."

A resulting indictment accused D'Andrea of conducting faulty background checks; failing to report multiple sales to the same person and obstructing justice by shipping guns out of state to avoid their detection during the ATF audit.

In court papers, Reynolds said Estrada told authorities that two of the guns bought from D'Andrea's store were used to commit murders. Additionally, the drug lord now serving 29 years in prison said any guns used in shootings were sent to New York for drugs or cash.

Estrada told authorities that D'Andrea advised him how to structure the sales. This included having the people who bought the guns and filled out the paperwork pay cash for them, instead of Estrada. O'Connor claimed a third man told authorities he purchased 177 firearms from D'Andrea's store in a year. Several of those guns turned up in searches, the U.S. attorney said.

DOJ_NMG_0126232

Following his guilty plea, the usually talkative D'Andrea looked worn from the courtroom battle and another with prostate cancer.

Alan Sobol, D'Andrea's lawyer, said his client spends much of his days volunteering in the food pantry at the Sterling House in Stratford and at Bunnell High School.

Feds Investigate Gang, Charge Two For Cocaine (SEAPI)

By Scott Gutierrez, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, February 2, 2007

Two men, including a suspected gang member, have been indicted as part of a federal investigation that netted 14 pounds of cocaine worth about $100,000, federal officials announced Wednesday.

Federal prosecutors say that one defendant is a member of the Norteno street gang. The mostly Hispanic gang is rooted in California but has extended its presence and illicit drug dealing into Washington, primarily in the Yakima Valley, U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Sullivan said.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' Violent Gang Task Force led the investigation.

This wasn't one of the larger recent drug busts, but federal officials used the arrests to showcase work of the task force, which includes investigators from Seattle police and the King County Sheriff's Office.

"Anytime you take that much dope off the street it's going to have significant impact on the distribution level in the city. Maybe short term, but it's still going to have an impact," said Special Agent Kelvin Crenshaw, who supervises the ATF's Seattle office.

The defendants were identified as Edward Martinez, 21, of Yakima and Cody Higgenbotham, 20, of South King County. Both men are being held in the Federal Detention Center in SeaTac. They were indicted this week on cocaine distribution charges and are scheduled to be arraigned Feb. 8 in U.S. District Court.

On Jan. 18, investigators arrested the two men at a Lake Stevens home in Snohomish County, where the two men had arranged to meet. The two defendants entered the home with a large paper bag, which concealed bricks of cocaine, federal officials said. A handgun and an Uzi semi-automatic gun also were confiscated.

Each defendant faces a mandatory prison term of 10 years.

Scott Gutierrez can be reached at 206-448-8334 or scottgutierrez@seattlepi.com.

IMMIGRATION:

Judge Nixes Louisiana State Law Banning Illegal Immigrants From Driving (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, February 2, 2007

(AP) - GRETNA, Louisiana-A state law requiring drivers from other countries to prove they are in the United States legally has been ruled unconstitutional.

In a decision handed down late Wednesday, State District Judge Jo Ellen Grant said the law, passed by state lawmakers as an anti-terrorism measure in 2002, illegally steps on federal immigration law.

The ruling applies only in Jefferson Parish. A similar challenge is pending in neighboring New Orleans.

The judge threw out the state's case against Omar Barrientos, who was stopped by police last March for having an expired license plate. At the time, he was carrying somebody else's Texas identification card, authorities said.

Under the law, any "alien student" or "nonresident alien" who drives in Louisiana must carry documents proving they are in the United States legally. Violators face up to a year in jail and a $1,000 (â,¬768) fine.

The law also requires state authorities to report violators to the federal Immigration and Naturalization Service.

Grant said the definition of "alien student" or "nonresident alien" was different from that contained in federal law. The identification requirement "exceeds the standard contemplated by federal immigration law," the judge wrote.

Melissa Crow, an attorney with the National Immigration Law Center who argued against the law, said the legislative history of the law's passage showed its intended purpose was to stop the use of fraudulent driver's licenses. However, most people booked with the offense do not have licenses, she said.

"We don't know if they pull someone over because they look Latino or if they are pulling over a bunch of people for traffic offenses," Crow said.

Immigration Raid Nets 53 In Texas (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, February 2, 2007

(AP) - HOUSTON-Federal agents arrested 53 suspected illegal immigrants Wednesday after raiding a trash collection plant, officials said.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said those arrested at the Republic Services Inc. plant near Houston face deportation. Many of the immigrants are from El Salvador, Mexico, Honduras and Nicaragua.

Agents detained workers hired through temporary agencies, said Will Flower, a spokesman for the Fort Lauderdale, Fla.-based company. The company has no oversight on how the temporary staffing agencies that provide workers to Republic comply with federal regulations, he said.

The company has yet to learn why some workers were arrested, Flower said.

"It could be as simple as they came to work without their green card," he said.

Republic Services had immigration problems in 2005 that resulted in a change of management at the plant.

"We believe we are in compliance with all applicable laws, rules and regulations," Flower said.

Those arrested could also face federal charges for violations that include re-entering the country after deportation and using fraudulent documents to gain employment, immigration authorities said.

Wednesday's raid is the latest in a string of immigration arrests in recent months, including nearly 1,300 in meatpacking plants in six states in December, and more than 750 in metropolitan Los Angeles last week.

New RNC Chief Backs Bill With Guest-worker Plan (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida, the Republican National Committee's new general chairman, wants Congress to pass an immigration bill this year that will include a guest-worker program with "earned citizenship" requirements for illegal aliens.

Mr. Martinez, whose election encountered sharp opposition from some RNC members who think his support for giving illegal aliens a path to citizenship is a thinly veiled form of amnesty, said, "I don't support deporting these people because I don't believe that's a realistic approach."

In an interview with The Washington Times, his first since taking the helm of the RNC, he acknowledged the opposition to his election and his support for the Kennedy-McCain bill that called for a multistep process of earned amnesty for all but the most recent illegals. But he said, "My views on immigration are not well understood."

"I did support Kennedy-McCain. I did vote for that, but I had some amendments to that bill that made it, I think, more conservative. We need border security and strong assimilation. I voted for the 700-mile fence on the border. I'm a strong advocate of these things," he said.

"But I don't wake up every morning worrying about the issue. It's an important issue. It needs to be dealt with. But I don't have some agenda here," he said.

Asked what he would consider the ideal immigration bill, Mr. Martinez said he was working with Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona and other conservative Republicans on a compromise that would call for a temporary-worker system along the lines that President Bush has proposed. "We're trying to see if something can be worked out," he said.

"I think it is important for people who would like to be American citizens, if they come here illegally, to pay some penalties for breaking the law, to undergo background checks, to see that they pass English proficiency tests and some sort of citizenship lesson, pay back taxes -- all the things that I think would be sensible for someone to earn a path to citizenship but not an immediate citizenship," he said.

Mr. Martinez said he realizes that any earned citizenship plan triggers opposition among many in his party but he hopes that a compromise can be reached around which the party can unite.

"I respect the right of some people to differ on whether I was the right person for the job or not. I was delighted that the opposition was as small as it was. I respect them, but then we move on," he said. "My election to the RNC was not about immigration. It's about the president's belief that my voice could help the party win elections."

Mr. Martinez also said the Republicans' internal political battle over immigration has alienated much of the Hispanic community, but he believes the fast-growing minority voter bloc is "absolutely not a lost cause" in the 2008 elections.

"We've done very well with Hispanic voters in the past. It's about reaching out and explaining our policies and what our party stands for," he said.

Mr. Martinez -- who fled communist Cuba as a youngster, a story that plays a central role in his political appeal -- outlined an ambitious Hispanic outreach effort that he said he will lead as party chairman over the next two years.

"I'll be speaking to Spanish media on radio and television, webcasts, podcasts and Hispanic groups, as [former RNC Chairman] Ken Mehlman did. We'll reach out very strongly. We're going to organize in the states in a way that will allow Hispanics to play a role in our party's politics," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0126234

But the one thing that worries him the most is the residual anger and discontent at the party's base that he says led to the House and Senate losses in November and represents a major challenge for Republicans to overcome in the 2008 elections.

"There is some anger out there at our party's grass roots. We have to show them we've heard their message loud and clear and that we understand it," he said. "We lost our path, our way. We didn't adhere to the Republican principles that made us very successful. We lost the optimism of Ronald Reagan and the idea of fiscal restraint, and obviously the Iraq war played a part as well."

But he said he is under no illusions about Republicans making a comeback in the next elections, noting that the party will have 21 senators up for re-election to only 12 for the Democrats.

"It's going to be a tough cycle, but we'll hold some and pick up some," he said.

Border Policy's Success Strains Resources (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

RAYMONDVILLE, Tex. -- Ringed by barbed wire, a futuristic tent city rises from the Rio Grande Valley in the remote southern tip of Texas, the largest camp in a federal detention system rapidly gearing up to keep pace with Washington's increasing demand for stronger enforcement of immigration laws.

About 2,000 illegal immigrants, part of a record 26,500 held across the United States by federal authorities, will call the 10 giant tents home for weeks, months and perhaps years before they are removed from the United States and sent back to their home countries.

The $65 million tent city, built hastily last summer between a federal prison and a county jail, marks both the success and the limits of the government's new policy of holding captured non-Mexicans until they are sent home. Previously, most such detainees were released into the United States before hearings, and a majority simply disappeared.

The new policy has led to a dramatic decline in border crossings by non-Mexicans, according to the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency.

But civil liberties and immigration law groups allege that out of sight, the system is bursting at the seams. In the Texas facility, they say, illegal immigrants are confined 23 hours a day in windowless tents made of a Kevlar-like material, often with insufficient food, clothing, medical care and access to telephones. Many are transferred from the East Coast, 1,500 miles from relatives and lawyers, virtually cutting off access to counsel.

"I call it 'Ritmo' -- like Gitmo, but it's in Raymondville," said Jodi Goodwin, an immigration lawyer from nearby Harlingen.

An inspector general's report last month on a sampling of five U.S. immigration detention facilities found inhumane and unsafe conditions, including inadequate health care, the presence of vermin, limited access to clean underwear and undercooked poultry. Although ICE standards require that immigrants have access to phones and pro bono law offices, investigators found phones missing, not working or connected to non-working numbers.

With roughly 1.6 million illegal immigrants in some stage of immigration proceedings, ICE holds more inmates a night than Clarion hotels have guests, operates nearly as many vehicles as Greyhound has buses and flies more people each day than do many small U.S. airlines.

Gary Mead, assistant director of ICE detention and removal operations, said the agency is proud of its record, calling Raymondville "a modern, clean facility" that meets federal standards -- "which we believe are among the highest you'll find anywhere." Mead added: "We think the conditions of confinement there are both humane and consistent with all the rights they should be entitled to."

Despite its spartan conditions, the facility in Willacy County, 260 miles south of Austin, is a key to President Bush's drive to create a channel for temporary foreign workers and a path toward legalization for as many as 12 million illegal immigrants living in the United States.

To do so, the government must convince skeptics that it can credibly enforce laws aimed at illegal immigrants and their employers, and can hold and deport those caught by the U.S. Border Patrol. At the same time, the administration and its allies argue that even additional detention beds will be overwhelmed without new channels for legal immigration.

Accordingly, the United States has embarked on a huge prison building and contracting campaign, increasing the number of illegal immigrants detained from 19,718 a day in 2005 to about 26,500 now, and a projected 32,000 this summer.

About 80 percent of ICE's beds are rented at 300 local and state jails nationwide, concentrated in the South and Southwest, or at eight sites run by contractors such as the Corrections Corporation of America and Geo Group Inc., in places such as Houston, San Diego and Aurora, Colo.

ICE recently added a 1,524-bed facility in Stewart County, Ga., and a 512-bed center in Taylor, Tex., for immigrant families, both run by Corrections Corp.

With the new beds, the administration has imprisoned and deported virtually 100 percent of non-Mexicans caught since August, under faster proceedings that deny hearings to all but asylum seekers.

The administration says this has deterred many others. After quadrupling over four years, the number of non-Mexicans apprehended fell 35 percent in 2006, to 108,026.

But immigration experts and U.S. authorities say the impact of the prison boom will be hard to sustain and still is absorbing only a drop in the bucket of illegal immigration. The Border Patrol made 1.1 million apprehensions last year -- mostly Mexicans who were promptly returned across the border -- but estimates 500,000 people evaded capture or entered legally and then overstayed visas.

An additional 630,000 are at large, ignoring deportation orders, and 300,000 more who entered state and local prisons for committing crimes are to be deported but will probably slip through the cracks after completing their sentences.

U.S. authorities acknowledge that gains from the latest crackdown will be fleeting without the major changes the president wants.

"The short answer is, it is not sustainable," Mead said. "There comes a point where we can't detain any more people. Hopefully, prior to getting there, the deterrence factor will kick in."

The increased tempo of operations is a strain. ICE has no modern nationwide system to track its facilities' populations. It relies on an antiquated computer system created in 1984.

Every day since July, six officers have manually tracked and transferred detained immigrants among 24 regional offices, matching bodies to vacant beds and airplane seats in a Detention Operations Coordination Center, Mead said. "We have all of the information," he said. "It's a question of automation."

Legal advocates contend that some of the older facilities where immigrants are housed are in deplorable condition and that growing pains afflict even new facilities.

Under fire in Taylor, for example, ICE has expanded hours of daily schooling for children from one to seven hours to meet Texas guidelines.

In Willacy County, one of the country's poorest, ICE has set up 10 huge tents on concrete pads, surrounded by 14-foot-high chain-link fences looped with barbed wire. Each "sprung structure" holds about 200 men or women, divided into four "pods." Similar temporary buildings were used for troop recreational facilities in Iraq.

The center is part of a chain of facilities in South Texas with 6,700 new immigration detention beds. At a cost of $78 a night per bed (compared with an ICE average of $95 a bed), the Willacy facility is not only cheaper than any bricks-and-mortar prison but also faster to construct, move or dismantle, Mead said.

Detainees are subject to penal system practices, such as group punishment for disciplinary infractions. The tents are windowless and the walls are blank, and no partitions or doors separate the five toilets, five sinks, five shower heads and eating areas. Lacking utensils on some days, detainees eat with their hands.

Because lights are on around the clock, a visitor finds many occupants buried in their blankets throughout the day. The stillness and torpor of the pod's communal room, where 50 to 60 people dwell, are noticeable.

Goodwin described a group of women who huddled in a recreation yard on a recent 40-degree day with a 25-mph wind. "They had no blanket, no sweat shirt, no jacket," she said. "Officers were wearing earmuffs, and detainees were outside for an hour with short-sleeved polyester uniforms and shower shoes and not necessarily socks."

Perhaps more troubling, lawyers said, large numbers of immigrants have been transferred from Boston, New York, New Jersey and Florida, far from their families and lawyers. Because some immigration judges do not permit hearings by teleconference, detainees are essentially deprived of counsel.

Immigration violators in the United States are held on civil grounds and have no right to appointed lawyers. But federal guidelines call for providing them law libraries, telephones and phone numbers for legal aid.

Joining a lawsuit last week, the American Civil Liberties Union alleged that severe overcrowding at a Corrections Corp. facility in San Diego poses an unconstitutional risk to detainees' health and safety, arguing that as administrative detainees, illegal immigrants should be treated better than convicted criminals.

The National Lawyers Guild and five other groups petitioned the Department of Homeland Security last month to set binding regulations for detention sites, saying U.S. standards set in 2000 are not enforceable.

And the New Jersey Civil Rights Defense Committee has announced a campaign to stop ICE's use of county jails.

"The standards are there," said David A. Martin, a former general counsel of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, ICE's predecessor agency, who advocates concentrating detention centers in perhaps 10 cities to ensure access to lawyers and oversight. "But there are some real indicators federal standards are not well monitored or policed. We ought to do better."

DOJ_NMG_0126236

TAX:

Protective Order Granted (NPLATTET)

By John Lindenberger

North Platte (NE) Telegraph, February 2, 2007

Attorney's representing Lowell Baisden have been granted a protective order preventing the U.S. Justice Department from using depositions of Burt McKeag, Evan Geilenkirchen and Jane Geilenkirchen, all of North Platte.

Baisden, the California accountant who has been accused of tax fraud, was to appear in U.S. District Court on Feb. 8 for a hearing to determine whether to grant the Justice Department's request for a preliminary injunction. On Tuesday, that hearing was continued to March 2 due to the court's heavy caseload.

The Justice Department claims Baisden has been promoting an illegal tax avoidance scheme to many of his clients. Among his current and former clients are seven North Platte health care practitioners.

Those who were scheduled to appear for depositions last week are all former clients of Baisden's who have hired new accountants to re-file their tax returns and correct the information reported by Baisden.

Prior court documents have stated that McKeag consulted a new accountant in 2003 to prepare an amended return and correct the false information Baisden had reported on his 2002 tax return.

The Geilenkirchens have also re-filed the tax returns prepared by Baisden and filed their own lawsuit against the accountant, seeking damages for the interest and penalties that have been assessed against them by the IRS.

Baisden's attorneys requested the protective order because they claim the Justice Department did not give reasonable notice. They were reportedly notified just one week prior to the depositions, which were scheduled for Jan. 26.

The attorneys representing Baisden indicated that the Justice Department had plenty of time to schedule these depositions since the motion for a preliminary injunction was filed four months ago.

Attorneys for the Justice Department opposed the protective order, stating the depositions are needed to clarify contradictory statements made by Baisden and that provisions were made for the defense to cross-examine by phone.

In addition to preventing the depositions from being used at the hearing, Baisden's attorneys have filed a supplement to their opposition against the preliminary injunction, claiming the Justice Department's case relies heavily on irrelevant facts and hearsay.

They also claim the Justice Department fails to provide proper expert opinion, offering the hearsay declarations of several of its IRS agents instead of declarations from Baisden's own clients.

"By contrast, Baisden has submitted various declarations (from himself and several of his clients) which lay out specifics demonstrating that he complied with internal revenue laws and regulations," the court document states.

The supplemental documents also provide further information on the corporation that Baisden helped establish for Drs. Walter and Deborah Weaver of North Platte to show that the purpose of this action was not to save taxes.

According to declarations from both Walter and Deborah Weaver, the couple purchased 2,200 acres of canyon land near Maxwell in 2003 at a cost of $357,837. This land has been used for cattle grazing and is being improved for recreational use as hunting ground.

The court documents state the Weavers have made significant improvements to the property and have hired a manager who handles contracts and other issues with the ranchers and other tenants.

The Weavers also purchased 90 acres of river ground in Sutherland in 2000 and are developing this property. In 2003, the couple formed the Axehandle Corporation in Nevada to develop and operate the two properties.

In their declarations, the Weavers state Axehandle was formed to produce income from real estate purchases and development, as well as for asset protection since the exposure to malpractice and civil suits is high for doctors.

However, the Weavers both reported that the corporation was not formed for the purpose of tax savings. They further claim Baisden never suggested that the purpose of the corporation was to hide assets or income from the government.

Baisden's attorneys report there was little net tax difference between reporting the Weavers' income on an individual return and reporting some activity on a corporate return and some on an individual return.

"A preliminary calculation of the Weavers' 2003 net tax savings from operating their business in the same corporation versus as a sole proprietorship yields less than $27,000 of tax savings," the court documents state.

Court Rejects Tax Shelter Once Sold By KPMG (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0126237

A federal judge in Texas has ruled that a widely used aggressive tax shelter was based on fake bank loans and is therefore not legitimate, giving an unexpected boost to federal prosecutors overseeing a widening criminal investigation into tax shelters.

The shelter, known as Blips, plays a central role in the criminal inquiry of Deutsche Bank over questionable tax shelters and in the pending criminal trial in federal court in Manhattan of 16 former employees of the accounting firm KPMG and two outsiders.

The civil ruling on Tuesday by Judge T. John Ward of Federal District Court for the Eastern District of Texas will probably add ammunition to Manhattan prosecutors' arguments that Deutsche Bank acted improperly by providing fake loans for Blips and similar shelters. Judge Ware's is the first major civil ruling on the legitimacy of Blips, or bond-linked issue premium structure.

It is also likely to bolster prosecutors' case against certain KPMG defendants who are also named in the judge's ruling. They are John Larson, Robert Pfaff and David Amir Makov, all former employees of an investment firm called Presidio Advisory Services, now defunct. According to previously disclosed internal Deutsche Bank documents, Blips was created and sold primarily by Deutsche Bank, KPMG and Presidio.

Judge Ward's ruling is also notable in that it absolves of any guilt two wealthy Texas investors who bought Blips. The investors were Harold W. Nix and C. Cary Patterson, two lawyers on a legal team that earned sizable fees for winning a $17 billion tobacco settlement for Texas in 1998.

Mr. Nix and Mr. Patterson sued the Internal Revenue Service after it disallowed their claims for around $25 million each in losses stemming from Blips on their federal tax returns from 2000 through 2002.

Judge Ward ruled that both investors must pay the taxes they owe, but that they were not liable for multimillion-dollar penalties stemming from their use of Blips.

Judge Ward ruled that Mr. Nix and Mr. Patterson genuinely thought that what they were making a legitimate investment, that they learned only later of the tax benefits and that they reasonably relied upon the advice and opinions of their accountants and lawyers, including George A. Hrdlicka, a prominent Houston lawyer who told them that Blips was "above the board."

An I.R.S. spokesman, Terry Lemons, said, "We're reviewing the decision."

Blips, one of the most widely used aggressive shelters of the late 1990s through recent years, was sold to wealthy investors as a three-year, seven-stage investment that revolved around bank loans and trading of foreign currencies and securities.

But Judge Ward, echoing arguments made by Manhattan prosecutors pursuing Deutsche Bank and the KPMG group, found that Blips was not a real investment at all, that its loans were fake and that it had no economic substance or genuine business purpose — hallmarks of a bogus tax shelter.

Instead, investors in Blips always got out of the deals after around 60 days and shifted artificial losses from the fake loans to partnerships that were then used to improperly claim tax deductions.

The judge's ruling may also draw yet more companies into the widening criminal investigation, because it details how NatWest, a British bank now owned by Royal Bank of Scotland, knowingly provided the fake loans for Mr. Nix's and Mr. Patterson's shelters.

"NatWest and Presidio viewed the loan transactions as involving zero credit risks," Judge Ward wrote. "In truth, NatWest did not make any loans." NatWest, which is headquartered in London, could not be reached immediately for comment.

Another German bank, HVB Group, reached a $29 million deferred-prosecution agreement with the Justice Department in February 2006 after admitting to criminal wrongdoing in providing fake loans for Blips and other aggressive shelters. KPMG also admitted to criminal wrongdoing with Blips and three other shelters in its $456 million deferred-prosecution agreement in mid-2005.

In an earlier procedural decision last July, Judge Ward ruled that the I.R.S. had merely overstepped its authority when it retroactively applied tougher Treasury Department rules to liabilities like those used in Blips.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Seeks Big Medicare And Medicaid Saving (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — President Bush will ask Congress in his budget next week to squeeze more than $70 billion of savings from Medicare and Medicaid over the next five years, administration officials and health care lobbyists said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0126238

The proposals, part of a White House plan to balance the budget by 2012, set the stage for a battle with Congress over entitlement spending. Even some administration officials say they cannot imagine approval of such large cutbacks in a Congress now controlled by Democrats.

Mr. Bush is also expected to propose changes in the Children's Health Insurance Program to sharpen its focus on low-income families. The changes could reduce federal payments to states that cover children with family incomes exceeding twice the poverty level. Under federal guidelines, a family of four is considered poor if its annual income is less than $20,650.

The child health proposal, like those for Medicare and Medicaid, is likely to touch off a fight on Capitol Hill. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and other Democrats are seeking major expansions of the children's health program, though they have not said how they would pay for the changes.

One measure of the political difficulty facing the president's plan for Medicare and Medicaid is that he sought $20 billion less in savings from the two programs last year, when Republicans controlled Congress, and few of those proposals were adopted.

Representative Charles B. Rangel, the New York Democrat who heads the House Ways and Means Committee, said Thursday: "There is a large area for potential compromise and agreement, but with these latest Medicare proposals, the president is just asking for controversy. He still acts as if Republicans were in complete control and Democrats had lost the election."

Mr. Bush has repeatedly said that Medicare has serious long-term financial problems, and many experts share his concern.

"If you want to balance the budget eventually and you do not want tax increases," said Joseph R. Antos, an economist at the American Enterprise Institute, "you have no choice but to propose substantial reductions in Medicare. The president's budget is an opening bid, the start of negotiations with Democrats over health care and other programs."

Taken together, Medicare and Medicaid cover more than one in four Americans. Federal spending for the two programs totaled $554 billion last year, or about 21 percent of all federal spending — a little more than Social Security. With no change in existing law, spending on the two health programs is expected to rise at a brisk pace, averaging more than 7 percent a year in the next decade.

Representative Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the senior Republican on the Ways and Means Committee, said: "The current rate of growth in Medicare, fueled by rising health costs and an aging population, is unsustainable. If Congress does not undertake sensible reforms soon, the system will be swamped as the baby boom generation begins to retire. Taxes will rise, benefits will be cut, and the entire economy will suffer."

Under the president's plan, some Medicare beneficiaries would shoulder added costs. At present, about 4 percent of the 43 million beneficiaries must pay more than the standard monthly premium — it is $93.50 this year — because they have high incomes: more than $80,000 for individuals and $160,000 for married couples. The president's budget would require more people to pay the higher premiums, but administration officials would not immediately provide details.

Most of the proposed savings, however, would come from health care providers. Mr. Bush is expected to propose freezing Medicare payments to home health agencies and reducing the inflation allowance paid to hospitals, nursing homes and other providers.

Hospitals plan to fight the president with lobbying and advertising. "Two-thirds of hospitals already lose money treating Medicare beneficiaries," said Richard J. Pollack, executive vice president of the American Hospital Association.

The president's budget also assumes that Medicare payments to doctors will be cut at least 8 percent next year, as provided under a formula in existing law.

Administration officials said Mr. Bush would not try to curb payments to private managed care plans, which currently enroll more than eight million Medicare beneficiaries. But many Democrats in Congress want to do so, because, they maintain, Medicare overpays the plans, which they see as a step toward privatizing the program.

Insurance companies are mobilizing beneficiaries to lobby against any cuts in Medicare payments to private plans. Mohit M. Ghose, a spokesman for America's Health Insurance Plans, a trade group, said, "Any cuts would take away benefits from millions of low-income people and members of minority groups, who enroll in private plans because they cannot afford the high out-of-pocket costs in the traditional Medicare program."

Budget Asks Rise in Pell Grants

The president's budget will propose raising the maximum Pell grant — the federal grant for low- and middle-income students to attend college — to $4,600, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings announced Thursday.

The announcement followed by only a day the Democratic-controlled House's passage of a $260 increase in the current maximum grant, to $4,310, under a catchall spending bill needed to address budget matters remaining from last year.

DOJ_NMG_0126239

Ms. Spellings's announcement suggests that the administration will try to emphasize access to education, an issue that Democrats have seized upon as the cost and debt burden of higher education continue to rise. Democrats have already proposed legislation in the Senate that, exceeding the administration's plan, calls for an increase to $5,100.

The last substantial increase was in 2001.

Bush's 2008 Budget Calls For Boost To Pell Grant (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

The Bush administration yesterday proposed boosting the nation's main financial aid program for low-income college students by the largest amount in more than three decades, the latest in a flurry of measures this week by Congress and the White House to make higher education more affordable.

The president's 2008 budget, which will be unveiled next week, would increase the annual Pell grant next year by $550, to a maximum of $4,600, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said yesterday. Grants, unlike student loans, do not need to be repaid.

"As costs skyrocket, it becomes increasingly difficult for middle-class families to afford college," Spelling said in a speech at North Carolina State University in Raleigh. "And for low-income, mostly minority students, college is becoming virtually unattainable. States, institutions and the federal government--we all must increase need-based aid."

Advocates for students hailed the proposed expansion of the Pell grant but cautioned that it would be meaningless if offset by cuts to other federal aid programs in the president's budget. Spellings did not say how the president would pay for the increase.

"We can't be robbing Peter to pay Pell," said Luke Swarthout, an advocate for the U.S. Public Interest Research Group's Higher Education Project. "But this is clearly a step in the right direction on college affordability."

Democratic leaders said the president's plan was a response to their recent moves in Congress to reduce the rising costs of higher education. The House voted Wednesday to increase the maximum Pell grant this year from $4,050 to $4,310; Senate Democrats have proposed raising it immediately to $5,100.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the education committee, said he welcomed the change but criticized Bush and fellow Republicans for failing to increase the Pell grant in recent years.

Pell grants, given each year to 5.3 million students with family incomes less than $40,000, have lost much of their buying power in recent years. Twenty years ago, the maximum grant covered about 60 percent of the cost of a four-year public university, but last school year it covered just one-third of that cost, according to the College Board.

Congress is also debating a host of other measures to increase college affordability. The House voted last month to cut interest rates on subsidized loans for students, and the Senate is soon expected to take up a similar measure.

Yesterday, Kennedy and Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) introduced a bill, the Student Loan Sunshine Act, which they said would "protect students and parents from exploitation by private lenders and lenders who offer gifts to colleges as a way to secure loan business."

The measure would ban schools from receiving gifts from private lending companies and require disclosure of financial relationships between higher education institutions and lenders.

Bush To Seek Record Boost To Pell Grants (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

The federal Pell Grant program, which provides college money to low-income families, would receive the largest boost in funding in more than 30 years under President Bush's 2008 budget plan to be released Monday.

Mr. Bush is proposing to raise the maximum grant level awarded by $550 next year to $4,600, the biggest one-time boost since the program was created in the mid-1970s. His proposal would increase the grants to $5,400 over five years, the largest five-year increase ever.

"Higher education costs have made it more difficult for low- and middle-income families to afford college," Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said yesterday. "States, institutions and the federal government must work together to increase need-based aid. The president's call for a Pell Grant increase will achieve this goal."

The proposal probably will meet with skepticism from some conservatives who say the government already is pouring an exorbitant amount of money into higher education.

But the government has been under pressure to help more because rising college costs are making it increasingly difficult for some to attend college. Unlike student loans, the grants do not have to be repaid.

DOJ_NMG_0126240

Democrats and some Republicans have long called for such a sizable Pell Grant increase. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy praised Mr. Bush's proposed increase but said it's only happening because Democrats are now in charge of Capitol Hill.

"This welcome development shows how a Democratic Congress is changing the nation's priorities," said the Massachusetts Democrat, who leads the Senate's education panel. "For the past five years of Republican control, Congress failed to hold the president accountable for his broken promise to increase Pell Grants."

Mr. Kennedy said he sent a letter to the administration in October, demanding a Pell Grant increase and complaining that it hadn't been increased in five years. He also pointed out his own proposal to immediately boost the maximum Pell Grant level to $5,100.

The House earlier this week approved a massive spending bill left over from last year, that also includes a boost for the maximum Pell Grant award -- by $260 to $4,310 -- which Mr. Bush's proposal exceeds.

Administration officials wouldn't say how much their Pell proposal is estimated to cost for five years, indicating that information would be available Monday when the budget is released.

About 5.2 million students receive Pell Grants each year, but the amount of each grant varies by need.

One House Republican aide said Mr. Bush's Pell proposal will probably be "embraced" by most Republicans, but that ultimately, Congress must find a way to curb the rising cost of college or no amount of financial aid will be enough.

Mrs. Spellings agrees and has been touting reforms recommended by her bipartisan Commission on the Future of Higher Education. She'll convene a summit next month to discuss the topic and said yesterday that part of reform is demanding more transparency and accountability from colleges and universities.

Bush Budget Calls For Pell Grant Boost (AP)

By Justin Pope

AP, February 2, 2007

RALEIGH, N.C. -- President Bush's 2008 budget will include a proposal for the biggest hike in Pell grants for low-income college students in three decades.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said Thursday that the budget will contain a proposed increase of $550, to a maximum award of $4,600. That would exceed the $260 increase passed Wednesday by the House.

Democrats have introduced a proposal in the Senate, currently before committee, that calls for an immediate increase to $5,100.

All told, low-income students seem likely to get their first increase in maximum Pell awards in five years. But education advocates warned that they're unsure how the increase would be funded, and caution it could come at the expense of other financial aid programs.

"If this represents an actual increase in total need-based student aid, it will be great news," said Terry Hartle, senior vice president of the American Council on Education, an umbrella group of colleges and universities. But if supplemental grant programs are cut, "it's quite possible ... individual students could be less well off."

Spellings, after announcing the proposal at an education conference at North Carolina State University, said the Pell increase would be paid for with increased revenues and "efficiencies" that she declined to specify, saying details would be released with the president's budget announcement Monday.

The grants _ which students don't have to pay back _ are the federal government's main direct financial aid program for low-income families.

But as college costs have skyrocketed, the grants' buying power has eroded sharply. Twenty years ago, maximum Pell Grants covered about 60 percent of the average published price of attending a public four-year university, according to figures compiled in a report last year by the College Board. In 2005-2006, the maximum grant covered just one-third of that cost.

Increasing Pell grants was a key recommendation of Spellings' national Commission on the Future of Higher Education.

The problem of college affordability "has become a raging fire in American higher education," Spellings said Thursday. College "has now become virtually out of reach for many American families, and that's why it's so important that we focus on Pell as the first place to go," she said.

Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy, who chairs the committee overseeing education issues, issued a statement calling the announcement a "welcome development" that "shows how a Democratic Congress is changing the nation's priorities."

Bush had proposed a $100 increase in the value of maximum Pell grants in his 2006 budget, but no increase was passed by Congress that year.

Luke Swarthout, higher education advocate at the U.S. PIRG, a public interest group, applauded the announcement but also said it's important to see how the increase will be paid for.

DOJ_NMG_0126241

"Provided that the administration is not robbing Peter to pay 'Pell,' this could be a very meaningful increase for low-income students all across the country," he said.

A Realistic Budget (1 Letter) (NYT)

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

In "The Budget Illusion" (editorial, Jan. 28), regarding the president's balanced budget proposal, you correctly focus on the need for honest budgeting and consistency.

On Monday, we will present a budget that uses realistic assumptions to reduce deficits each year and achieve balance by 2012.

The editorial specifically warns against "pie in the sky" revenue assumptions. I believe that the revenue projections provided by the career professionals at the Treasury Department will be viewed as credible, even cautious.

Your skepticism about the president's balanced budget plan is very similar to skepticism expressed in February 2004, when the president set a goal to cut the deficit in half in five years. The New York Times joined others in questioning whether this goal could be achieved without raising taxes. In fact, the goal was accomplished three years ahead of schedule, while keeping taxes low.

Through reasonable restraint on spending and continued pro-growth policies, we can achieve balance, which better prepares us for the longer term fiscal challenges posed by the unsustainable growth in entitlement spending.

In The Loop: Aide At Labor Found Budget's Weaknesses, So Democrats Don't Have To (WP)

By Al Kamen

Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Federal agencies are putting the final touches on the administration's fiscal 2008 budget, due out Monday, checking the numbers and preparing to do battle with the Democrats over priorities and programs.

So David James, an aide to Labor Secretary Elaine Chao, sent an e-mail Wednesday to various Labor and White House officials titled "DOL Budget Highlights and Low-Lights for . . . Budget Roll-Out."

One part of the e-mail highlighted "Vulnerabilities/Democrat Attacks." One budget proposal is to "consolidate and streamline" four training programs, the e-mail said, but "Democrats portray this as simply a cut on worker training" and oppose it.

Another proposal calls for "a reduction in the budget" for the Bureau of International Labor Affairs and having "other federal entities" take over the bureau's "grant-making function." "This will be attacked as neglecting international child labor programs," James's e-mail said.

The disability employment office "has had a large grant-making function" of late and should "focus on its core mission," he wrote. "This will be attacked as shortchanging the needs of the disabled."

The Mine Safety and Health Administration is getting fewer employees than were there in the Clinton administration. "(possible antagonistic question: is this agency getting the support it needs from the administration to protect miners?)"

Chief of staff Paul Conway sent a reply e-mail to James with a note: "David -- Please make certain the secretary is provided with a copy of this."

And a colleague here at The Post got a copy, too, just in case James forget to send one to Chao.

Bush Calls Cheney Optimistic, Not Delusional

Vice President Cheney has taken a pounding in the biased liberal media for touting the "enormous successes" in Iraq. He's been called "a little crazy," "crazy as a loon," "a compulsive liar" and "deranged."

But President Bush, who knows Cheney far better than his critics do, says nothing could be further from the truth. Cheney, in fact, is "a person reflecting a half-glass-full mentality," which translated into English means he sees the glass half-full, not half-empty. (See illustration at right.)

Ah, yes, that Dick Cheney, the quintessential optimist, a most cheerful fellow who's been known to wander about the White House whistling "Always Look on the Bright Side of Life."

Bush, making the media rounds in a State of the Union follow-up, also lamented the nastiness of the nation's capital. "And there is distrust in Washington," he told NPR's Juan Williams on Monday. "I am surprised, frankly, at the amount of distrust that exists in this town. And I'm sorry it's the case, and I'll work hard to try to elevate it." As Bush said in the same interview, "I'm not that good at pronouncing words."

Bush told Fox News's Neil Cavuto that, despite his dismal polls, "I'm going to sprint to the finish" in his final two years and that he has had one whale of a fun time being president.

"I've got too much on my mind to worry about, you know, standing in the polls or what life's going to be in 2009," he said. "This may come as a shock to you, but I have found this to be an exhilarating, joyous experience."

DOJ_NMG_0126242

Even though he had to give up jogging? Almost died chewing that pretzel? Got that thumpin' a couple months ago?

Nuclear Security: Don't Need It or Don't Have It

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission ruled this week that the country's 103 nuclear power plants don't need to protect themselves from possible attacks by terrorists flying airplanes into them.

That saved plant operators billions of dollars. But it probably didn't do much to make folks living near those plants feel much safer.

Meanwhile, people who live near nuclear weapons plants are finding out that those highly trained bomb-sniffing dogs the Department of Energy uses to detect explosives and to catch intruders aren't exactly up to snuff.

In fact, "half of the canine teams we observed failed the explosive detection portion of the operational evaluations," the DOE inspector general reported this week after visiting three DOE sites.

What's more, "each of the canines we observed in suspect apprehension demonstrations failed to respond to at least one of the handler's commands," the report found, and the dogs "were not receiving the minimum number of hours of weekly training for explosives detection." The IG said the DOE canine programs should be reviewed, given that "explosives are a terrorist's weapon of choice" these days.

A Florida Republican? He'll Feel Right at Home.

Good news from the 100 block of D Street SE on Capitol Hill! This storied block was once a GOP bastion and home to six Republican House members. Four lost in November; one, Porter Goss (Fla.), went to run the CIA and was bounced from there; and the sixth was another Floridian, Mark Foley.

But Republicans still appear attracted to the neighborhood. Our colleague Mary Ann Akers reports in her blog -- http://www.washingtonpost.com/sleuth-- that incoming Rep. Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.), apparently unaware of the D Street jinx, has bought former Florida GOP congressman Clay Shaw's house there, pretty much sight unseen.

Treasury and Transportation Losing Top Aides

Taking off . . . Treasury Undersecretary for International Affairs Tim Adams-- chief of staff at the agency for the first three years of the administration, policy director on the 2004 reelection campaign and in his present job since early 2005 -- is calling it quits. Too much travel -- more than a third of 2006 on the road -- and three little kids getting older every day. No departure date set yet.

Veteran GOP operative Maria Cino is leaving March 2 "after two terrific years" as deputy secretary of transportation, she announced last week in an internal memo. She said she was "pleased to have had the opportunity to be acting secretary" -- fleetingly. She is reported to be headed north to Minneapolis to manage the 2008 Republican National Convention.

Soaring War Funding Raises Concerns About Scope Of Spending (USAT)

By John Yaukey

USA Today, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — Next week, the Bush administration is expected to send Congress what could be one of the largest supplemental spending requests in history — $100 billion or more, primarily for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

It's supposed to cover basic costs, including personnel, equipment repairs and replacement, ammunition and other directly related operating expenses not covered by the Pentagon's regular annual budget for fiscal year 2007.

But military budget analysts and tax watchdogs say if the past is any indicator, the Pentagon and the Congress will try to load this off-budget shopping cart with expensive new weapons and pork for the voters that has nothing to do with defense or any of the disaster relief that emergency spending bills sometimes fund as well.

A recent memo by Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England raised red flags by recommending that the various armed services use the upcoming emergency appropriation not only to fund operating expenses in the two wars, but also to go after money for "overall efforts related to the global war on terror."

That was an invitation to a feeding frenzy, say analysts who track military spending.

"These supplemental requests are very slushy," said Chris Hellman, a defense analyst with the Center for Arms Control. "You don't have anywhere near the amount of scrutiny and oversight with these as you do with the regular budget so you can get away with a lot."

Critics of emergency spending to fund the military also say it hides the true financial costs of the wars from the public by separating them out from the regular budget.

Since 2001, the year U.S. forces invaded Afghanistan, Congress has approved $383 billion in extra military spending on top of the Pentagon's growing annual baseline budget.

Changes ahead

DOJ_NMG_0126243

The upcoming supplemental bill is intended to be the last for the Pentagon. Under pressure from Congress, the Pentagon henceforth is supposed to be calculating what its wars will cost and request the money in the annual base budget.

While budget hawks say getting rid of the military supplementals is a step in the right direction, the readjustment will make for some eye-popping dollar figures next week as the budget process gets underway. That's because the upcoming emergency funding request for the rest of fiscal 2007 will coincide with the Bush administration's 2008 budget proposal, which will include the war costs normally dealt with down the road in supplementals.

The net affect will be requests for defense spending that will total as much as three-quarters of a trillion dollars.

"You will see some whopping numbers next week — no question about it," said Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, a Washington, D.C., watchdog organization.

Lawmakers argue that major purchases such as weapons systems and new cutting-edge equipment should be requested in the annual budget because they can be tracked more closely there and cut it if necessary.

The Pentagon's annual budget request comes with hundreds of pages of explanatory notes while supplemental requests contain scant information about how the money will be spent.

One 2006 emergency request for $68 billion included five pages explaining how $33 billion in the request for military and operations and maintenance costs would be spent.

England argues that supplementals make sense because it's much easier to pay for a war periodically rather than try and project the costs two years into the future, which the regular budget process would require.

"Wars are highly dynamic and when circumstances change, we need a mechanism to handle it," he said. "Supplementals capture the reality of warfare."

Loading up

They're also a magnet for political pork once lawmakers get a hold of them during the approval process.

Once Congress got done with a 2005 emergency supplemental request, it included $24 million for maintenance of forest roads in California, $10 million for wastewater facilities in Pennsylvania, $2 million for a desalination facility in New Mexico, $2 million for a chemistry lab at Drew University in New Jersey and much more.

Sometimes, Congress and the Pentagon work together to lard these supplementals.

In an emergency request last spring, the Pentagon asked for 12 C-17 transport jets, which defense analysts said should have been paid for with the base budget.

Lawmakers not only approved the request but also bumped it up by 10 jets.

That was a boon to the community of Long Beach where 6,500 Californians are employed helping to make the jets — all thanks to a powerful senator who sits on the committee that oversees spending.

"I hope that this funding is the first step in ensuring that more C-17s will be built in the coming years," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., told her constituents in a news release.

How Democrats Work With Tight Purse (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON

After blitzing six top-priority bills through the House in their first 100 legislative hours, Democrats struck a quick deal on unfinished spending bills from the last Congress, and made it look easy.

It's the first test of whether the new majority on Capitol Hill can keep promises to voters to rein in federal budget deficits, yet also fund its party's defining priorities.

Lawmakers face tough deadlines: Money to run the government for fiscal year (FY) 2007 dries up on Feb. 15 unless Congress acts, and President Bush's budget for FY 2008 arrives at the Capitol this Monday morning. In a bid to move quickly, House Democrats precooked a master compromise with the Senate Wednesday that rolls all nine remaining spending bills into one.

The deal accepts the White House ceiling of $463.5 billion, avoiding a clash with Mr. Bush. But it carves out some $10 billion for "unmet needs," including veterans' healthcare, low-income housing, education, and some 500 research programs.

Not included were any new earmarks, or member projects, funding for a new round of military base closures, and the annual congressional pay raise. Republicans, who were not allowed to propose amendments on the Democratic bill, complained that they had been left out of the process, but more than one-quarter of the House GOP caucus voted for the bill.

"This is a process that was required by the failure of the last Congress to do its work," said House majority leader Steny Hoyer, before Wednesday's vote.

DOJ_NMG_0126244

As the 109th Congress prepared to leave town in December, Rep. David Obey (D) of Wisconsin, who now chairs the House Appropriations Committee, warned that by their "act of abdication" as the majority party, Republicans had "given up any right to criticize in any way whatever devices we have to use in order to dispose of the unfinished business of this Congress."

In Washington terms, $10 billion is not much in a spending cycle that totals more than $2 trillion. But it sends a strong signal, reinforcing what Democrats say will be a key issue in the 2008 election campaign: their commitment to help the middle class.

"It doesn't take a lot of money to get a lock on this issue. It takes some well-publicized votes," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Brunswick, N.J. "It's an indication of where their heads and their hearts are. In the arcane world of symbolic politics, they really hit pay dirt."

Their targets for new spending include: $3.6 billion for veterans' healthcare, a $260 increase to the maximum Pell grant for some 5.3 million college students, $3.5 billion for federal highways, $1.4 billion for low-income housing, as well as new funds for low-performing schools, Head Start, special education, the National Institutes of Health, law enforcement, and global HIV/AIDS prevention.

This deal combines features of an omnibus spending bill, which rolls all unfinished spending bills into one, and a continuing resolution, which funds current programs at the level of the previous fiscal year.

Another selling point for voters is a ban on new congressional earmarks, which have figured in recent corruption cases involving members of Congress. "This is an earmark-free bill," says Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D) of Illinois, who chairs the Democratic Caucus. "To get this done with 57 Republican votes, that's a big deal."

But critics note the bill does not "turn off" some 28 earmarks that were funded in FY 2006, including $185 million for agricultural research projects and $50 million provided in FY 2004 to build a rain forest in Iowa. The prairie rainforest, arguably the most controversial after Alaska's $223 million "bridge to nowhere," has until Dec. 31, 2007, to find matching funds, a prospect that critics say is not likely to happen. In all, ongoing earmarks add up to at least $70 million, according to the Republican Study Committee, which represents conservative Republicans.

Still, anti-earmark groups praise Democrats for nixing all new earmarks, at least for a year. "It's a good thing to show that the country can survive without earmarks, but there's a danger that members of Congress may lobby agencies directly to get projects funded. That's a less transparent process than we already have," says Tom Finnegan, a spokesman for the watchdog group Citizens Against Government Waste.

"I can point to project after project in my district that is gone, but they're certainly not gone in West Virginia and Nevada," says Rep. Tom Cole (R) of Oklahoma, referring to the home states of Senate appropriations committee chairman Robert Byrd and majority leader Harry Reid.

On the Senate side, Republicans say they want to amend and debate the bill. "Republicans aren't going to shut down the government, but there will need to be an opportunity for Republican views on this," says Sen. Jon Kyl (R) of Arizona. Senate Democrats aim to wrap up this bill before the Feb.15 deadline.

White House Welcomes Tougher Oversight (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, February 2, 2007

A White House management official said Thursday there is "very little real accountability" in the federal government, and he welcomed the tougher oversight the Democrats have promised now that they control Congress.

"There cannot be enough accountability in the federal government," said Clay Johnson, deputy director of the Office and Management and Budget, which supervises executive branch agencies. "There is very little today. Very little real accountability."

Yet Johnson challenged Democratic lawmakers to help solve problems — not just hold hearings about them.

Democrats now control Congress for the first time in Bush's presidency, and they are promising more investigation into matters of fraud and abuse. Key examples include spending on Iraq, homeland security and efforts to help the Gulf Coast recover from Hurricane Katrina.

Johnson, previewing Bush's management agenda for 2007, said Democrats can expect candor and cooperation. He said his agency's intention is not, as one reporter asked him, to step up its internal reviews to keep Congress at bay.

"Keeping Congress at bay suggests, 'Let's make them think that everything is just fantastic here.' They know better, and we'd be crazy to suggest that," Johnson said. "We want things to work better and it begins with an honest, candid, transparent assessment of what we know now. And out of that comes the fact that a lot of really good things are going on here."

He added that Democrats who run congressional hearings should do more than just draw public attention to problems. "Let's focus on things that aren't working like we want them to, but let's make sure we're focused on fixing them — not just identifying them," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0126245

On that front, so far so good, Johnson said.

He said he has had cooperative meetings with Sen. Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn., chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, and Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee.

The White House under Bush has taken steps to become more accountable to the public. One of them is a Web site, http://www.expectmore.gov, which singles out government programs that work well and ones that don't.

Bush has an ongoing management agenda that grades Cabinet departments on their performance in areas such as financial practices, implementing electronic government plans and competitive sourcing. Overall, scores are on the way up, Johnson said Thursday.

"The average agency today has more management capability than the best agency did five years ago," he said.

Yet this week, federal programs involving food safety, transportation spending and technology security were added to a congressional "high risk" list. That means their inefficiencies leave them vulnerable to fraud, waste and abuse.

Among those, the Homeland Security Department was criticized for not doing enough since its post 9/11 creation to coordinate work and share information among its different components. Johnson said there was no higher federal priority than improving that department.

FEDERAL DIARY: A Tale Of Mice Illustrates How To Save Money (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 2, 2007

For an example of how federal employees can make a difference, the Office of Management and Budget yesterday offered up the story of feeder mice.

When the Interior Department began looking for budget savings, the staff at the Chickasaw National Recreation Area took a look at the time and money they spent on raising mice to feed to reptiles and birds of prey at the Oklahoma refuge. They calculated that they could save $15,000 a year by buying mice from vendors, and they now have more money available for their nature trails.

This budgetary morsel is featured on a Bush administration Web site (http://www.results.gov) that has been revamped to provide information about how federal programs can be made more effective.

Clay Johnson III, deputy director for management at the OMB, called the feeder mice "my favorite example" of how a group of federal employees can be given budget data and asked to sort out spending that is essential and spending that indirectly supports an operation. In the Chickasaw case, raising mice turned out to not be all that important.

Johnson unveiled the Results Web site at a briefing. The site, originally designed to educate Bush administration political appointees on the president's priorities in federal management, is being redirected toward federal employees, congressional staff aides and groups interested in government performance, he said.

The OMB wants to focus on making strides in the effectiveness of federal programs over the next two years, after spending much of the past six years urging agencies to improve internal management techniques and practices. "The American people know we are not performing on all cylinders," Johnson said.

Federal employees are key to making programs more effective, Johnson said. He said he hopes the revamped site will attract suggestions from them on how to improve programs and on any laws or rules that should be changed because they hamper agencies.

But Johnson acknowledged that most federal employees outside the Beltway "don't get the word" about administration efforts to make programs more effective. "Their knowledge of these things is less than I would like it to be, and [outside Washington] is where 90 percent of the work is done."

With Democrats in control of Congress, it seems unlikely that presidential management initiatives will get much attention on the Hill, in part because congressional committees plan to step up oversight of government contracting and other areas deemed at "high risk" by the Government Accountability Office.

Johnson said he has met with the two chairmen of the government oversight committees, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), and told them he would welcome hearings that focus on how "to fix things."

He said Lieberman expressed interest in a comprehensive review of government, including how it is organized, and Johnson said he suggested staff consultations to weigh whether a reorganization commission should be created.

Johnson also said the OMB is paying closer attention to the GAO's list of programs that are vulnerable to waste, fraud and mismanagement. He noted that "good progress" has been made in some areas and said he would push to get them off the list in the next two years.

DOJ_NMG_0126246

Problem areas that might be able to get off the GAO risk list, he said, include the Defense Department's cumbersome process for granting security clearances, Defense's systems for supplying troops with weapons and goods, the project to upgrade the air traffic control system, the government's management of surplus property and building maintenance, the government's strategy for personnel management, and the ability of intelligence agencies to share information about terrorism.

The highest priority, Johnson said, is pulling together the Homeland Security Department, which has been wracked by financial and contracting problems and where employee morale appears low. The department, which was created from the merger of 22 agencies, has been deemed at high risk by the GAO.

Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who has an interest in federal workforce issues, has asked for a Homeland Security plan "on what they intend to do between now and January 2009," Johnson said. "It is a priority for us here to make sure the plan is good, the plan is realistically aggressive."Talk Shows

Art Gordon, president of the Federal Law Enforcement Officers Association, and Jon Adler, executive vice president, will be the guests on "FEDtalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://Federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

George M. Gray, associate administrator for research and development at the Environmental Protection Agency, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Senate OKs Higher Minimum-wage Bill (USAT)

USA Today, February 2, 2007

The Senate, by a vote of 94-3, on Thursday passed its version of legislation to increase the federal minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour. The bill includes a package of tax breaks for small businesses.

Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., raised the possibility that the Senate negotiators may agree to demands from Democrats in the House of Representatives that the tax breaks be stripped from the bill that eventually gets sent to President Bush. A House version passed last month contains no business incentives. Both versions would phase in the increase in the minimum wage over a two-year period.

Prosecutor: Videos reveal Libby's motive

At former vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby's trial Thursday, the jury was shown video clips of a White House spokesman telling reporters that Libby "had nothing to do" with leaking information about the wife of a Bush administration critic. Patrick Fitzgerald, special prosecutor in Libby's perjury and obstruction trial, argued that the tapes show Libby had a motive for lying to investigators and grand jurors when he said a reporter told him that Valerie Plame worked at the CIA. Prosecutors say it was the other way around — that Libby told reporters about Plame.

Then-White House spokesman Scott McClellan's statements "clearing" Libby, on Oct. 7 and Oct. 10, 2003, meant Libby "had to come up with another story" for how reporters learned Plame's identity, Fitzgerald said. Theodore Wells, Libby's attorney, argued the videos are "highly prejudicial" to his client because they might suggest he leaked classified information. No testimony is scheduled for today. — Richard Willing

Capitol workers raise safety concerns

Falling slabs of concrete and exposed asbestos are two reasons a federal agency should investigate passages under the U.S. Capitol complex, a group of tunnel workers said. They have asked the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health for an evaluation.

The 10 workers who raised this issue are responsible for maintaining the plumbing that provides steam and chilled water to Congress, the Library of Congress, the Supreme Court and other federal buildings. A spokeswoman for the Architect of the Capitol did not immediately return a request for comment.

Senate's Minimum-Wage Rise To Face Test In House (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Senate overwhelmingly approved a $2.10 increase in the federal minimum wage, but the business tax breaks paired with it face hurdles in the House.

On a 94-3 vote, the Senate backed the boost in pay for low-wage workers, as well as about $8 billion over 10 years in tax breaks for businesses, such as restaurants, that could be affected by the higher wage. To pay for the sweeteners -- a condition of support for many Senate Republicans -- the bill would limit the use of certain tax shelters, close loopholes and increase taxes on executive compensation.

MINIMUM WAGE DEBATE

1

See an interactive map2 examining current state minimums, average salaries and poverty rates.

DOJ_NMG_0126247

The offsets have spurred criticism from business groups, which hope to persuade lawmakers to change or drop some provisions during House-Senate negotiations. Business lobbyists may be helped by some House Democrats, who say the tax breaks are unnecessary or too large, or who take issue with some offset provisions.

The minimum-wage bill illustrates the Democrats discovering, just as Republicans did before them, that moving their agenda through the House is only a first step. While the House swiftly passed a slew of legislation as part of the Democrats'"100 Hours" agenda, many of the provisions face hurdles or slower passage in the Senate, where Democrats have a slim majority and procedural rules give more power to the minority.

Despite strong support for the minimum-wage increase, members of the House and Senate haven't laid out yet how to resolve their differences. Senators say they are confident they will be able to deal with a constitutional precedent requiring tax legislation to originate in the House, possibly by attaching the minimum-wage package to a separate, House-passed tax measure. But the question remains: How will the House and Senate work out the impasse over tax breaks?

The House passed its minimum-wage increase by a wide margin and without the tax breaks in the Senate version. Rep. Charles Rangel, the New York Democrat who is chairman of the House Ways and Means panel, has criticized the tax breaks. "I'm not authorized to pay that much money for it," Mr. Rangel said after a meeting Tuesday with Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D., Mont.) on this and other issues. Mr. Rangel said he wants to let the issue "stew" in the Senate.

After the vote yesterday, Mr. Baucus said the House and Senate would be able to "harmonize" their bills. "I'm confident that our dedication to a minimum-wage increase is stronger than any differences between our two bills," he said.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) yesterday questioned whether "we need all these business pieces of sugar" in the legislation. Rep. Richard Durbin (D., Ill.), the assistant majority leader, said a minimum-wage increase could emerge from a House-Senate conference without the tax breaks.

"If we go through the process and go through a conference and the message comes back, 'You can have the minimum wage stripped down or not at all,' then we'll face another vote," Mr. Durbin said. "We need Republicans to pass it. If they continue to oppose it, then it will not pass."

The stalemate over the minimum wage is a contrast with the swift action in the House last month during the new majority's first 100 hours in charge. House Democrats reduced restrictions on federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, strengthened House ethics rules and agreed to a pay-go requirement that new spending and tax breaks shouldn't increase the deficit. They rescinded tax breaks for oil and gas companies and required the federal government to negotiate with drug makers over prices in the Medicare health program, among other bills.

Some of the "100 Hours" items have a good chance of getting to the president's desk, though they will take time to wend their way through committees. Senate Democrats have indicated they support strengthening pay-go requirements, for example, and also want to reduce the cost of student loans. On other issues, such as fulfilling certain 9-11 Commission recommendations, the Senate may have other ideas.

On Medicare price negotiation, the Senate may take a different tack than the House. Mr. Baucus has said he supports removing from current law a prohibition on government negotiation with drug companies, while the House version requires the government to do such bargaining. It is unclear what Mr. Baucus might pursue in the Finance Committee and whether a softer approach would do anything to temper what Senate Republicans have promised will be strong opposition.

Senate Passes Wage Bill, But Obstacles Await (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — The Senate voted overwhelmingly Thursday to increase the minimum wage and give $8.3 billion in tax cuts to small businesses.

The increase in the wage, the first in 10 years, was a victory for Democrats, who had made it a key plank in their successful midterm election campaign to gain control of Congress.

But despite the huge margin of the Senate vote, 94 to 3, the increase — to $7.25 from $5.15 — must clear several hurdles before it becomes law. Democratic leaders in the Senate face their first big conflict with their counterparts in the House as the two chambers try to negotiate differences between the Senate bill and the one the House passed last month.

House Democrats promised that if they gained the majority they would pass the increase in the minimum wage, along with ethics reform and other measures, in their first 100 hours of legislating, and they succeeded.

But the House bill did not include the tax breaks. House Democratic leaders have said they want a “clean” bill that simply raises the minimum wage.

That approach failed in the Senate last week. Democratic leaders there say that they cannot get the Republican support they need without adding the tax provisions.

DOJ_NMG_0126248

That leaves it to the Democratic leader in the Senate, Harry Reid of Nevada, to negotiate with the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, and Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

The House could block consideration of the bill or strip out the tax provisions and send it back for another Senate vote.

Mr. Reid said in a meeting with reporters early Thursday that he thought the Senate might approve a clean bill if the House sent it back for another try. But his office later said that he did not believe the vote count had changed and that he expected that the differences could be worked out in negotiations.

"It's not exactly clear what road we're going to take," said Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana and chairman of the Finance Committee. But, Mr. Baucus added, "the desire to get the minimum wage passed is going to trump" any concerns or delays in negotiations.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, who has championed the bill, said it was "unrealistic" to expect that it would simply go through the House.

Still, Mr. Kennedy said: "The minimum wage is going to go up. I wish it was going to be tonight or tomorrow that we get it to the president's desk, but it is going to increase, and the only question is whether it's going to take perhaps a week or it's going to take two and a half, two weeks or so."

Senate Republicans continued to insist that the bill would not pass without tax breaks.

"No one should be mistaken," said Senator Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, the ranking Republican on the Finance Committee. "It is House Democrats, not Senate Republicans, who are delaying passage of the minimum wage."

"The easiest and quickest way to send a minimum wage bill to the president," Mr. Grassley said, "would be for the House to send the Senate a bill identical to the Senate-passed bill."

In a statement, President Bush encouraged the House to support the increase and the tax cuts, saying it would "maintain a strong and dynamic labor market" and promote "continued economic growth."

Republicans argue that Democrats agreed to similar tax breaks the last time Congress raised the minimum wage, and that they should go along with them now to offset the costs of an increase to small businesses.

"It's not a clean issue," said Senator Michael B. Enzi of Wyoming, the ranking Republican on the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. "It's a complicated issue."

Senate Ups Wage To $7.25 Over Two Years (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, February 2, 2007

The Senate voted overwhelmingly Thursday to boost the federal minimum wage by $2.10 to $7.25 an hour over two years, but packaged the increase with small business tax cuts and limits on corporate pay that could complicate its path to become law.

The increase in the minimum wage, the first in a decade, was approved 94-3, capping a nine-day debate over how to balance the wage hike with the needs of businesses that employ low-wage workers.

A top priority of Democrats, the wage hike has both real and symbolic consequences. It would be one of the first major legislative successes of the new Democratic-controlled Congress.

"Passing this wage hike represents a small but necessary step to help lift America's working poor out of the ditches of poverty and onto the road toward economic prosperity," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

Republicans stressed the importance of the bill's business tax breaks, though it was a significantly smaller tax package than Republicans had sought during previous attempts to raise the minimum wage.

"The Senate's reasonable approach recognizes that small businesses have been the steady engine of our growing economy and that they have been a source of new job creation, a source of job training," said Sen. Michael Enzi, R-Wyo., who helped manage the debate for the GOP.

The bill must now be reconciled with the House version passed Jan. 10 that contained no tax provisions. House Democrats have insisted they want a minimum wage bill with no strings attached, though some have conceded the difficulty of passing the legislation in the Senate without tax breaks.

The measure presents a challenge to Democrats who must navigate between the demands of labor and other interest groups and the realities of the Senate, where Republicans hold 49 of 100 votes. House and Senate Democrats now must try to negotiate a way out of the potential standoff.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., has said she supports some tax provisions in the House package, but said she would prefer them in a separate, House-initiated tax bill.

In a statement, President Bush encouraged House Democrats to accept the Senate version of the bill. "The Senate has taken a step toward helping maintain a strong and dynamic labor market and promoting continued economic growth," Bush said.

But AFL-CIO President John Sweeney vowed to "turn up the volume" to pass a bill without tax breaks.

DOJ_NMG_0126249

"Minimum wage workers in this country have waited far too long for a raise," Sweeney said in a statement after the vote. "It's shameful that they must now wait even longer because of the Senate's insistence on business tax giveaways."

The three senators voting against the bill were Republicans Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, Jon Kyl of Arizona and Jim DeMint of South Carolina. Absent from the vote were Democrats Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Charles Schumer of New York and Republican James Inhofe of Oklahoma.

The legislation would raise the minimum wage in three steps. It would go to $5.85 an hour upon taking effect 60 days after the president signs it into law, then to $6.55 an hour a year later, and to $7.25 an hour a year after that.

An effort by the Senate last week to end debate on the House version of the bill failed when Democrats were unable to get the 60 votes needed. But many Democrats in the House and Senate would like to challenge Republicans to vote against a clean bill with no tax provisions.

"If we go through the process ... and the message comes back: 'You can have the minimum wage stripped down or not at all,' then we'll face another vote," said Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., the assistant majority leader. "We need Republicans to pass it. If they continue to oppose it then it will not pass."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Thursday he did not believe the business incentives were necessary. "The minimum wage will be increased," he said. "The question is do we need all these business pieces of sugar or not. We will see."

A spokesman for Reid said the tax breaks are needed to overcome a potential GOP filibuster.

"Of course, Democrats would prefer to pass a clean increase in the minimum wage," said the spokesman, Jim Manley. "The fact is that Republicans have made it very clear that the only way we will pass a modest increase in the minimum wage is with tax breaks for small business."

Besides increasing the minimum wage from the current $5.15 an hour, the bill would extend for five years a tax credit for businesses that hire the disadvantaged and provide expensing and depreciation advantages to small firms. The tax breaks would be paid for by closing loopholes on offshore tax shelters, capping deferred compensation payments to corporate executives and removing the deductibility of punitive damage payments and fines.

Senators also adopted an amendment that would bar companies that hire illegal immigrants from obtaining federal contracts. That measure was designed to encourage companies to participate in an employee identification program that can weed out undocumented workers.

While the tax breaks have won the support of small business groups as well as retailers and restaurant owners, they have drawn opposition from larger businesses that would bear the brunt of the revenue provisions. Several business groups also opposed the immigration measure.

After the House passed its bill on Jan. 10, the White House issued a statement insisting that final legislation include small business tax breaks. It subsequently issued a statement supporting the Senate version, but said the revenue measures were not necessary.

According to the Labor Department, 479,000 workers earned exactly $5.15 an hour in 2005, the most recent estimate available. Most are young and unmarried and more likely to be women, minorities and part-time workers. According to the liberal Economic Policy Institute, the wage increase would affect 5.6 million people who make less than the proposed minimum of $7.25.

More than two dozen states and the District of Columbia have minimum wages higher than the federal level. The issue proved to be potent last November when six states raised their minimums in statewide votes.

Senate Adds Tax Breaks To Minimum Wage Bill (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

The Senate voted overwhelmingly yesterday to increase the federal minimum wage for the first time in nearly a decade, but added small-business tax breaks that are unacceptable to House leaders, preventing Democrats from claiming a quick victory on one of their top legislative priorities.

The Senate voted 94 to 3 in favor of the measure, which would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from $5.15 over two years.

To attract Republican support, Senate leaders agreed to extend tax credits and expand deductions for businesses that would be hit hardest by the minimum-wage increase. Those tax breaks, worth $8.3 billion over 10 years, are coupled with a proposal to raise taxes by a similar amount on corporations, their chief executives and other highly paid workers.

DOJ_NMG_0126250

Senate Republicans praised the measure as a responsible package that would help workers who earn the minimum wage and the businesses that employ them. They implored House leaders to accept the compromise and send it to President Bush, who put out a statement yesterday praising the Senate bill.

"I want to reiterate our hope that the House will not derail this bipartisan approach," said Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) "Middle-class relief is in their hands."

Democrats were less effusive. After the vote, presidential candidates Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.) lined up at a news conference with the bill's sponsor, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), and bemoaned the complications. Earlier, Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said he would prefer to pass a minimum-wage increase without "all these business pieces of sugar."

The Senate action sets the stage for potentially lengthy negotiations between the two chambers, as the new Democratic majority works through one of its first significant tests. After winning control of Congress in a campaign that emphasized middle-class anxiety and corporate greed, Democrats pushed the minimum wage to the top of their agenda, noting that it had fallen to its lowest value, when adjusted for inflation, in more than 50 years.

The House quickly approved the measure after just a few hours of debate. But the Senate took days, tacking on an amendment to ban companies that hire illegal immigrants from receiving government contracts for 10 years in addition to the tax package.

As approved by the Senate, the bill would extend several business tax deductions and credits, including one that allows small businesses to accelerate deductions for new purchases. It would extend for five years a tax credit for employers who hire welfare recipients and "high-risk youth" and expand the provision to include disabled military veterans.

To cover the costs of those provisions, the bill would close loopholes used by corporations that do business overseas and increase penalties for tax evasion. It would also place new restrictions on one of the most popular perquisites in corporate America by forbidding executives from deferring more than $1 million in pay every year and placing the money in tax-deferred accounts. Anyone who exceeded the allowable amount would be forced to pay taxes on all income deferred since Dec. 31, 2006, plus a 20 percent penalty.

House leaders have demanded that the tax measures be stripped from the bill. They argue that business needs no additional help after six years of breaks from the Bush administration and that, in any case, procedural rules require revenue bills to originate in the House.

That power is particularly important this year, because House Democrats have vowed to offset tax cuts and some spending increases with spending cuts or tax increases of equal value. Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, said he may have other plans for the $8.3 billion that the Senate would use for business tax breaks.

Yesterday, it was unclear how Democrats would proceed. Reid predicted that the differences would be worked out by a conference committee. "The minimum wage will be increased," he said.

Senate Votes To Raise Minimum Wage (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Democrats promised last year to raise the federal minimum wage for the first time in a decade if voters gave them control of Congress, but now they're holding it up in a game of chicken between the party's purists and pragmatists.

The Senate voted 94-3 Thursday to increase the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, from $5.15. The House of Representatives approved such a raise weeks earlier. The sticking point between the two versions is $8.3 billion in Republican-backed tax breaks for small businesses in the Senate version.

House liberals argue that now that they're in charge they shouldn't have to cut deals with the Republicans. Senate Democrats have said that without the tax breaks they can't pass the bill because they don't have a big enough majority to overcome Republican obstruction. And President Bush said that the tax breaks are the price of his support for raising the minimum wage.

"I strongly encourage the House to support this combined minimum-wage increase and small-business tax relief," Bush said in a statement released by the White House after the Senate vote.

AFL-CIO President John Sweeney issued a statement saying, "It's disgraceful that the Senate is still holding the minimum wage hostage to tax cuts for business. . . . In the last 10 years, the Republican-led Congress provided corporations with a whopping $276 billion in tax cuts and provided small businesses with another $36 billion in dedicated tax breaks, while America's lowest paid workers have gotten nothing. . . . It's shameful that they must now wait even longer because of the Senate's insistence on business tax giveaways."

DOJ_NMG_0126251

Yet if House and Senate Democrats don't compromise, the minimum-wage increase might die.

Even Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., the liberal icon who's long championed a minimum-wage increase, said the GOP tax package is one of the "least offensive" possible because it includes incentives for hiring minorities and disadvantaged Americans.

Raising the minimum wage would benefit an estimated 5.6 million workers directly. The annual salary for a full-time minimum-wage employee would rise from about $11,000 a year to about $15,000. Experts say 7 million more who earn slightly more than the minimum wage could benefit from a ripple effect.

The tax-break package contains several provisions. Small businesses would enjoy more liberal rules for depreciating capital improvements, including equipment. Small businesses that can file individual income taxes rather than corporate income taxes would get new breaks. And the Work Opportunity Tax Credit, which offers subsidies for hiring welfare recipients and other disadvantaged Americans, would be expanded.

Democratic leaders say they'll probably keep the legislation in the Senate until some compromise emerges. Meanwhile, minimum-wage workers will get no raise.

"We haven't resolved anything," said Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., chairman of the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee. Rangel opposes including the tax breaks as part of a minimum-wage increase.

The posturing and uncertainty are frustrating to a broad coalition of organized labor, community and religious activists, which has agitated for years for a wage increase.

But that coalition, too, is splintered over how to react.

"We are so concerned that the minimum wage be raised in support of low-wage working people and families, that although we would prefer a clean bill, we believe this (Senate) bill should be supported," said the Rev. Paul Sherry, the national coordinator of Let Justice Roll, in a telephone interview.

Soon after, Sherry called back to clarify that "we will support reluctantly the $8.3 billion tax package, but if they tack anything else on, we're in a different ballgame."

In a third call, he said he could no longer say with absolute certainty what position his coalition would take. "We haven't been able to make a decision yet," he said.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., hinted Thursday that once House and Senate Democratic leaders sit down together, they may decide to go for broke, strip the tax provisions and dare Republicans to kill the bill.

"The minimum wage will be increased," Reid said. "The question is, do we need all these business pieces of sugar or not? We will see." Asked whether he thought the "sugar" was necessary, Reid said, "No."

As long as the Democrats are fighting among themselves and delaying action on their own campaign pledge, Senate Republicans have little motivation to bargain.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, the ranking minority member of the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee, said the tax package is "peanuts" compared with provisions that President Clinton signed into law a decade ago in the last minimum-wage deal.

"And yet we're having this harangue about it," Grassley said. "Aren't we having a win-win situation in a bipartisan way?"

Senate Passes Wage Bill; House To Fight Tax Relief (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

The Senate overwhelmingly passed a bill yesterday that would raise the federal minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, but the fight for its survival has just begun.

House Democrats have threatened to invoke a parliamentary rule that would disqualify the legislation because of a Republican-sponsored provision that would provide some tax relief to small businesses. The measure aims to help employers absorb the higher payroll cost.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, is expected to delay sending the bill to the House, which passed its version last month, while the two chambers negotiate.

The talks could last weeks, said Democratic aides in both chambers.

"We've had a period of tax cuts after tax cuts after tax cuts," said Drew Hammill, spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat. "American workers are earning less, and it's long overdue that this raise happens."

Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, has demanded a "clean" minimum-wage bill identical to the House version.

Senate Democrats had balked at the tax-relief measure, but their slim majority forced them to accept it to gain Republican votes needed to pass the bill 94-3. Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Rangel now face a similar bargain.

DOJ_NMG_0126252

Ways and Means Committee spokesman Matthew Beck said Republicans were "holding hostage" the wage increase.

Congress has not increased the minimum wage since 1997, the longest stretch without a raise since a minimum wage was established in 1938 at 25 cents per hour.

"The message is the Senate of the United States listened to the people," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, who managed the bill. "That's the powerful message that is out there tonight."

He said the tax measures would help small businesses create jobs and were the "least offensive" additions to the bill.

The tax package would save small businesses $8.3 billion, a fraction of the $268 billion in tax cuts Republicans proposed for a minimum-wage bill last year.

Sen. Michael B. Enzi, Wyoming Republican and ranking member of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, called on the House not to "derail this bipartisan approach."

"Passing the Senate's bipartisan minimum wage and small business relief is good for low-skilled workers, and it is good for the middle-class working families of America," Mr. Enzi said.

Both chambers passed bills that would raise the minimum wage by $2.10 over two years, from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour.

Sen. Benjamin L. Cardin, Maryland Democrat, who spent years on the House Ways and Means Committee before elected senator in November, said the bill would pass once the House "put its stamp on it."

"I don't think they will take the tax provisions out. They might try that, but at the end of the day, I think the tax provisions are going to be in the bill," he said.

The increase would be phased in starting with a raise to $5.85 at 60 days after enactment, to $6.55 a year later and to $7.25 the next year.

How To Really Help Low-Wage Workers (WP)

By Thomas Z. Freedman

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

If the House and Senate are able to agree on a minimum-wage hike and the president signs the bill, some may say we will have done enough to help low-income workers. It's true that low-wage workers urgently need a raise, that millions of Americans work full time and still live below the poverty line. But while an increase in the minimum wage is better than nothing, alone it is an incomplete instrument for really making work pay.

We should raise the minimum wage while committing our country to a bigger bargain: If you work full time, then you and your family will live above the poverty line. This goal is not only morally right but one our country can afford.

Published statistics for 2004, the most recent year with solid available data, show that about 3.5 million full-time workers earned less than poverty-level wages. Factoring in government benefits, about 2.6 percent of full-time workers live below the poverty line. That is about 2.7 million Americans. And these struggling workers frequently support families, meaning millions more depend on them.

On its own, the minimum wage is an imperfect means for ensuring no full-time worker is poor. First, it almost certainly will not be raised enough. Even the plan to raise it to $7.25 an hour has been a political struggle, with success now likely but not guaranteed. It would take a wage of $10 an hour for a worker to earn $20,000 a year, about the poverty threshold for a family of four. Second, there are reasonable arguments that a $10 minimum wage would harm many small businesses. Finally, increases in the minimum wage are not indexed for inflation -- and may never be. The last increase was 10 years ago, and some full-time workers have fallen further below the poverty line since then. Even with a new raise, workers will once again slip into poverty if a decade or more goes by between increases.

A better approach would be to increase the wage and simultaneously expand the earned-income tax credit (EITC). This program, signed into law by President Gerald Ford and greatly expanded and popularized by President Bill Clinton, is designed specifically to reward work. It is one of the country's most successful anti-poverty programs.

The EITC program, however, has substantial shortcomings. It does not cover childless workers younger than 25, and the credit does not help meet the costs of raising additional children after a family's second child. Further, many people who are eligible don't apply for the credit. These holes have significant consequences.

How many reforms are enacted would affect the cost of the credit. Increasing the EITC for families with three or more children -- more than half of all poor children live in such families -- would help an estimated 3 million families and cost about $3 billion. Crucial actions such as improved outreach or removing a built-in marriage penalty could each be done for about $1 billion; more complete reforms that would also help those living barely above the poverty line could cost 10 times that or more. But this is the best time in a decade to make this bargain with low-wage workers. An increased minimum wage will help millions of poor people; combining it with a new commitment to the earned-income tax credit could take them the rest of the way out of poverty.

DOJ_NMG_0126253

Arguably, supporting those who are working hard and playing by the rules is as important a societal good as tax breaks for companies or even encouraging home ownership. The question ultimately is about our nation's priorities. The federal budget is more than $2 trillion, and Congress's pork-barrel projects have been estimated at $47 billion. Home mortgage deductions -- a benefit for mostly middle-class Americans -- average about $9,500 a year per homeowner. By comparison, the cap on EITC payments last year was $4,400. The average EITC benefit in 2005 was only $1,872.

The issue of whether to make such a policy change is timely with a presidential contest looming. It's not unreasonable to hope that some candidate will want the world's richest country to make a new bargain with its poorest workers. We need to raise the minimum wage. But we should also make a larger commitment. If you work hard year-round, we will make sure you are not living below the official poverty line. You may not be rich, but you'll know that in America work pays.

The writer was a senior adviser to President Bill Clinton and is a visiting fellow at the Progressive Policy Institute.

Bush Urges Stepped-Up Campaign Against Childhood Obesity (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

Washington Post, February 2, 2007

President Bush yesterday added his voice to the growing debate over childhood obesity, as he met at the White House with representatives of some of the companies considered responsible for aggravating the problem and urged them to stress the importance of healthful eating and physical fitness in their marketing campaigns.

Among those at the morning meeting in the White House Roosevelt Room were the president of McDonald's USA, purveyor of the Happy Meal; a senior executive of Kraft Foods, which sells macaroni and cheese in the shapes of popular children's characters; and the chief executive of PepsiCo., maker of soft drinks and Doritos, among other products.

"Childhood obesity is a costly problem for the country," Bush said before starting the private meeting, which also included first lady Laura Bush. "We believe it is necessary to come up with a coherent strategy to help folks all throughout our country cope with the issue."

As described by those present, the meeting was cordial and the president signaled no intent to pursue more aggressive policies favored by some consumer groups, such as banning the marketing of junk food to children or requiring more detailed nutritional labeling. Bush told the executives that it is an individual's responsibility to maintain a healthful diet, not the government's. The meeting also included executives of entertainment companies involved with marketing to children.

Peggy Conlon, president of the Advertising Council, which has been working with the government on public service campaign on childhood obesity, said the president is very interested in the efforts some of the companies have been making to offer more healthful choices to Americans. McDonald's, for instance, has been adding salads and other alternative products to its menu and giving people the option of substituting apple slices for french fries in Happy Meals.

"He was curious," Conlon said of Bush. "They talked a lot about their movement to healthier product choices."

The group also played for the president a public service announcement developed by Dreamworks and the Ad Council featuring the characters from the hit movie "Shrek" urging kids to get outside and play.

Childhood obesity has been identified by public health advocates as a serious and growing problem, with roughly 15 to 18 percent of children and teenagers considered overweight, according to government data. A 2005 report from the Institute of Medicine concluded that marketing practices from the food and beverage industry is "a direct threat to the health prospects of the next generation."

Former Food and Drug Administration commissioner David A. Kessler, who crusaded against the tobacco industry, applauded the president's initiative to discuss the issue but said: "That still leaves the question of what to do. Talking about it is a first step. It is a very large public health challenge, the consequences of which we have only begun to understand. In some ways we have all been AWOL on this issue, including this administration."

Michael Jacobson, executive director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, was more skeptical. "It is a feel-good event for a beleaguered White House, and it's great for some of the companies that have been major contributors to childhood obesity." But he added: "The government needs to put some muscle into [the campaign] and maybe step on some toes."

Bush Urges Parents To Get Kids Outdoors To Fight Childhood Obesity (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush said Thursday that childhood obesity is a costly problem for the country and puts stress on American families.

"One way for this nation to cope with the issue of obesity is to get people outside — whether it be through sports or hiking or conservation," Bush said while meeting with business leaders working to encourage exercise and healthy food choices through advertising.

DOJ_NMG_0126254

He said first lady Laura Bush was on her way to New York to kick off Friday's "Wear Red Day" for the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute's Red Dress Project to increase awareness that women are at risk for heart disease. Bush signed a proclamation making February American Heart Month.

"Mothers are the ones, a lot of times, who make choices for their children," the first lady said. "They make their choices on the foods they eat. They're the ones at home, many times, who encourage their children to exercise."

Earlier, the president and Mrs. Bush attended the 55th national prayer breakfast at a Washington hotel where he prayed for the safety of U.S. troops, saying: "During this time of war, we thank God that we are part of a nation that produces courageous men and women who volunteer to defend us."

In the Roosevelt Room, the president and Mrs. Bush met with executives from the food, beverage and entertainment industries to talk about improving healthy food offerings and encouraging physical fitness in their marketing and advertising campaigns.

More than 10 million school-age children in the United States — about 18% — are now considered overweight. The percentage of overweight children tripled among adolescents during the past 25 years, and nearly doubled for children ages 6 to 12. This increases their risk for adult heart disease and diabetes, lowers life expectancy and creates additional health care costs.

Following the meeting, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt was to work with Roger Enrico, chairman of DreamWorks Animation SKG, and Peggy Conlon, president and chief executive officer of The Advertising Council, to launch a public awareness campaign to help prevent childhood obesity. The campaign will include ads featuring characters from the Shrek animated movies encouraging children to "Be a Player" and get up and play for an hour a day.

Representatives from General Mills, Coca-Cola North America, Univision Communications Inc., Kraft Foods Inc., Kellogg Co., PepsiCo Inc., Subway Franchisee Advertising Fund Trust, McDonalds USA and Nickelodeon Television also were at the meeting.

Bush Urges Parents To Get Kids Outdoors (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

Filed at 9:50 p.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- President Bush said Thursday that childhood obesity is a costly problem for the country and puts stress on American families.

"One way for this nation to cope with the issue of obesity is to get people outside -- whether it be through sports or hiking or conservation," Bush said while meeting with business leaders working to encourage exercise and healthy food choices through advertising.

He said first lady Laura Bush was on her way to New York to kick off Friday's "Wear Red Day" for the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute's Red Dress Project to increase awareness that women are at risk for heart disease. Bush signed a proclamation making February American Heart Month.

"Mothers are the ones, a lot of times, who make choices for their children," the first lady said. "They make their choices on the foods they eat. They're the ones at home, many times, who encourage their children to exercise."

Earlier, the president and Mrs. Bush attended the 55th national prayer breakfast at a Washington hotel where he prayed for the safety of U.S. troops, saying: "During this time of war, we thank God that we are part of a nation that produces courageous men and women who volunteer to defend us."

In the Roosevelt Room, the president and Mrs. Bush met with executives from the food, beverage and entertainment industries to talk about improving healthy food offerings and encouraging physical fitness in their marketing and advertising campaigns.

More than 10 million school-age children in the United States -- about 18 percent -- are now considered overweight. The percentage of overweight children tripled among adolescents during the past 25 years, and nearly doubled for children ages 6 to 12. This increases their risk for adult heart disease and diabetes, lowers life expectancy and creates additional health care costs.

Following the meeting, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt was to work with Roger Enrico, chairman of DreamWorks Animation SKG, and Peggy Conlon, president and chief executive officer of The Advertising Council, to launch a public awareness campaign to help prevent childhood obesity. The campaign will include ads featuring characters from the Shrek animated movies encouraging children to "Be a Player" and get up and play for an hour a day.

Representatives from General Mills Inc., Coca-Cola North America, Univision Communications Inc., Kraft Foods Inc., Kellogg Co., PepsiCo Inc., Subway Franchisee Advertising Fund Trust, McDonald's USA and Nickelodeon Television also were at the meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0126255

Bush Gets Aid Of Democrats In Fighting Pandemics (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

At a time of intensifying conflict between President Bush and Democrats in Congress over the Iraq war, the Democratic-led House acted this week to rescue another of Mr. Bush's international priorities: the global fight against AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis, diseases that kill millions of Africans each year.

That Democrats stepped in to champion Mr. Bush's signature global health undertakings suggests the deepening of political support for foreign aid programs, especially those that quickly demonstrate they can save hundreds of thousands of lives. It also bucks a historical pattern of declining support for foreign assistance when control of Congress and the White House is divided between Democrats and Republicans.

"We're in a different world now," said Representative Nita M. Lowey, Democrat of New York, who heads the appropriations subcommittee that oversees foreign aid. "This is the first time since Sept. 11 we've had a power split in Washington, and there's a growing recognition among the public and policy makers that foreign assistance is critical to stability around the world."

The administration's drive for a rapid strengthening of programs to prevent and treat AIDS and malaria had been caught in limbo. The departing Republican-led Congress had failed to pass spending bills to finance most federal agencies this fiscal year, which began Oct. 1, including those that administer foreign aid.

But the new Democratic leadership agreed this week to give the administration $4.5 billion this year to combat the big three global pandemics, $500 million more than the president himself had requested and over $1 billion more than if the undertakings had been required to continue at the previous year's spending levels.

The House on Wednesday approved the global health financing as part of an omnibus budget measure. The Senate is expected to take up the bill as early as next week.

Under Mr. Bush, aid to Africa has risen to more than twice the level of any previous administration and more than triple that achieved during the Clinton administration, according to an analysis by the Center for Global Development, a nonprofit research group in Washington.

But Mr. Bush will need the Democrats to sustain the growth. And while Congress has embraced increased global health spending, it was not as generous to Mr. Bush's other foreign aid innovation: the Millennium Challenge Corporation, an agency that aims to reduce poverty through grants to well-governed developing countries. It approved continuing last year's spending level of $1.75 billion for the agency, far short of the $3 billion Mr. Bush requested for this year. Some Democrats in Congress have complained that the agency has been too slow to spend the money it has and to show results.

"The politics of aid in this country probably has shifted on push-button issues like H.I.V./AIDS," said Todd Moss, a senior fellow at the Center for Global Development. "It's the longer-term development that's much harder to do and build political backing for. Those are the things that will come under pressure in a Washington with a split government."

Still, this week's progress on global health provides a marker of how much both parties have changed since the Clinton years. Then, the Republican Senator Jesse Helms attacked foreign aid as money poured down a rathole before he had a change of heart. President Clinton, now a leading advocate for global AIDS treatment and prevention programs, failed to muster an American response commensurate with the scale of the dying, many critics say.

Now, both parties compete to claim the mantle of leadership. Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who heads the Senate appropriations subcommittee on foreign aid, said Democrats in Congress had pushed even harder in recent months than the White House for AIDS spending.

Tim Rieser, who has been the lead Democratic staff member on the same Senate subcommittee since 1995, said: "When Clinton was president, he didn't make AIDS the priority he should have. President Bush saw the opportunity and deserves credit for that. But it's not like he owns the issue. We all — Democrats and Republicans — have urged that much more be done."

Vaccine Firms Get Immunity From The U.S. (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration triggered a provision of a 2005 law that gives companies protection from product-liability lawsuits for vaccines or drugs they produce in connection with the avian-flu strain.

The law, enacted 13 months ago, gives the Secretary of Health and Human Services the power to grant immunity to vaccine makers in the event of a risk to public health. In a directive dated last week, HHS invoked that clause, "based on a credible risk that an avian influenza virus spreads and evolves into a strain capable of causing a pandemic of human influenza."

DOJ_NMG_0126256

Bill Hall, an HHS spokesman, said that the agency's declaration "allows us to remove the remaining barrier to building up our domestic capacity to manufacturers of vaccines in a flu pandemic." He denied that the move reflected heightened concern about the avian flu. Rather, he said, "It was a precautionary step."

The HHS action comes at a time when fresh cases of avian flu are cropping up in Asia, Russia, Nigeria and parts of Europe, and some in Congress are expressing renewed concern about the threat. Recently, Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa held a hearing to question senior administration officials on what they are doing to prepare for a possible pandemic in the U.S.

Some saw the HHS action as a reflection of increased concern. "This is probably the loudest pronouncement by the federal government to date that the threat of an avian flu pandemic is real," says John Clerici, a partner at McKenna Long & Aldridge in Washington, D.C., a law firm whose clients have included vaccine makers.

The U.S. has long been concerned about a shortage of vaccines, both for seasonal influenza and to combat the H5N1 bird-flu strain and other potentially lethal strains. As part of a plan to encourage development of experimental vaccines and other countermeasures against public health and bioterrorism threats, Congress passed in late 2005 a bill that provided liability protection to those vaccine makers. The measure, signed by President Bush in December 2005, was roundly criticized by trial lawyers and other critics as a giveaway to drug companies. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) demanded a generous compensation scheme for victims of potential side effects of the vaccines. But as part of the defense appropriations bill, the measure had no funds provided.

Drug Industry Faces Bitter Pill (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Congress is kicking off efforts to pass big reforms of the Food and Drug Administration, and that could produce some bitter pills for the pharmaceutical industry: potentially, tougher safety rules and provisions to reduce the cost of medicines.

Yesterday, Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Sen. Michael Enzi of Wyoming, the chairman and ranking Republican of the health committee, respectively, introduced legislation that would give the FDA new authority to impose safety requirements on medicines once they go on the market, including restrictions on consumer advertising. The bill also would require registration of clinical drug trials and their results in public databases.

Meanwhile, Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut, a Democrat, and Sen. Charles Grassley of Iowa, a Republican, on Wednesday introduced their own drug-safety bills, which would restructure the FDA to create a center to oversee the safety of drugs after they go on the market.

Proposals to beef up regulation have stalled before, often due to skepticism from Republican allies of the industry. This year is likely to be different. Democrats aren't reluctant to give expanded authority to federal regulators and see the drug industry as a tempting target because of its tenuous popularity with consumers and its traditional ties to Republicans. And they're getting support from some Republicans upset by a series of high-profile drug-safety problems, including the 2004 withdrawal of the painkiller Vioxx.

Also, lawmakers have a ready-made vehicle for the changes: legislation that must be approved this year to renew the deal under which the industry pays fees to fund much of the FDA's drug-review process. The current user-fee agreement expires later this year.

"It's pretty clear we have drug-safety problems, and it's clear we need to address those matters," says Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.), chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which has jurisdiction over the FDA. Several lawmakers say the agency's latest drug-safety initiatives, announced Tuesday, need to be bolstered with new legislation.

While these bills are now stand-alone measures, many on Capitol Hill expect that whatever safety legislation moves forward will be combined with the user-fee bill. That legislation also might end up linked to proposals to create a pathway for FDA approval of generic versions of biotech drugs -- which proponents argue would rein in the cost of such medicines -- and allow imports of medication from overseas. Both provisions are opposed by the drug industry, which is pressing for a "clean" user-fee bill.

STRONG MEDICINE

· What's New: Members of Congress propose to increase the FDA's drug-safety oversight and create a path for the agency to approve generic biotech drugs.

· The Issue: The drug industry is concerned about the effect of such legislation.

· What's Next: Proposals to change the FDA may be included in legislation authorizing fees that fund many agency operations.

DOJ_NMG_0126257

"We're concerned that it not become a Christmas tree," loaded with legislative extras, says Billy Tauzin, chief executive of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the industry's main lobbying group. But, he says, "we appreciate that the odds are that people are going to load it up."

In an effort to defuse controversial issues and lay the foundation for the user-fee bill, the pharmaceutical industry and the FDA struck a deal, unveiled a few weeks ago, that would provide the agency with $393 million in industry user fees for the next fiscal year. That is an increase of about one-third from the current year.

The pact would grant the FDA substantially more money for safety monitoring, and fund more staff to review pharmaceutical ads. That dovetails with voluntary campaigns by companies to submit their ads to the FDA and include their studies in public registries.

Mr. Tauzin says the industry "has real concerns" about what the Kennedy-Enzi bill might do, and opposes Sens. Grassley and Dodd's proposal to create an FDA drug-safety center: "Is this needed legislation, or is it going to create some new authorities that are problematic?"

If Congress doesn't pass the FDA fee legislation by late summer, it risks shutting down much of the agency's drug-regulation activity. Complicating matters, other FDA-related laws also must be renewed this year, including the fees that fund the agency's regulation of medical devices.

Mr. Dingell says he doesn't want to "bog down" the user-fee bill with procedural fights over provisions that aren't germane, but he also wants to step up drug safety. Later this month, his committee is expected to hold a hearing on drug safety that will include Sen. Grassley, an exacting FDA watchdog. Mr. Dingell calls the proposal to create a drug-safety center at the FDA an "intriguing idea," but says he wants to learn more before endorsing a plan.

Another focus for Congress: drug ads. Mr. Dingell says his reservations about such consumer advertising "have only grown with the passage of time." Democratic Rep. Frank Pallone of New Jersey, chairman of the Energy and Commerce health subcommittee, says the issue "could be part of the reauthorization" of the fee bill, but leaders will "see where there's a consensus" before deciding.

Another House Democrat, Henry Waxman of California, says he plans a drug-safety bill that will largely mirror the Kennedy-Enzi proposal. "The FDA does not have the authority it should have and that our legislation would give them," he says.

The Kennedy-Enzi bill would strengthen the FDA's oversight of drugs after they go on the market, by requiring that drugs be approved with programs to manage their risks. Those programs might be very limited, but they could also include an array of provisions the FDA doesn't currently have the explicit power to impose, including mandatory safety studies, restrictions on who can prescribe or dispense a drug, and an initial ban on consumer ads. A Kennedy staffer says that while the bill initially will be separate from user-fee legislation, "we imagine the process is one where all of these things end up being joined at some point."

The biggest concern for the biotech industry is legislation planned by Mr. Waxman, which would create a path for generic versions of biotech drugs. Sen. Hillary Clinton (D., N.Y.), a member of the health committee, plans to tie that effort to the user-fee legislation. "Linking it to [the user-fee bill] would be a good idea, because that's must-pass legislation," says another New York Democrat, Sen. Charles Schumer, who will be the generic biotech bill's lead Senate sponsor.

James Greenwood, chief executive of the Biotechnology Industry Organization, says the issue is too complex and scientifically delicate to be examined and resolved in time to link it to the user-fee legislation. "There's barely enough time to have the members of the House and the Senate understand what's in the [user-fee bill]," he says.

Lawmakers Eye Child Insurance Program (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, February 2, 2007

Congress probably will take its time in considering President Bush's plan for expanding health insurance coverage. Lawmakers, however, are moving more quickly to renew a program that now provides coverage to 6 million people, mostly children.

The State Children's Health Insurance Program expires Sept. 30. Democrats and Republicans say they want to swiftly reauthorize the program.

"There is no greater priority for the Finance Committee in the health arena this year," said Sen. Max Baucus, the committee's new chairman. "It's No. 1."

When Congress approved the program in 1997, it provided $40 billion over 10 years. States use the money, along with their own dollars, to subsidize health coverage for families with incomes too high to qualify for Medicaid but too low to afford insurance through the private sector.

Job Bedford, 13, of Baltimore, told Baucus' committee Thursday that being in the program means he can take his asthma medicine with him wherever he goes, which makes him feel safer.

DOJ_NMG_0126258

"Asthma attacks are kind of scary. They are very unpredictable and there is always the worry in the back of my mind that I might just die," he said.

Interest groups and trade associations are lobbying for a major expansion of the program as a way to reduce the ranks of the uninsured, now estimated at 46.6 million.

But some senators sought to temper expectations.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, noted the program will require Congress to find $12 billion to $15 billion over the next five years just to serve the existing population. That is above the $25 billion that Congress would spend under the current money formula.

Grassley said he has not heard any advocacy groups say how Congress should pay for expanding the program. He does not consider raising taxes an option.

"A critical part of the discussion needs to be about how we are going to pay for the existing services before we can discuss expanding services," Grassley said.

Committee Republicans said restricting the number of adults eligible to participate could allow more children to be covered.

Some states use their share of the grant money to expand insurance coverage for adults. Arizona, Wisconsin and others even cover more adults than children.

Gov. Sonny Perdue, R-Ga., told lawmakers his state will run out of federal money for its children's health insurance program by March. That would affect 273,000 children.

But even as some states struggle with shortfalls, others get enough money to cover populations that were never the intended recipients of the program, Perdue said.

Several Republicans agreed with Perdue's assessment that the program's resources should be focused on children.

"The SCHIP program is for kids," Grassley said. "The C stands for children. There is no A is SCHIP."

Overall, about 639,000 adults get health insurance through the program.

Congress recently provided $283 million to prevent states from experiencing shortfalls in health insurance funding. It also prohibited states from using their program money to provide coverage to adults without children. An exception was allowed for those states already given permission to extend coverage to adults.

But Cindy Mann, executive director of the Center for Children and Families, said removing adults from the program would not free up significant money for children.

"The adults covered through this initiative are very low income. We're talking about people who work at minimum wage or at $7 or $8 an hour," Mann said. "They don't have other options, so the ramification of dropping them would be to increase the number of uninsured people. That would be an ironic result of SCHIP reauthorization."

Baucus, D-Mont., said after the hearing that he does not want to just renew the program, but expand it.

"Were going to need more money for CHIP," he said. "And we need to move fast to find it to keep kids from losing coverage this year."

Christina Pearson, a spokeswoman for the Health and Human Services Department, said Secretary Mike Leavitt is committed to renewing the program. She declined to cite specifics on how much money the administration would seek in the president's 2008 budget proposal to be submitted to Congress on Monday.

On the House side, Democrats have said they would seek money for expanding children's insurance coverage and for improving outreach.

Senate Democrats Warn F.C.C. Of Tough New Oversight (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — Signaling tougher oversight, Democrats who recently gained control of the Senate urged the head of the Federal Communications Commission on Thursday to take a more aggressive approach to the industries he oversees.

In his first appearance before the Senate Commerce Committee under Democratic leadership, Kevin J. Martin, the agency's chairman, and the other commissioners faced sharp criticism from some senior senators on the handling of the recent acquisition of BellSouth by AT&T.

The lawmakers also questioned the commission's practice of renewing broadcast licenses of radio and television stations with virtually no review.

Their questions and comments indicated that there was no political consensus on a range of recent legislative proposals. Most telecommunications policy issues do not break cleanly along party lines. So-called Net neutrality bills have been introduced to prevent high-speed Internet companies from charging content providers for priority access, and other measures are expected that would prevent the commission from making it easier for media companies to grow larger through acquisitions.

DOJ_NMG_0126259

But the aggressive questioning by the panel's senior Democrats — including its chairman, Daniel K. Inouye of Hawaii; John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia; Byron L. Dorgan of North Dakota; and Barbara Boxer of California — suggested that the senators would be applying significant pressure on the policy-making apparatus of the commission.

That could, at the least, temper any deregulatory action that Mr. Martin and his fellow Republican commissioners have been contemplating, particularly as they prepare to consider measures that would make it easier for media conglomerates to own newspapers and television stations in the same cities.

On Thursday, Mr. Martin yielded virtually no policy ground, saying for example that the conditions that two Democratic commissioners forced the agency to impose on AT&T to gain approval of its acquisition of Bell South would not be applied to the rest of the industry. Republicans hold a 3-to-2 majority on the commission, although a Republican recusal allowed the Democrats to play a decisive role in December in the AT&T-BellSouth review.

In addition to a "Net neutrality" pledge, AT&T offered to sell certain wireless spectrum and phone lines and pledged to upgrade its telephone network so it could provide high-speed Internet service to most of its service area.

Mr. Martin also declined to consider a more rigorous license-renewal process for the stations, although he said that he might favor rules that would require the stations to disclose more information about how they fulfilled their public-interest obligations.

Sensing the new climate, Mr. Martin in his opening statement steered clear of many difficult issues, including the debate over Internet discrimination legislation, decency standards, media-ownership rules, universal service fees paid by telephone users, and agency policies on consolidation in the phone industry.

Instead, Mr. Martin presented a rosy picture of the industries he regulates, noting that telephone prices had been declining, broadband use increasing and innovation vibrant.

"I am pleased to report that the state of the communications industry is strong," he said. "As you no doubt remember, in the year 2000 the communications industry began a precipitous and far-reaching decline. Capital spending by companies followed this market decline, innovation disappeared and companies went out of business, taking jobs with them. What a difference six years make."

But the Democrats on the commission, as well as those on the Senate committee, said that a digital divide had been deepening between those who could afford, and were being offered, high-speed Internet access and other technologies, and those who could not; and that the agency's deregulatory approach had contributed to what they said were the steadily declining standards of broadcasters.

"One change of this last election," Mr. Rockefeller, the committee's second-ranking Democrat, said "is that there will be a lot more attention on the F.C.C. and what they are doing in the critical area of public oversight."

He excoriated the agency for what he said was the abandonment of "its core responsibility to the public interest" by failing to take steps to reduce sex and violence on television, and for failing to seriously review license renewals by radio and television stations.

"The process of review is so pro forma that it's known as postcard renewal," he said.

Mr. Dorgan urged Mr. Martin to begin proceedings that would give some teeth to the vaguely worded public-interest standards that the law requires the agency to apply to license renewals and mergers. He accused the agency of a "spectacular failure" in its review of media ownership rules.

And Ms. Boxer attacked the commission for what she called a "pervasive culture of secrecy" that several years ago resulted in the suppression of government reports that contradicted the agency's official line on media ownership.

Mr. Martin responded that, after learning of those reports, he had ordered the F.C.C. to search its files and make any other similar reports part of the record of the current proceedings.

Democrats Urge Tighter FCC Rules (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Senate Democrats pressed the Republican-controlled Federal Communications Commission yesterday to slap tighter controls on media ownership, public-interest broadcasting and television violence.

Several Democrats on the Senate Commerce Committee warned the agency not to try to relax limits on the number of media outlets one company can own, as the FCC did in 2003 only to have a federal court stay the action. Recent FCC policies on media ownership, said Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), have been "a spectacular failure."

DOJ_NMG_0126260

He railed against rules that allow one entity to own eight radio stations in a large city and against proposals to allow one owner to have three TV stations in a city. "More concentration means less competition," Dorgan said. "The public-interest standards have been nearly completely emasculated."

But FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, who has close ties to the Bush White House, defended the agency's policies.

"The commission has tried to make decisions based on a fundamental belief that a robust, competitive marketplace, not regulation, is ultimately the greatest protector of the public interest," Martin said. He told Dorgan, "I'm not convinced yet we need to have the kind of requirements" for local TV and radio programming that some advocates have championed.

Flexing their muscles at Congress's first oversight hearing of the FCC since taking control of the House and Senate last month, Democrats lectured and sometimes scolded FCC members, saying the agency needs more teeth in its regulation of broadcast outlets, telephones, the Internet and other services.

"The change of this last election," said Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), "is that there's going to be a lot more attention on the FCC. . . . It has abandoned its core responsibility to the public interest."

While the two-hour hearing didn't result in any mandates, it was more than a rhetorical venting, said Tamara Lipper, a spokeswoman for Martin.

"The commissioners are informed by the hearings," she said, and the lawmakers' comments "become part of the record."

As such, scores of lobbyists and interest group members filled long hallways and stairwells in the Russell Senate Office Building before crowding into an overflow room to watch the proceedings on TV monitors. The FCC's two Democratic commissioners often endorsed the senators' complaints, while their three GOP colleagues gently pushed back.

Democratic Commissioner Michael J. Copps told Dorgan that the FCC needs tougher requirements for broadcast outlets seeking license renewals and more detailed descriptions of locally produced content that would serve "the public interest."

Rockefeller called on the agency to put more pressure on cable and broadcast TV outlets to reduce the amount of televised violence. "Commercial television is in the worst state I've ever seen," he said.

Even sharper was Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who questioned whether Martin had aggressively looked into "the suppression" of two reports -- drafted by FCC staff members -- that reflected badly on the agency's media-ownership policies. "A culture of secrecy is still pervasive at the FCC," Boxer said.

Martin, whose voice never rose above a soft drawl, said he made all the documents public as soon as he learned of them last fall.

Senators Bristle At FCC Chief's Enforcement Of AT&T-BellSouth Merger (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, February 2, 2007

The chairman of the Federal Communications Commission faced tough questions from a Senate panel Thursday over his comments that he would not enforce a key condition the FCC imposed before approving of the AT&T-BellSouth merger.

At a Senate Commerce Committee hearing Thursday, Committee Chairman Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, suggested FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, a Republican, did not intend to "stand by the deal" and that he was obliged to withhold his vote and negotiate further if he had concerns about any of the conditions.

The $86 billion merger — the largest in telecom history — was approved in December by a 4-0 vote after weeks of negotiations between the commission's two Democrats and two Republicans.

The condition in question would require the combined company to slash the rates it charges competitors and big businesses to lease private, high-speed data lines in deregulated markets.

It was among a laundry list of concessions pushed by the FCC's two Democrats to win their votes, and it stands to have perhaps the biggest impact on AT&T's bottom line, costing it a projected $500 million over four years.

But in agreeing to the requirement, AT&T said it would not slash the prices it charges Verizon and Qwest, two of its largest rivals, unless the two local phone giants lower the lease rates they charge AT&T in their territories. AT&T, Verizon and Qwest all have long-distance units that serve big businesses outside their regions.

Verizon and Qwest say they will not cut their prices for AT&T.

In a statement released when the FCC approved the deal, Martin and Republican Commissioner Deborah Tate suggested they would not enforce the condition because it improperly imposed obligations on other carriers. They also said if Verizon and Qwest can't get the low rates, the concession would conflict with FCC rules that require wholesale services to be offered to all carriers on equal terms.

On Thursday, Martin told Inouye he was abiding by the deal but that while AT&T could submit tariffs, which are legal documents detailing its reduced prices, he would not approve them.

DOJ_NMG_0126261

"You're not allowed to discriminate among the different companies in terms of who you offer discounted prices to," Martin said. "Where the commission would have to take affirmative action, we said no, we would have hesitation doing that."

Democratic Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein told lawmakers he was unaware of Martin's concerns until after the vote. "It's hard for me to understand how we cannot implement something that was (voted for) unanimously," he said.

He also said FCC rules bar only unreasonable price discrimination and that offering different prices in this case would be "reasonable."

In a letter to Martin on Wednesday, Reps. John Dingell, D-Mich., and Ed Markey, D-Mass., also pressed him about his comments. He's expected to be grilled about them again at a House hearing Markey will chair on Feb. 15.

FCC Told To Focus On Public Interest (WT)

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

COX NEWS SERVICE

Senate Democrats served notice to members of the Federal Communications Commission yesterday that their top priority is protecting the public interest, not boosting corporate profits.

Under Republican leadership, the FCC has "abandoned its core responsibility" to act in the public interest, Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, West Virginia Democrat, said at a packed hearing of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee. As a result, he said, broadcasters put on news programs that are filled with "junk, sex, scandals" and other content that fails to inform the public about important issues.

Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, North Dakota Democrat, said the agency's review of media-ownership rules was a "spectacular failure" that didn't do enough to protect the public.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat, criticized FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin for what she called his agency's "culture of secrecy."

Mr. Martin, who was appointed by President Bush, defended the agency's performance.

He noted that more Americans are getting high-speed Internet access at lower costs and that "the communications industry is strong," especially compared with the late years of the Clinton administration.

"In the year 2000, the communications industry began a precipitous and far-reaching decline," he said. "What a difference six years make."

But Mr. Martin's optimistic assessment was undercut by the commission's two Democrats.

Commissioner Michael J. Copps said that while profits may be good for many in the communications industry, the public interest is not being well served. For example, broadcasters are presenting far too much "gratuitously violent programming," he said.

In addition, telecommunications companies are not doing enough to provide high-speed Internet connections for Americans living in rural areas and inner cities, he said.

Committee members also pressed Mr. Martin and fellow Republican Commissioner Deborah Taylor Tate on their willingness to vigorously enforce the conditions that allowed AT&T complete its takeover of BellSouth.

After lengthy negotiations with the commission's two Democrats, AT&T agreed in late December to a set of conditions that cleared the way for a unanimous approval of the merger on Dec. 29.

But afterward, Mr. Martin and Mrs. Tate issued a joint statement saying some of the conditions were "discriminatory and run contrary to commission policy and precedent."

Commerce committee Chairman Daniel K. Inouye, Hawaii Democrat, asked if that statement means "you won't stand by the deal that was reached."

Mr. Martin said he would enforce the conditions, but said he intended to signal that it would be illegal to force AT&T's main competitors, Verizon and Qwest, to match those wholesale rates for business Internet service.

Data Privacy Bill Expected To Target Retailers, Banks (WP)

By Brian Krebs

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Data privacy is likely to be among the hottest technology issues to face Congress this year, in part due to interest from the new chairman of the House Financial Services Committee.

Panel Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) said he plans to craft a bill that would exempt companies from disclosing data breaches, provided they secure the data with encryption software or other technology that would render it virtually unreadable if it fell into the wrong hands.

DOJ_NMG_0126262

Frank also said he wants retailers to be held more accountable for data breaches. Last month, TJX, the Massachusetts-based parent of discount retailers TJ Maxx and Marshalls, disclosed that hackers had broken into its credit card processing network, possibly exposing financial details on millions of customers.

This week, the Massachusetts Bankers Association said that some of its member banks have reported fraudulent transactions associated with the TJX data breach. Credit card issuers have contacted at least 60 banks affected by the break-in, the MBA said.

While more than 30 states have laws requiring companies to alert residents of data breaches, most of the statutes let the affected company delay notifying banks while law enforcement agencies investigate. Frank said retailers should be required to notify banks that issued the compromised credit card accounts so that financial institutions can issue customers new cards before fraud occurs.

"For too long, retailers have been immunized from having to own up when it's their mistake through contractual protection from Visa and MasterCard," he said.

Mallory Duncan, senior vice president and general counsel of the National Retail Federation, said Frank's proposal was an effort by some smaller banks to shift more of the costs of fraud to retailers. "Most of the larger banks have very sophisticated, round-the-clock fraud monitoring systems in place, but a lot of the smaller institutions don't have those systems," he said.

There have been more than 100 million instances in which Americans have had their personal data compromised due to data breaches or mishaps, according to the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a consumer group in San Diego.

The data breach bill that got the most support from industry and consumer groups last year -- offered by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) -- would require any organization holding personal data to notify consumers upon learning of a data breach. She has revised the bill, and it was among the first to be reintroduced this year.

The measure would preempt many tougher state laws and contains fairly broad exemptions, including not requiring entities to disclose a breach if a risk assessment concludes there is "no significant risk that the breach has resulted or will result in harm" to consumers.

While some major corporations -- most recently Microsoft -- have expressed support for some kind of federal consumer privacy law to govern how companies can use, combine and trade consumer data, the effort to produce baseline privacy protections for consumers may set off contentious policy debates, said Fred von Lohmann, a senior staff attorney with the Electronic Frontier Foundation.

"The question with this issue -- as with others -- becomes, is this an area where dueling interest groups will make it difficult for Congress to come to an effective solution, or is it something that's moving so fast that anything Congress is likely to do will end up obsolete a year or two from now?" he said.

Consumer groups also expect corporate- and government-backed data mining practices to receive scrutiny from Congress, in part because the Senate Judiciary Committee is headed by Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), known for his staunch advocacy on consumer privacy matters.

The Bush administration has come under heavy fire from privacy advocates for its data mining initiatives and for pressuring Internet service providers to dramatically extend the length of time that they retain records of their customers' online activities.

Sanchez Quits Hispanic Caucus (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Congressional Hispanic Caucus was thrown into turmoil Thursday after Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Santa Ana) resigned her membership amid accusations that its chairman, Rep. Joe Baca (D-Rialto), had been demeaning to women.

Two of the remaining five women in the 21-member caucus expressed concerns about how the group treated them, but did not resign.

Rep. Hilda L. Solis (D-El Monte) complained about the "lack of respect afforded to women members of the Hispanic Caucus."

And Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Lakewood) stood by her sister and fellow congresswoman, saying: "I am waiting to see whether the Hispanic Caucus leadership will make good on its promise to be more fair and inclusive of Latina members."

"Latinas are the fastest-growing segment of the minority population," the Lakewood congresswoman said. "And their perspective deserves to be represented, not denigrated."

On Wednesday, Loretta Sanchez told the Politico, a new Capitol Hill newspaper, that Baca had called her a "whore." She has not responded to requests for an interview since then.

Baca denied the charges Thursday, saying, "These accusations are categorically untrue."

DOJ_NMG_0126263

The Orange County congresswoman's resignation comes after six caucus members last year cut their ties to the group's political action committee after it made campaign contributions to relatives of caucus members — including Baca's sons Joe Jr. and Jeremy, who ran unsuccessfully for state Senate and Assembly respectively.

"At a time when the public is crying out for a more ethical government, we should be taking every step to avoid any appearance of preferential treatment for relatives," Solis said in a statement Thursday.

Some female caucus members also complained earlier this year that Baca's election as chairman was not conducted by secret ballot as required.

In her resignation announcement Wednesday, Sanchez cited her concern about the election as her only reason. "I and other members of the caucus voiced our strong opposition to Mr. Baca's chairmanship due to a violation of election rules," she said.

Baca dismissed these complaints Thursday, noting: "These issues have been discussed, reported, and laid to rest."

Sanchez told the Politico that she heard Baca had made the demeaning remark about her to California Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez.

But at a news conference Thursday in Sacramento, Nuñez said, "I have no recollection of any conversation with anybody about a dispute between Congressman Baca and Congresswoman Sanchez."

He added that he would "rather not be dragged into the mud" of a congressional fight.

Sanchez also told the Politico that when the caucus had approached her earlier this year to pay her contribution to support the caucus staff, she asked to be removed from the list of members.

"There's a big rift here," she told the newspaper. Using a vulgarity to describe how Baca treated women, she concluded, "I have no use for him."

Baca, in a statement Wednesday, called Sanchez's resignation "unfortunate." But in his statement Thursday, he implicitly criticized her, saying: "This 'controversy' is of the most disrespectful nature to our constituents and to our colleagues in the House because it is based on untruths."

A congressional staffer, who was not authorized to speak on the matter and requested anonymity, said that some of the male members of the caucus were often disrespectful of the women — talking, laughing or making jokes while they were trying to speak at caucus meetings.

"This is a serious rift; it's bad for the community," the aide said. "If other women follow her lead, it looks bad for CHC. They let internal bickering override what they can do as a key bloc in Congress."

Breaking News: Two More Reps. Complain About Treatment Of Women In Hispanic Caucus (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, February 2, 2007

A day after Rep. Loretta Sanchez resigned from the Hispanic Caucus charging its chairman had called her a “whore,’’ a pair of Democratic congresswomen from California spoke out in support of Sanchez’s sweeping complaints that chairman Joe Baca did not respect the women in the caucus.

In an increasingly bitter spat dividing the 21-member caucus, Sanchez also had charged that her follow California Democrat, Baca, had treated the women in the group “like shit.”

On Thursday, the two other California congresswomen bolstered Sanchez’s remarks.

Rep. Hilda L. Solis said she shared “Sanchez's sentiment about the lack of respect afforded to women members of the Hispanic Caucus.’’ And Loretta Sanchez’s sister, Rep. Linda Sanchez, said she supported her sibling’s decision to resign in protest of Baca’s alleged remark, which he has “categorically’’ denied.

On Thursday, Baca repeated his denial to Fox News, saying there was no rift within the caucus.

“There is none, absolutely none,’’ Baca said. “Everybody is working together."

In her statement Thursday, Linda Sanchez said she was “waiting to see if the Hispanic Caucus leadership will make good on its promise to be more fair and inclusive of its Latina members.’’

“Latinas are the fastest growing segment of the minority population,’’ she added, “and their perspective deserves to be represented, not denigrated."

If the Hispanic Caucus "is to be truly representative of the Latino community," Solis said, “it must give equal treatment to all its members, regardless of gender or seniority.”

Solis also reiterated concerns about the political arm of the caucus, BOLDPAC, which came under fire last year after Baca and his allies authorized political contributions to their relatives. Solis, the Sanchez sisters and three other lawmakers then withdrew from BOLDPAC.

DOJ_NMG_0126264

“At a time when the public is crying out for a more ethical government,’’ Solis said, “we should be taking every step to avoid any appearance of preferential treatment for relatives.”

In an interview with The Politico Wednesday, Loretta Sanchez also cited concerns about whether Baca was properly elected Hispanic Caucus chairman in November and about his general attitude toward female lawmakers.

“I'm not going to be a part of the CHC as long as Mr. Baca illegally holds the chair … I told them no. There's a big rift here," Sanchez said. "You treat the women like shit. I have no use for him."

In a statement Wednesday, Baca said Sanchez "has decided to resign from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus…and has chosen to air baseless statements.’’

“Let me be clear,’’ he declared, “her comments are categorically untrue."

The last time lawmakers withdrew from the Hispanic caucus was in the late 1990s when its Republican members left over partisan differences.

Sanchez said she had rebuffed an approach earlier this year to contribute funds from her office budget to support the caucus’ shared staff, a requirement for all its members.

"I told them to take me off the list, take me off the Web site, take me off everything," Sanchez said.

She said she was surprised and insulted when she learned that Baca had made the disparaging personal comment about her to California Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez and other legislators last year.

Nunez "is a friend of mine. Did he think he wouldn't tell me?" Sanchez asked.

On Thursday, a spokesman for Nunez said the state speaker would have no comment on the flap. But Nunez said at a news conference in California that he did not recall the comment.

"I'm not going to confirm that," he said, according to a posting on the Los Angeles Times blog, Political Muscle. "I have no recollection of being at" a meeting where "anything disrespectful" was said of a Hispanic caucus member.

"Somebody is going to have to refresh my memory,’’ Nunez said. “I have no recollection."

Sanchez voted against Baca in the Hispanic Caucus election for chairman in November. Four other female lawmakers abstained from the vote, raising concerns about whether the election followed proper procedures.

The Sanchez withdrawal is another blow to Baca and his allies who have been trying to bring the caucus back together after a series of internal spats last year. Many of the more junior members and the women have butted heads with him and senior lawmakers.

In recent weeks, Rep. Xavier Becerra, Calif., a caucus member who serves in House leadership as assistant to Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., had been trying to persuade the six members to rejoin the political action committee, which is known as the Committee for Hispanic Causes/Building Our Leadership Diversity.

Four female lawmakers have written Baca asking that the caucus repeat his election as chairman because the earlier vote failed to use secret ballots, as required in the group's bylaws.

Sanchez and other female CHC members have repeatedly complained that Baca and some of his male colleagues do not accord them a high level of respect.

"There is a big rift. Hello? Do they not get this?" Sanchez said.

Join The Conversation (read all 21 comments)

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by WorriedInPA on 02.02.2007 at 12:39 AM

How can I get on Loretta Sanchez' Xmas mailing list?

by sequoia on 02.01.2007 at 08:48 PM

RE: Cela & OC_Voter messages: Sanchez' poor taste in Christmas cards.

I have to laugh, my mother gets those borderline porn-like cards from Loretta Sanchez' office. The one sent out a couple of years back with her in a skin tight leather micro mini perched on top of a desk, again with a cat (Py?) in the picture, was disgusting. You can actually see right up her skirt, she was wearing black underwear, or maybe not? .... pulling a Brittany? The holiday greeting was also in poor taste. Loretta Sanchez, what can you say about her but what Baca said to Nunez about her. She is no class act, that's for sure. Loretta Sanchez has the reputation she has earned.

by Hughie on 02.01.2007 at 07:49 PM

Who the hell cares what Baca called Sanchez ? This Baca rep could have called her an m' f' ing ho-bag-piece- 'o crap and she can do NOTHING about such a slur. Why? She's not in the private sector and the offending representative, like her, is immune to such harassment laws. So, Sanchez baby, it's your bed, you made it, now sleep in it and shut your pie hole.

by theduke on 02.01.2007 at 07:28 PM

It saddens me to see subterranean actions and reactions by people; where is our self-respect and our cultural teaching?gone? We as Americans (Hispanic) have forgotten how hard our fights have been fought by our American heritage. We now war over Nada! For God Shakes, let?s not forget the nature of politics and what it means to be head of politics and the vitriol associated with-it. What I see is: females banding together in the hopes of finding strength in numbers and the refocus in destroying their own party from with-in. I am a Republication, but have no joy in seeing people engulfed with jingoistic and hubris behavior, not to mention the weakness it displays: dissension and trifle engagement?Si being called a ?Puta? is not the nicest of names, but I am sure this name is compassionate opposed to the political strategy employed to gain office?We are quailing over dirty dresses. I am shamed by my hermanos y hermanas whom have forgotten the political gains granted to use by those who have fought for our political causes?it is sickening to see our gains marginalized by name calling and the inability to recognize obtuseness. Stop all this, antes de usted deshonra todos nosotros!

Hispanic Caucus Members Toil Over Insult (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, February 2, 2007

Three female members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus accused the organization's male leaders Thursday of treating women unfairly. Rep. Loretta Sanchez said the caucus chairman called her a "whore."

Rep. Joe Baca denied uttering the insult, which Sanchez cited among grievances that led her to announce this week she was quitting the group.

"Let me be clear: Her comments are categorically untrue," said Baca, who like Sanchez is a California Democrat.

"He said it. For him to deny it is just a silly thing," Sanchez said in an interview.

She and Rep. Hilda Solis, D-Calif., said Baca made the comment at an event in Sacramento, Calif., over the summer and that it was repeated to them by people they declined to identify.

"Name-calling never helps anything," said Sanchez, adding she confronted Baca about the comment. "He just shook for awhile and then he said, 'That's a lie.'"

The controversy, which became public with a report Wednesday on the Web site politico.com about the "whore" comment, was the latest evidence of conflict between men in the growing caucus and a smaller, mostly female contingent.

Baca was supported by only one of six women in the 21-member caucus when he was elected chairman in November. Solis, Loretta Sanchez and her sister, Linda, and Rep. Nydia Velazquez of New York subsequently disputed the election procedure and asked for a new secret-ballot vote. All caucus members are Democrats.

Other concerns include Baca's decision to use money from the caucus' political action committee to fund his sons' unsuccessful campaigns for state office in California last year. That led Solis, the Sanchez sisters and three other lawmakers to sever ties with the fundraising groups.

There also is a perception among female caucus members that their concerns are given short shrift in a caucus that — like the Congress as a whole — remains overwhelmingly male, despite high profile advances by women in Congress.

"I think there tends to be the sentiment that there has to be more work done to improve relationships in the caucus and the treatment of women in the caucus," Solis said in an interview.

"I am waiting to see if the Hispanic Caucus leadership will make good on its promise to be more fair and inclusive of its Latina members," said Linda Sanchez, whose district is near her older sister's in Southern California.

Better Security For Judges (NYT)

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

One of the more refreshing changes in Congress's mind-set growing out of the November election is that the House is no longer led by Republicans who demonize judges for sport. This change to more judge-friendly leadership should, at long last, lead to the House's joining the Senate in passing a much-needed bill to protect federal judges from physical attack.

The need for strong security measures for judges should be self-evident. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, federal judges have played a very visible role in the trials of suspected terrorists. Many of the most serious threats they face, though, are domestic. This was tragically underscored two years ago by the murder of the husband and mother of Judge Joan Lefkow of Chicago by a man upset with her ruling in a malpractice lawsuit. After those killings, Congress passed a law that, among other things, paid for home security systems for judges. More still needs to be done.

The Court Security and Improvement Act of 2007 includes new criminal penalties for misusing personal information to threaten serious harm to judges or their families, and increased sanctions for retaliating against witnesses. It allocates more resources to the United States marshals, who are charged with protecting federal judges. And it requires the marshals' director to consult with the Judicial Conference of the United States so judges have a greater voice in their own security.

DOJ_NMG_0126266

In the last Congress, a similar bill was passed by the Senate, but House leaders blocked it. With the Democrats now in control, the current bipartisan bill — which has the support of the Democratic chairmen and the ranking Republican members of the Judiciary Committees in both the House and the Senate — should pass easily.

One of the best ways Democratic and Republican leaders can set a new tone in Washington is by jettisoning the heated anti-judge posturing and replacing it with sensible measures to protect the safety of the federal judiciary.

OTHER NEWS:

Bush, Dems Have Different Economic Views (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, February 2, 2007

The booming economy that President Bush paints is a far cry from the worrisome one increasingly portrayed by Democratic presidential candidates and party leaders. To them, there are worker insecurities, stagnant wage growth and soaring costs for health care and college.

The vision of rival economies already is a main issue for the 2008 presidential and congressional races. Economists say both sides are right — and wrong. It just depends on what numbers you summon.

Bush is trying to nudge the national focus away from Iraq and is offering a rosy picture of the economy ahead of his presentation Monday of a financial blueprint he says will lead to a balanced budget by 2012.

Congressional Democrats have embraced the same timetable. The course the rival camps chart to get there is bound to be the domestic-policy battle royal of the current congressional session.

"Workers are making more money. Their paychecks are going further. Consumers are confident. Investors are optimistic," Bush said in a speech Wednesday at Federal Hall on Wall Street. It was his second on the economy in as many days.

"I'm not surprised that some of the good economic news is overshadowed by the difficult news out of Iraq," Bush told Fox News later Wednesday.

The president credits his first-term tax cuts for much of the upbeat news, ignoring the $10 billion-a-month drain on the government's balance sheets from the unpopular war in Iraq and military actions in Afghanistan and elsewhere to fight terrorism.

Bolstering Bush's outlook was a new Commerce Department report showing that the economy gained speed in the final three months of 2006. The economy grew at an annual rate of 3.5 percent, much faster than the 2 percent increase of the previous three months.

Stocks soared after that report and after the Federal Reserve's decision to leave interest rates steady.

But hold on.

Here comes this from Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, reprising the "two Americas" rich-poor divide he depicted in 2004 as a presidential and vice presidential candidate: "We cannot stand by and watch 37 million people wake up and not know how to feed and clothe their children."

Other Democratic presidential hopefuls are echoing the theme.

Also, freshman Sen. James Webb, D-Va., built on it when he gave his party's response to Bush's State of the Union address last month. "It's almost as if we are living in two different countries," Webb said.

To William Galston, a domestic policy adviser in the Clinton administration who now is the Brookings Institution, "We have the president's story of the economic aggregates and we have Jim Webb's story of economic anxiety and inequality.

"That tale of two economies will be argued out, not only between the parties but within the parties," he said.

The Democratic contenders are not shy about weighing in.

"There's something wrong when you have more bankruptcies in America last year than college graduates," Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York said in Iowa.

A 2008 rival, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, said, "Our economy is changing rapidly, and that means profound changes for working people." He cited "skyrocketing health care bills," lost pensions and struggles to pay for college.

The cutback in building has led to thousands of layoffs in the construction industry, Democrats note.

Such observations conflict with the glowing picture Bush and his aides present of a vibrant economy humming along at near-full employment.

"They've both got a point, and they're both trying to make their case" said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com.

DOJ_NMG_0126267

"The president is right. The economy in aggregate is performing very well. So he's right to claim that the economy, looking from above, looks very good," Zandi said. "Democrats are also right. The fruits of this strong economy have largely accrued to higher income wealthier households."

The multifaceted state of the economy was reflected in a mixed bag of government economic reports issued Thursday.

The Commerce Department reported that people spent more than they made last year, resulting in a negative 1 percent personal savings rate — the lowest since the Great Depression. Meanwhile, the Labor Department reported a 20,000 drop in claims by newly laid off workers for unemployment benefits, a sign of a healthy labor market.

David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's in New York, said that "any rational way you look at this, the economy is doing pretty decently. You've got a 4.5 percent unemployment rate, productivity growth is solid. And inflation is by historical standards pretty reasonable."

Still, Wyss said, "We've got a couple of big problems out there, and some long-term imbalances. The top 20 percent is doing fairly well and the bottom 20 percent is doing better. If there's a hole, it's in the middle, which frankly are those old blue-collar jobs that the Democrats say are leaving the country. And they're right."

The president's approval on handling the economy was at 43 percent in early January's AP-Ipsos poll, up from December and higher than his overall job approval of 36 percent. The economy, along with Iraq, terrorism and health care are all seen as important issues by the public.

The White House and Democrats battled with dueling economic "fact sheets."

The Democratic headlines: worst job recovery on record; manufacturing jobs continue to disappear at historical levels; share of national income going to wages and salaries see record lows; household income declined by nearly $1,300 under Bush.

On the White House list: The economy has created more than 7.2 million jobs since August 2003; the unemployment rate was 4.5 percent in December; real wages rose 1.7 percent during 2006; real after-tax personal income per person has increased over $2,800 — or 9.6 percent — during this administration.

The president did concede a point to Democratic rhetoric on Wednesday.

After Webb emphasized the growing and yawning gulf between salaries of chief executive officers and rank-and-file workers in his Jan. 23 Democratic response, Bush took aim at lavish salaries and bonuses for corporate executives. Corporate boards should "step up to their responsibilities" and tie compensation packages to performance, he said in his Wall Street speech.

Job Market Was A Key To Fed's Call (WSJ)

By Jon Hilsenrath

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Lots of investors expected interest-rate cuts early this year. But one part of the economy refused to cooperate: the job market.

Economic output seemed to slow in mid-2006, but the job market remained healthy. Government surveys of businesses showed jobs grew at a respectable clip of around 150,000 a month. Surveys of households showed they grew even faster. The unemployment rate fell to 4.5% in December from 4.9% in December 2005. And the performance was all the more remarkable because the labor force grew faster than it had in six years, meaning more to employ.

This matters to the folks who dictate short-term interest-rate levels at the Federal Reserve. Recessions are always accompanied by job-market weakness. A healthy job market means the Fed has less reason to goose the economy with lower rates. It also has a big impact on the Fed's inflation call. Fed officials want as much as anybody to see Americans fully employed. But a falling unemployment rate can signal reduced job-market slack, which could lead to wage pressure and inflation, something Fed officials don't want.

A debate is bubbling at the Fed now about how to read the job market, something San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen has spoken about. If output has slowed but employment remains robust, it could mean businesses are getting less out of workers. It also could mean output numbers understated the economy's strength.

Either way, the bottom line is simple. Economists expect the Labor Department to report today that payrolls grew another 167,000 in January and the unemployment rate remained 4.5%. Warm January weather will muddy the numbers, as will annual data revisions, which should also point up. But as long as the job market looks this strong, the Fed has little incentive to alter its inclination to push rates higher still.

Where Big is Better: Why Oil Shares Stay High

Investors who bet that Big Oil would get whiplashed by slumping oil prices have been whipped themselves.

Oil prices have dropped 26% since they hit $77.03 a barrel on July 14, hitting the bottom line of large oil companies. But their shares haven't followed suit. Exxon Mobil's profits slowed from a record run in the final months of 2006, falling 4.3% in the fourth quarter from a year earlier. Still its shares have gained 16% since oil peaked. Shares of Chevron, which reports earnings today, are up 12%. Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expect Chevron to report a 7% drop in fourth-quarter earnings per share today.

DOJ_NMG_0126268

Why the disconnect? Oil companies are relatively cheap. Energy companies in the S&P 500 trade at 9.8 times their projected 2007 earnings per share, compared with about 15 for the entire index. Moreover, the companies are flush with cash they can use to support their shares. Exxon's dividends and share buybacks surged 41% in 2006 to $32.6 billion.

Not all oil companies have fared well, suggesting the advance of the supermajors is also a flight to quality. Shares of smaller oil producers such as Occidental Petroleum and Murphy Oil have taken their lumps since oil prices peaked. Sometimes big is better.

Fed's Inflation Dilemma (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials, in debating whether to adopt an explicit target for inflation, have discussed whether an implicit, or "soft" target, might be preferable.

The continuing debate reflects Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke's belief that the central bank needs to develop a clearer, more systematic way of communicating its intentions to the public, to lessen the chance of any market-jolting surprises.

Currently, the Fed's official aim is to achieve "price stability," but it doesn't specify what rate or range of inflation it thinks would fulfill that goal.

Mr. Bernanke has long favored setting an explicit inflation target, an increasingly common practice among foreign central banks. Many of those banks strive to keep inflation at or near 2%.

Proponents of this approach say that adopting an explicit inflation target for the U.S. would reassure Americans, discouraging self-fulfilling inflationary expectations if, for example, the economy overheated or energy prices jumped. It also would give financial markets a better indication of the Fed's likely response to shifting economic conditions.

At Mr. Bernake's behest, the Fed's policy-making Federal Open Market Committee has been studying possible changes in how it communicates its forecasts, statements and meeting minutes. While the 19-member panel has also considered adopting an inflation target, Fed officials emphasize that such a move is far from certain.

Among the drawbacks to an explicit target is potential resistance on Capitol Hill, and internal discord over what, if any, number should be picked. That has prompted Fed officials to take a look at an implicit target, which would communicate the Fed's preferred inflation rate without having the force of an official goal.

Fed officials say one form of implicit targeting would be to extend the horizon of the Fed's economic forecasts beyond the current two years, with the inflation forecast for the last year of the period representing the Fed's implicit target. Another would be to poll all 19 FOMC members on their personal definition of price stability and publish the resulting range, rather than forcing them to agree on a single number or range.

But officials have significant misgivings about both approaches, primarily because they sacrifice clarity and accountability, the very benefits that targets are meant to achieve.

The Federal Reserve Act defines the Fed's goals as both price stability and maximum employment. Mr. Bernanke has long argued that a target is consistent with that "dual mandate." He argues that a target stabilizes the public's expectations of inflation, which enables the Fed to lower interest rates during a slump with less fear of setting off a run-up in prices.

But some Fed officials fear that argument is too subtle for many in Congress, who might contend that an inflation target elevates price stability's importance over that of employment. Barney Frank, the new Democratic chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, opposes an inflation target, while acknowledging that the FOMC has the authority to adopt one.

"There is a little bit of concern that the mandate doesn't extend to picking any particular number," said Ken Kuttner, an economist at Oberlin College in Ohio who wrote about inflation targets while on the staff of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. "There would naturally be people saying, 'Hey, I'm reading your mandate here guys, give us your [target] number for full employment.' And nobody wants to do that. A lot of the gains from ambiguity have to do with finessing that kind of situation."

Another drawback of an explicit target is the continued disagreement within the Fed over both the wisdom of adopting one, and over what the number should be if one were adopted.

One way to minimize both problems would be for the FOMC, rather than announcing a target, to lengthen its current semiannual forecast -- a range of forecasts by individual FOMC members -- to three or four years from the current two. Because that would ordinarily be long enough for the Fed's interest-rate actions to achieve any inflation rate the central bank desired, the fourth-year forecast could be construed as a target without being called one.

DOJ_NMG_0126269

A shortcoming of this approach is that if a big shock, such as a jump in energy prices, drove inflation up sharply, it could take more than four years to get it back to the target, unless the Fed was willing to drive unemployment sharply higher. Another is that the forecast would include unemployment, and Congress might see that as an implicit target for which the Fed should be held accountable.

Another approach would be to poll all FOMC members on what constituted price stability, and to publish the results. The Bank of Japan adopted a similar approach last year and announced that its nine policy board members' views ranged from zero to 2% inflation.

But officials say that despite the appeal of the approaches, both are flawed and thus may not be much better than the status quo. If the FOMC claims its target is only a forecast, it would be less accountable for missing it, and that means the public, and investors, would be less likely to incorporate it into their own behavior.

The polling approach suffers from the fact the target could change every year with the composition and inclination of the FOMC's members. Without agreement on a single target, policy makers could respond differently to the same inflation picture.

Dow, Russell 2000 Close At New Highs As Economic Data Bolster Confidence (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 1 -- Stocks climbed for the third straight day Thursday as an already buoyant Wall Street embraced robust consumer spending figures and largely overcame disappointment over Google's earnings report. Both the Dow Jones industrial average and the Russell 2000 index of smaller companies closed at new highs.

The Dow advanced 51.99, or 0.41 percent, to 12,673.68. That marks the blue-chip average's 27th record close since October. It came in well above the record of 12,621.77 set Jan. 24. A new trading high of 12,682.57 topped a day-old record of 12,657.02.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 7.70, or 0.54 percent, to 1445.94, and the Nasdaq composite index was up 4.45, or 0.18 percent, at 2468.38.

The Russell 2000 rose 7.43, or 0.93 percent, to 807.77. The index first broke the 800 mark Wednesday.

The gains followed Wall Street's best day of the year on Wednesday, when it advanced sharply after the Federal Reserve signaled that the economy remained solid and that inflation was mostly in check. The central bank's comments, which followed its decision to leave short-term interest rates unchanged, injected a bit of confidence into an uncertain market.

Economic data continued to play a big role in trading, as it has all week. As expected, consumer spending in December showed its biggest increase in five months, rising 0.7 percent.

The Labor Department reported the number of newly laid off workers seeking unemployment benefits fell by 20,000 last week, to 307,000.Movers

Google fell $19.75, to $481.75. Though it posted a sharp increase in profit, investors accustomed to outsized gains were not wowed.

Exxon rose 98 cents, to $75.08, after announcing a 2006 profit of $39.5 billion, the largest ever for a U.S. company.

Archer Daniels Midland rose $3.47, to $35.47, after it said profit jumped 20 percent.

Comcast fell $1.43, to $42.92, after its fourth-quarter profit came up short of Wall Street's forecast.

Boeing reached a record high of $92.24 before closing up $1.49, at $91.05, after reporting strong results Wednesday.

Dow Rises 51.99 To A Record On Exxon Mobil's Results (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose for a fourth straight day, hitting a new record, aided by strong earnings from Exxon Mobil.

The Dow climbed 51.99 points, or 0.4%, to 12673.68, its 27th record finish since October. So far this year, the Dow is up 1.7%.

Shares of Exxon Mobil, a Dow component, gained 1.3% after the energy giant announced that fourth-quarter net income fell 4.3% from a year earlier but still beat analysts' expectations. For all of 2006, Exxon Mobil posted the biggest annual profit in U.S. history, $39.5 billion, up 9.3% from 2005.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rallied 0.5%, or 7.70 points, to 1445.94, up 1.9% on the year. The technology-stock-led Nasdaq Composite Index edged up 0.2%, or 4.45 points, to 2468.38, up 2.2% on the year.

Economic data were mixed, which reinforced many investors' impression of a relatively benign slowdown in U.S. economic growth. Many investing pros have been saying lately that conflicting data allow them to rule out two dire, but very different, scenarios: inflation and recession.

DOJ_NMG_0126270

"A lot of people are thinking we're back to a Goldilocks economy," neither too hot nor too cold, said strategist Mark Keller, of A.G. Edwards & Sons.

Mr. Keller said his firm expects the U.S. economy to grow about 2.2% this year. That's a modest pace in historic terms, but still enough to sustain growth in corporate profits, which in turn should help the stock market.

The Commerce Department reported its measure of prices for consumer goods, excluding volatile food and energy, rose 0.1% in December, up 2.2% from a year earlier.

Most analysts believe the Federal Reserve views this index of personal consumption expenditures as a key inflation indicator, with annual growth above 2% less than ideal.

The higher December reading normally might signal risk of a Fed interest-rate increase. Luckily for stock investors, fresh manufacturing data signaled just the opposite.

The Institute for Supply Management's manufacturing index, a broad measure of activity in the sector, fell to 49.3 in January, contrary to economists' expectation for a reading of 52. Any reading below 50 signals contraction in the manufacturing sector.

In energy trading, crude-oil futures contracts for March delivery slid 84 cents, or 1.4%, to $57.30 a barrel, off 6.1% so far this year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1. Total trading volume for stocks on the NYSE was 2.89 billion shares; 2,454 issues rose and 889 fell.

Bond prices fell2. The 10-year note slipped 3/32 point, or 93.75 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.837%.

The dollar strengthened3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 120.71 yen, compared with 120.67 yen. The euro fell to $1.3020, compared with $1.3034.

Manufacturing Activity Drops (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Dogged by excess inventory, the nation's manufacturers cut back production in January, suggesting the sector will continue to weigh on economic growth a while longer.

The Institute for Supply Management, a trade group representing corporate purchasing managers, said yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity fell to 49.3 last month from 51.4 in December.

Figures below 50 indicate a contraction; for the past four months the index has averaged 50.5. The recent readings have pointed to a stagnating manufacturing sector that continues to be held back by weakness in the housing and automobile industries.

The slowdown follows a four-year growth spurt in the manufacturing sector. Consumers began to scale back their purchases of homes and American-made cars last year, but many manufacturers have been slow to recognize the need to reduce inventories, according to Norbert Ore, who oversees the ISM survey.

Fear of a Surge

"Everybody's afraid to pull the trigger and cut inventories because they're afraid there will be another surge, and they'll be caught short," said Mr. Ore, who is also Georgia-Pacific Corp.'s procurement director. He said the manufacturing sector will remain sluggish over the next few months as businesses draw down their stockpiles of unsold goods.

Meantime, large inventories continued to take a toll on manufacturers' results. Late Wednesday, Pulte Homes Inc., Bloomfield Hills, Mich., reported a fourth-quarter loss, with the home builder citing an inventory charge and a high cancellation rate as contributing factors. Volterra Semiconductor Corp., Fremont, Calif., warned its first-quarter revenue would fall from fourth-quarter levels because of a customer's excess inventory.

Last month, however, there were signs manufacturers were getting serious about reducing inventories. The ISM reading on inventories plunged to 39.9 in January from 48.5 in December. Mr. Ore said it was the biggest monthly drop in more than 20 years. Readings on new orders and production also fell. The employment index in the sector remained in negative territory, and the measure of prices paid rose.

Beyond the soft manufacturing sector, though, the economy still is growing, thanks in large part to a strong labor market that is supporting consumer spending. More evidence of this came in a separate Commerce Department report that showed personal income rose 0.5% in December, following a 0.3% gain in November. Spending climbed 0.7% in December, following a 0.5% gain the previous month.

American consumers showed a willingness to spend beyond their immediate means, as the nation's savings rate -- or personal savings as a percentage of after-tax income -- fell to negative 1.2% in December from negative 1.0% in November.

DOJ_NMG_0126271

Many Take On Debt

Economists often warn that consumers should save more, particularly with baby boomers approaching retirement, but many remain willing to take on credit-card debt or tap investment gains. The savings rate for all of 2006 was negative 1.0%, the lowest annual rate since 1933.

The index of personal-consumption expenditures, excluding food and energy -- the Federal Reserve's preferred inflation measure -- rose 0.1% in December, suggesting price gains continue to moderate, and the Fed will leave interest rates steady for now.

The National Association of Realtors said pending home sales rose 4.9% in December after four straight months of declines in another sign of stabilization.

Separately, the Labor Department said 307,000 people filed initial claims for unemployment benefits last week, down 20,000 from the week before and indicative of solid job creation.

US Manufacturing 'on Brink Of Recession' (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, February 2, 2007

The US manufacturing sector contracted unexpectedly this month as factory activity fell to its slowest pace in nearly three years, according to a fresh survey.

The Institute for Supply Management said its manufacturing index fell into negative territory in January as it slipped below the 50 mark to 49.3.

The poor performance underlined economists' fears that the sector could be sliding into recession.

Industry leaders have been predicting a recovery this year after a weak performance in recent months. But a fall in new orders in January suggests further weakness ahead, economists said.

Richard Iley, an economist at BNP Paribas, said: "The ISM manufacturing index was weaker than expected and dovetails with our assessment that the manufacturing sector is really very weak and on the brink of recession."

Investors largely shrugged off the poor factory performance as US stock markets touched new highs, sustaining a rally that began this week after the Federal Reserve expressed increasing confidence in the economy.

Investors were encouraged by separate data released on Thursday that showed personal incomes rose 0.5 per cent last month.

The gain adds to recent increases in Americans' disposable income, which has lifted consumer spending and was the main driver of economic growth of 3.5 per cent in the fourth quarter.

The government figures also showed inflation pressures remained "moderate", according to Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at JPMorgan.

The core price index rose 0.1 per cent, following an unchanged reading in November and a 0.2 per cent rise in October.

Some Lawmakers Shun Big Game Pass (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

ETHICS RULES HAVE fewer lawmakers doing the Super Bowl shuffle.

Most lawmakers from Illinois and Indiana, fearing adverse publicity and new rules, shun Bears-Colts clash in Miami. Politicians and aides can accept tickets from corporations for face-value price, but Chicago-area Reps. Emanuel and Kirk opt to remain home.

"Folks are real wary," a Democratic aide says. A senior Republican strategist predicts new rules will eventually escalate stadium contacts between politicians and donors, since lawmakers can visit skyboxes free for fund-raising events.

Miami Democratic Rep. Meek's fund-raiser, $5,000 a head, includes game tickets.

DEMOCRATS ALLIED with auto makers shift trade debate to Japan.

While most manufacturers blast China for keeping the yuan weak against the dollar, Rep. Dingell of Michigan presses Treasury on yen values. Japan has kept currency weak "to gain an advantage with the U.S. market," the Energy and Commerce chairman writes Paulson.

Though the yen has weakened against the dollar, Treasury Secretary sees no evidence Japanese officials are trying to soften the currency; he notes absence of intervention in foreign-exchange markets since 2004. It is weak, Paulson says, because of Japanese economic problems.

ADMINISTRATION FACES skeptics at home and abroad about farm-subsidy cuts.

Agriculture Secretary Johanns travels to push administration proposal in Mississippi, Iowa, California and Tennessee. Trade expert Susan Sechler praises plan for allowing U.S. to resume Doha trade talks "with a straight face."

DOJ_NMG_0126272

"The question really becomes....how far the U.S. will go," adds former Agriculture Secretary and trade representative Yeutter. Much further, says European Union, demanding "more ambitious cuts." But the White House plan squeezes 2008 Republican presidential candidates seeking Iowa support.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Romney is noncommittal and keeping "an open mind," a spokesman says.

NEW BOSSES? Former Democratic congressional aides form lobby group with connections to Baucus of Montana and Rangel of New York, now presiding over Senate and House tax-writing committees. Their firm, Capitol Counsel, including five Democratic alumni of tax panels, will give corporations "the best opportunity to present their case," says principal John Raffaelli.

NEW EXPERTISE: Reshuffle of House appropriations panel, creating financial services subcommittee, elevates lawmaker from the Bronx to chairmanship with clout over SEC and issues affecting Wall Street. "I'm looking forward to ringing the bell" on the New York Stock Exchange," says Rep. Serrano, a native of Puerto Rico.

ENVIRONMENTALISTS press Bush administration to back ban on trade in mercury at global diplomatic gathering in Nairobi next week. EU seeks to stop sale of the toxic pollutant, and Democratic presidential hopeful Obama has raised the subject. State Department says it is still mulling the issue.

BEAR MARKET: Fund raising for Bush's party slows after elections, complicating efforts to retire House Republicans' $14.4 million debt. Senate Republican committee -- criticized within the party for lackluster campaign -- has $1.3 million debt. Republican National Committee ends 2006 with $3.1 million cash, compared with Democrats' $3.7 million.

BUSH'S BUDGET faces push-back from Congress.

Some lawmakers fear State Department's plan for $86 million to help Palestinian Authority security forces could aid Israel's enemies. Lt. Gen. Keith Dayton, top U.S. adviser to Palestinian military, assures congressional staffers of safeguards; money wouldn't go for guns or lethal assistance.

Lobbyists expect Bush to propose a five-year reduction in Medicare spending of $65 billion to $70 billion. That includes reducing the premium Medicare pays for drugs administered by physicians to 4% above the sales price, from 6%.

Pharmaceutical cuts are expected to draw opposition from oncologists, since cancer drugs often are administered by doctors.

MINOR MEMOS: Costly Christmas: Ex-House Majority Leader DeLay, facing Texas money-laundering charges, spent $454,000 on legal fees in final two months of 2006....New White House executive pastry chef William Yosses, as co-author of "Desserts for Dummies," included chapter called "A Real Cake Walk."

Sharpton Takes Biden To Task On Remarks (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, February 2, 2007

Civil rights activist Al Sharpton on Thursday took Sen. Joe Biden to task for calling Democratic rival Sen. Barack Obama "articulate" and "clean," questioning how the description reflects on other blacks.

Biden, still trying to deal with the fallout from his remarks, spoke by telephone on Sharpton's radio show. The Delaware lawmaker spent his first day as an official presidential candidate Wednesday explaining his statement that Obama is "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean."

Biden told Sharpton he regretted the comments and said he hadn't meant to disparage other blacks who had run for president in the past, including Sharpton, Jesse Jackson and the late New York Rep. Shirley Chisholm, who sought the Democratic presidential nomination in 1972.

But Sharpton told Biden: "A lot of people took it from you that because (Obama) is Harvard-trained, that people don't see someone as good and clean unless they are less connected to the struggle of the African-American community."

Sharpton also compared the gaffe to former Virginia Sen. George Allen's use of a racial slur against an Indian-American man last summer — a controversy that was widely believed to have cost Allen re-election.

"George Allen got 'macaca' — this might be a step past that," Sharpton warned.

Biden responded by lavishing praise on Sharpton, saying he and Jackson were the most articulate people in the country.

"I have overwhelming respect for what you did. I have an overwhelming respect for what Jesse did, and what Shirley Chisholm did," Biden told Sharpton. "I didn't know anyone tougher or straighter than Shirley Chisholm. I worked with her, I knew her."

The two men agreed that the best way for Biden to make up for his remarks was to stress issues of concern to the black community in his campaign, such as poverty eradication and speeding up the rebuilding of storm-ravaged New Orleans.

Sharpton, who ran a long-shot but spirited campaign for the Democratic nomination in 2004, is considering running again this time. He met last week in Washington with Biden and several other candidates, including Obama, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Sen. Chris Dodd, to determine whether they would sufficiently commit to urban issues.

DOJ_NMG_0126273

Biden's interview was reminiscent of Sen. Trent Lott's 2002 appearance on Black Entertainment Television, where he apologized for praising Sen. Strom Thurmond, who ran for president in 1948 as a segregationist. Lott subsequently stepped down from Senate leadership.

An Inarticulate Kickoff (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

What is it, exactly, that white people mean when they call a black person "articulate"?

I'll leave it to Joe Biden to explain (or figure out) why he used "clean" as one of a logorrheic string of adjectives describing his Senate colleague Barack Obama. I'm not sure his initial revision and extension of his remarks -- that he meant "clean as a whistle" -- get him off the hook. Just a suggestion, but Biden might fall back to "clean as the Board of Health," meaning sharply dressed; the last time I saw Obama he was, indeed, wearing an impeccable navy suit.

For anyone who missed it, Biden explained Obama's appeal as a presidential candidate by calling him "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy." He was talking to a reporter for the New York Observer, who recorded the interview; an audio clip was soon posted on the Internet.

There was a sharp reaction, mostly focused on Biden's incomprehensible reference to personal hygiene. The Rev. Al Sharpton, a one-time presidential candidate, said that when Biden called him to apologize, " I told him I take a bath every day."

For my part, I never made it past "articulate," a word that's like fingernails on a blackboard to my ear. As it happens, President Bush used that same word Wednesday to describe Obama. "He's an attractive guy. He's articulate," Bush told Fox News.

Will wonders never cease? Here we have a man who graduated from Columbia University, who was president of the Harvard Law Review, who serves in the U.S. Senate and is the author of two best-selling books, who's a leading contender for the Democratic presidential nomination, and what do you know, he turns out to be articulate. Stop the presses.

It's interesting that Obama's reaction dealt solely with the A-word. "I didn't take Senator Biden's comments personally, but obviously they were historically inaccurate," he said in a statement. "African-American presidential candidates like Jesse Jackson, Shirley Chisholm, Carol Moseley Braun and Al Sharpton gave a voice to many important issues through their campaigns, and no one would call them inarticulate."

Maybe he heard the screech on the blackboard, too.

Yes, I'm ranting a bit. But before you accuse me of being hypersensitive, try to think of the last time you heard a white public figure described as articulate. Acclaimed white orators such as Bill Clinton and John Edwards are more often described as eloquent.

What's intriguing is that Jackson and Sharpton are praised as eloquent, too -- both men are captivating speakers who calibrate their words with great precision. But neither is often described as, quote, articulate. Apparently, something disqualifies them.

Condi Rice is another story. Regular readers know that I think this administration's foreign policy is wrongheaded and dangerous. But I leap to Rice's defense when I hear people say, in the most patronizing tone, that she's soooooo articulate. What on earth do they expect? The woman has served as provost of Stanford University, national security adviser and secretary of state. Think maybe she ought to be able to speak in complete sentences?

I realize the word is intended as a compliment, but it's being used to connote a lot more than the ability to express one's thoughts clearly. It's being used to say more, even, than "here's a black person who speaks standard English without a trace of Ebonics."

The word articulate is being used to encompass not just speech but a whole range of cultural cues -- dress, bearing, education, golf handicap. It's being used to describe a black person around whom white people can be comfortable, a black person who not only speaks white America's language but is fluent in its body language as well.

And the word is often pronounced with an air of surprise, as if it's an improbable and wondrous thing that a black person has somehow cracked the code. I can't help but think of the famous quote from Samuel Johnson: "Sir, a woman preaching is like a dog's walking on his hind legs. It is not done well; but you are surprised to find it done at all."

Articulate is really a shorthand way of describing a black person who isn't too black -- or, rather, who comports with white America's notion of how a black person should come across.

Whatever the intention, expressing one's astonishment that such individuals exist is no compliment. Just come out and say it: Gee, he doesn't sound black at all.

So Far, Obama Can't Take Black Vote For Granted (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0126274

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — He is hailed by his supporters as the hope of an increasingly multicultural nation, a political phenomenon who can wow white voters while carrying the aspirations of African-Americans all the way to the White House.

So why are some black voters so uneasy about Senator Barack Obama?

The black author and essayist Debra J. Dickerson recently declared that "Obama isn't black" in an American racial context. Some polls suggest that Mr. Obama trails one of his rivals for the Democratic nomination, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, in the battle for African-American support.

And at the Shepherd Park Barber Shop here, where the hair clippers hummed and the television blared, Calvin Lanier summed up the simmering ambivalence. Mr. Lanier pointed to Mr. Obama's heritage — he is the American-born son of a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas — and the fact that he did not embody the experiences of most African-Americans whose ancestors endured slavery, segregation and the bitter struggle for civil rights.

"When you think of a president, you think of an American," said Mr. Lanier, a 58-year-old barber who is still considering whether to support Mr. Obama. "We've been taught that a president should come from right here, born, raised, bred, fed in America. To go outside and bring somebody in from another nationality, now that doesn't feel right to some people."

On Wednesday, the question of race took center stage in the presidential campaign because of remarks that Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, made about Mr. Obama. Mr. Biden characterized Mr. Obama as "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy" and then spent the day — his first as an official presidential candidate, explaining and apologizing for his remarks.

But among many blacks, the awkward and painful debate about race, immigrant heritage and the presidency has been bubbling for months.

Mr. Obama certainly has prominent black supporters and many shake their heads with exasperation at such talk about a man they see as the first African-American with a real shot at the presidency.

His supporters say his background only enhances his appeal as someone who has addressed the concerns of black Americans as a community organizer in Chicago, a state legislator in Illinois and a senator in Washington.

"He has a track record for being concerned about people who are poor, and it seems to be genuine," said Carol M. Swain, a black professor of political science at Vanderbilt University who has written about black politics. "Not only do I think that black Americans will embrace Barack Obama, but I think they will do it with enthusiasm."

Indeed, many pollsters and analysts believe Mr. Obama's life story of growing up in Hawaii and Indonesia with his mother and his maternal grandparents and of his struggle to define his own racial identity will resonate with voters across ethnic and color lines.

But while many whites embrace Mr. Obama's melting pot background, it remains profoundly unsettling for some blacks who argue that he is distant from the struggles and cultural identities of most black Americans. The black columnist Stanley Crouch has said, "When black Americans refer to Obama as 'one of us,' I do not know what they are talking about."

Ms. Dickerson echoed that sentiment.

"I've got nothing but love for the brother, but we don't have anything in common," said Ms. Dickerson, who wrote recently about Mr. Obama in Salon, the online magazine. "His father was African. His mother was a white woman. He grew up with white grandparents.

"Now, I'm willing to adopt him," Ms. Dickerson continued. "He married black. He acts black. But there's a lot of distance between black Africans and African-Americans."

Mr. Obama's strategists are keenly aware of the gap and are trying to address it. On Martin Luther King's Birthday, he spoke at a scholarship breakfast alongside the Rev. Jesse Jackson. Mr. Jackson introduced him by saying, a "new president is in the house."

Mr. Obama and his wife, Michelle, who is an African-American, were also on the February cover of Ebony.

Mr. Jackson and the Rev. Al Sharpton, both former black presidential candidates, have declined to formally endorse Mr. Obama so far.

But Julian Bond, the chairman of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, has described him as "tremendously appealing." Several black Democrats in Congress, including Representatives John Lewis, the civil rights pioneer from Georgia; Jesse L. Jackson Jr. of Illinois, the son of Jesse Jackson, and Artur Davis of Alabama, have supported his presidential bid.

His supporters, who note that he carried the black vote in his Senate race, say they are unperturbed by a recent Washington Post-ABC News poll that found that 20 percent of black voters surveyed supported Mr. Obama while 60 percent supported Ms. Clinton. The survey had a margin of sampling error of plus or minus nine percentage points.

DOJ_NMG_0126275

Emil Jones Jr., the president of the Illinois state senate and one of Mr. Obama's early mentors, says he is frustrated by black voters who question Mr. Obama's Kenyan heritage. As a state legislator, Mr. Obama had the support of voters in his district, which is 67 percent black.

"He doesn't share the same kind of background as most African-Americans, but he's addressed those issues that related to underprivileged communities throughout Illinois," said Mr. Jones, who is black.

Mr. Obama describes himself as an African-American, and as a young man, he has said, he yearned to be accepted by black Americans.

Mr. Obama declined to be interviewed, but in his memoir, published in 1995, he acknowledged being dogged by "the constant, crippling fear that I didn't belong somehow, that unless I dodged and hid and pretended to be something I wasn't, I would forever remain an outsider, with the rest of the world, black and white, always standing in judgment."

Still, Mr. Biden's remarks this week only heightened concerns among some blacks who believe that Mr. Obama, as the son of a black Kenyan, is more politically palatable to white voters because he is viewed as less confrontational and less focused on redress for past racial injustices than many black Americans descended from slaves. In that context, he resembles the last black man deemed to be a powerful presidential contender, Colin L. Powell, who flirted with a White House bid in 1995.

Discussing his appeal to white voters at the time, Mr. Powell, the light-skinned son of Jamaican parents, noted that he spoke English well and was not confrontational. He concluded by saying, "I ain't that black."

Philip Kasinitz, a sociologist at the City University Graduate Center, said such a description might as easily apply to Mr. Obama. "He's identifiably black, but in many ways he's outside of normal race relations," said Mr. Kasinitz, who has studied black immigrants in New York City politics. "He's a black politician for whom whites don't have to feel guilty."

Ronald Walters, who advised Mr. Jackson's presidential campaigns, said Mr. Obama's campaign "evokes something which is very much in vogue, this notion of diversity that is not rooted in a compensatory concept."

"He's going to have to win over some African-Americans," said Mr. Walters, who is black and heads the African-American Leadership Institute at the University of Maryland. "They have a right to be somewhat suspicious of people who come into the country and don't share their experience."

In the 1990s, the number of blacks with recent roots in sub-Saharan Africa nearly tripled while the number of blacks with origins in the Caribbean grew by more than 60 percent, according to the State University of New York at Albany. By 2000, foreign-born blacks constituted 30 percent of the blacks in New York City and 28 percent of the blacks in Boston, according to demographers at Queens College.

Several leaders of the civil rights era had immigrant roots, including Stokely Carmichael, who was born in Trinidad; and Shirley Chisholm, the former presidential candidate and the first black woman to be elected to Congress. Her father was born in Guyana and her mother in Barbados.

Donna Brazile, who ran Al Gore's presidential campaign, said she believed that Mr. Obama could woo black voters.

"Barack will tell us that we don't have to go back to being just a white America or a black America, that we can now become something else, together," said Ms. Brazile, who is unaffiliated with any presidential candidate.

"That's the promise of his campaign," she said, "and his challenge."

Clinton Setting A $1 Million Goal For Donors (NYT)

By Patrick Healy And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is establishing record-setting goals for presidential campaign fund-raising, her advisers say, asking donors to raise at least $1 million for the honor of being in her top echelon of supporters.

That million-dollar benchmark is 10 times the amount that President Bush's "Pioneers" were expected to raise in his 2000 race; at that time, the Pioneers' $100,000 goal was considered sizable.

Clinton advisers said the new fund-raising levels, laid out in meetings of finance team members this week, would help achieve their goal of raising $75 million in 2007. At least $15 million is expected from New York, Mrs. Clinton's home base, the advisers said.

Precise fund-raising goals and numbers of donors are not yet known by the campaign, with the major meeting of the finance team planned for next Wednesday.

Several Clinton fund-raisers said in interviews that they expected dozens of donors to reach the tier of $500,000 — in part because of the star power at their disposal. The campaign has lined up surrogates for Mrs. Clinton at Democratic fund-raisers around the country; among them are former President Bill Clinton and a senior campaign adviser, Ann Lewis.

"It will be almost impossible for any other candidate to raise the money that the Clintons can raise," said John Catsimatidis, a New York fund-raiser for Mrs. Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0126276

The names for each category are under discussion, advisers said, but designations like “Hillraisers” and “Pathfinders” have been proposed.

On Wednesday, a leading Clinton supporter in New York, Alan Patricof, convened a meeting of about 15 donors with Mrs. Clinton’s finance director, Jonathan Mantz. Attendees described it as a “talk to the troops” session, with fund-raising dates being worked out. A major New York gala is tentatively set for March 18.

Other Democratic candidates are also moving to post significant fund-raising numbers for the first quarter of 2007, which ends March 31. Former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina has scheduled 24 fund-raisers over 19 days in February.

As a lawyer, too, he is reaching out to fellow trial lawyers — as he did when he ran for president in 2004.

“Fund-raising has been a lot easier than we thought it would be,” said Jennifer Palmieri, an Edwards spokeswoman. She predicted that he would raise more than $7.4 million in this quarter — more than he took in during the first quarter of 2003.

“We fully expect that Hillary and Obama will raise more — her a lot more, and him certainly more,” she added.

Howard Wolfson, a spokesman for the Clinton campaign, responded: “No one plays the expectations game better than the Edwards team. For two years, they have been telling their extensive network of donors to hold off giving him money so they could collect at least $20 million in the first filing period. And Senator Obama might well double that. They will have all they need.”

Senator Barack Obama of Illinois has not yet established fund-raising tiers, though he has said he will not raise money or accept bundled contributions from registered federal lobbyists.

He accepted about $125,000 from lobbyists last year. He has no plans to return that money, a spokesman said, nor does he plan to transfer money from his 2006 federal Senate account to his presidential explor atory committee account.

Advisers say the Clinton campaign has no plans to adopt a similar prohibition on money from lobbyists.

McCain, Giuliani Skipping Some Conservative Events (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, February 2, 2007

A speech given by former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney before a National Review-sponsored conference last week may have been panned as unfocused, but in the eyes of those who attended, he at least had one thing going for him: He showed up.

Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, both of whom face serious skepticism from many conservatives, skipped the National Review event, and neither plans to attend a gathering of the Republican Study Committee, a group of conservative House members, this weekend in Baltimore.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling of Texas, the RSC chairman, is "looking forward to hearing Mitt Romney and believes that the RSC retreat offers a unique opportunity for some of the top minds in the conservative movement to come together to strategize, discuss and be heard," said Brad Dayspring, a spokesman for the group.

Romney, who is aggressively seeking the favor of conservative leaders, is on the schedule to address the RSC on Friday. In March, he is scheduled to speak at the Club for Growth's winter conference in Florida and to appear before the annual Conservative Political Action Conference in Washington.

David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union and one of the chief organizers of CPAC, said his group hadn't heard back yet from either McCain or Giuliani about whether they'll be at the three-day meeting, which starts March 1. "I frankly don't get it," Keene shrugged in an interview Wednesday. "On the one hand," he said, McCain has been "trying to court the right, but on the other, he seems to be dissing them."

Keene, who has not picked a candidate, readily admits that he has his differences with the maverick senator, but suggested that McCain has pluses that would resonate before a conservative audience, notably his hawkish stance on government spending and the Iraq war.

Asked to explain why they would pass on an opportunity to make their case before such influential audiences, members of McCain's camp said they don't have as much to prove.

"It's important to keep in mind that the senator has served as a conservative for over 20 years in Congress," said campaign spokesman Danny Diaz. "These people know him, they know his pro-life record, his fiscal conservatism, his stance on the war on terror. The same can't be said for others in the race."

When McCain cannot attend an event, he has sent surrogates, Diaz said. Conservative activist Bob Heckman was at the National Review conference, and former Sen. Phil Gramm is standing in for him at the RSC meeting in Baltimore. As for the CPAC gathering in March, Diaz said a decision would be made in the "coming days and weeks."

Giuliani's team excuses his absence from National Review and RSC by pointing out that he is speaking to conservative audiences in places that will have considerable sway in deciding the next nominee. The former mayor was in New Hampshire last weekend addressing the Republican convention, said Giuliani spokeswoman Katie Levinson. "This weekend he's down in South Carolina at the invitation of the state party." He'll also speak to the state party's executive committee.

DOJ_NMG_0126277

Reaching out to Republicans across the board is important to Giuliani, she said, and is something he'll continue to do aggressively.

A decision has not been made on if Giuliani will attend CPAC, but he plans to speak before the board of the conservative Hoover Institution when it meets for a conference next month in Washington.

As with McCain, ACU's Keene predicts Giuliani would get a decent reaction should he also make it to CPAC in part because he's a celebrity of sorts. "Many conservatives admire his performance in NYC on crime, taxes and after 9/11," he said.

To Romney's camp, there is truth to Woody Allen's maxim about the importance of just showing up.

"As the old saying goes, a true friend is the person who walks into the room when all the others get up and walk out," quipped Kevin Madden, a spokesman for the former governor. "As a conservative Republican who wants to lead our party to victory and champion our ideals, Governor Romney prefers to reach out to these important groups as opposed to ignoring them."

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by edofarrell on 02.01.2007 at 03:13 PM

Bush has been the worst president we've ever had in this country. In 2000 or 2004 we could have (and actually did in 200) elected better people to the White House. Now, with six years of corruption, ineptitude, lying and plain stupidity the Republicans still want to whine. You had your chance to make all the changes you could ever have wanted to make with control of the House, the Senate and the WH. Instead you were corrupt, ran up a huge deficit and got us involved in another Vietnam. Take your medicine boys, it's only going to get worse as the truth starts to filter out of the congressional hearins now underway.

by Kearney on 02.01.2007 at 01:26 PM

As far as deficits, we're in a WAR. We've never fought a war without running them, and frankly we'd be foolish if we ever did. We didn't ask for this war (not even Iraq, contrary to myth), but since we're in it, we'd better be serious about funding it. I agree with your implicit criticism that Bush hasn't cut government enough, and believe especially that a lot of spending and agencies should be eliminated as a war economy measure, but that's not Bush's style and never was.

As for "taxing health plans", Bush's proposal is the most profoundly free-market reform idea for health care in decades. It seeks to cut the tie between employment and health insurance, and give individuals a huge tax CUT if they buy their own health insurance. Nobody gets their auto insurance or homeowner's insurance through their employer; why health insurance? Because during World War 2, government freezes on salary levels (mistakenly thought to be an effective inflation-fighting mechanism) caused employers, desperate to attract talent in an extremely tight job market (with 11 million men in uniform), to pile on fringe benefits like health insurance. That distortion is still going on via inertia and tax code disparities to this day, and because nobody pays attention to the cost of health care and doesn't shop intelligently for it, has contributed mightily to exploding health costs.

by Kearney on 02.01.2007 at 01:18 PM

Bush never campaigned as a movement conservative in 2000; he was the leftmost candidate in the GOP field, not counting quick flameouts like Liddy Dole and Orrin hatch. With his talk of "compassionate conservatism" and his condemnation of a technical change in EITC benefits championed by DeLay as "balancing the budget on the backs of the poor," Bush made it clear he wanted distance between him and the conservative core. Although the frontrunner and winner of pluralities, he was overwhelmingly rejected by the majority of straw poll attendees, caucus voters, and primary goers until the field shook out later in the campaign, due almost solely to being not trusted to be conservative enough.

His general election campaign hinged almost solely on the notion that the Clinton years were wasted frivolity and that a serious effort to help the poor was necessary, especially helping black and Hispanic children get a good education. While Bush has an overall conservative lean, he is not, and never ha been, interested in cutting government, certainly not as an end in itself, and never sold himself as such.

Point being, it's not like conservative can complain about being 'betrayed' or 'sold a bill of goods'. The right went with Bush in 2000 as the better of two options, and especially out of fear and loathing of Al Gore. After 9/11, and after the Democrats nominated a man the right saw (correctly) as someone who would be less forceful on terror at home or abroad if, say, the French or Hollywood disapproved, the Right went with Bush again, almost overwhelmingly on national security grounds.

by B Frank on 02.01.2007 at 11:52 AM

Conservatives, look what you've done to yourselves by giving Bush a blank check and the republican congress taking the last 6 years off while Bush and his cronies run things. Now, all you have for frontrunners are Rockefeller republicans. Anyone to the right of them like Brownback will never be able to get elected. The American people have had enough rightwing selfrighteousness. For people who supposedly want smaller government we have bigger deficits, more spending and nation building. Almost sounds like the Democrats doesn't it? Not Bush is talking about raising taxes by taxing health plans. This is conservative? Look like all you rightwingers have been had.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

Pawlenty Boosts McCain (POL)

By Jeff Patch

The Politico, February 2, 2007

Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty said Thursday that his fellow partisans must regroup after a bruising 2006 election cycle and decide between ideological purity and electability in the 2008 contest -- a not-so-veiled plea for conservatives to take a fresh look at Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

"The marketplace just told Republicans something," said Pawlenty, who will take the reigns of the Republican Governors Association this summer. "It told them that we are choosing for now to select the products and services of your opponent."

In a session with reporters at the Washington offices of lobbying firm Clark & Weinstock, Pawlenty outlined his position and legislative outlook on several topics, including the economy, energy, health care and immigration. But the buzz of the conversation, hosted by former Minnesota Republican congressman Vin Weber, centered on Pawlenty's role as Minnesota co-chair of the exploratory committee of McCain,. Weber supports former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, who Pawlenty will replace at the RGA.

Pawlenty took pains to avoid negative comments about fellow Republicans and focus the conversations on what he views as McCain's pluses.

"I believe he's in a league of his own," he said, also dismissing concerns that McCain will lose credibility by supporting President Bush's troop boost in Iraq.

Pawlenty acknowledged that there are concerns among conservatives about whether McCain's record is "sufficiently conservative." Pawlenty's comeback: "If you hold any of these candidates to a purity litmus test, with the possible exception of (Kansas Sen.) Sam Brownback, we'll have nobody left," Pawlenty said.

"Senator Brownback also fails, too" chimed in Kate O'Beirne, the Washington editor of the National Review, a conservative weekly.

Minnesota's chief executive also had a simple, if glib, answer for what President Bush should do now that the Democrats gained power in Congress, similar to Democratic gains in Minnesota.

"Pray."

The second-term governor, who pledged to focus on Minnesota and eschew higher office during the 2008 cycle, also took a shot at Democratic Senate hopeful Al Franken, the liberal comedian.

"I don't think he'd be right for Minnesota," Pawlenty said, nonetheless conceding Minnesota's penchant for oddball elections. "You'd be hard-pressed to point to what he's done that would lead you to the conclusion that he should be helping -- be in the United States Senate at this time."

California Primary Shift Seen Hindering McCain (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

Arizona Sen. John McCain's presidential aspirations stand to suffer a stunning setback if California Republicans carry out a plan to move part of their nomination process up from June to Feb. 5 next year.

"If the California Republican Party approves this idea, it may benefit candidates other than Senator John McCain," Orange County state Assemblyman Chuck DeVore told The Washington Times.

The proposal backed by Mr. DeVore, an influential conservative activist, calls for the 1,600 members of the state Republican Central Committee to select at least 53 of their 165 delegates to the 2008 Republican National Convention at the California party's regularly scheduled February convention in Sacramento.

An alternative plan being negotiated by Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Democrat-controlled state Assembly would move the 2008 presidential primary election up from its traditional June date -- where it has in recent years had no effect on the selection of the party's presidential nominee -- to Feb. 5.

Florida is also expected to move its Republican primary to Feb. 5. Florida Gov. Charlie Crist, a Republican, is expected to put his statewide campaign machinery at the disposal of Mr. McCain for the presidential primary in that delegate-rich state.

Several other states are also planning to move up their primaries to early 2008, which political analysts predict would mean that nominees of both parties will be known after the votes are counted on Feb. 5.

DOJ_NMG_0126279

California officials say moving the presidential primaries up to February -- while leaving the primary elections for other offices as scheduled for June -- will cost state taxpayers an extra $90 million.

"DeVore's plan would save taxpayers $90 million and give the Republican Party here a big say in who our presidential nominee is and do it without an unneeded primary election in February," said Republican state Assemblyman Doug LaMalfa.

The real reason the Legislature wants to change the primary date, Mr. DeVore said, is to get on the ballot an extension of term limits, adding six more years for Assembly members and four more years for state Senate members.

"This election has two purposes: To impact the presidential nomination process and to place a term-limit extension initiative on the ballot in time for some lawmakers to run for re-election during the regularly scheduled June 2008 primary," Mr. DeVore said.

Mr. LaMalfa said he is "inclined to help" get the DeVore plan taken up by the state party convention meeting less than two weeks from now.

Mr. McCain is widely viewed as the 2008 Republican presidential nomination front-runner nationally. In California, he is expected to benefit from the tacit support and perhaps formal endorsement of Mr. Schwarzenegger. But many Republican leaders in the state -- who would vote in the February convention under Mr. DeVore's plan -- oppose Mr. McCain.

"The activists on the state central committee here have still not forgiven him for the McCain-Feingold assault on the First Amendment nor do they appear comfortable with his incoherent philosophical agenda," Mr. DeVore said. "Senator McCain seems to be more a product of the New York Times than of the party of Ronald Reagan."

California Republicans note that several top Schwarzenegger operatives -- including Steve Schmidt, a former spokesman for the Bush-Cheney 2004 campaign and most recently campaign manager of Mr. Schwarzenegger's successful re-election bid -- have joined Mr. McCain's operation as senior advisers.

Hunter Out To Capture White House (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, February 2, 2007

LOS ANGELES — Rep. Duncan Hunter sees his opening in the race for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination as the conservative's conservative.

"I believe strongly in this nation that we can have a new American sunrise of opportunity, faith and freedom," he says. "I think this is a time for the type of leadership I can offer."

Hunter, 58, is a veteran congressman from eastern San Diego County who chaired the House Armed Services Committee for the last four of the dozen years that Republicans controlled the House of Representatives.

That job made him well-known to Capitol insiders and a favorite of defense contractors, who found in him a staunch supporter of the Pentagon and of high-tech weapons systems.

He lost his chairmanship when Democrats won control of the House in November. He made his presidential candidacy official last month, basing it on three principles:

·A hard line on illegal immigration.

·Cracking down on countries, mainly China, that he says are killing American manufacturing with unfair trade policies.

·Unwavering support for a strong military and for the war in Iraq, including President Bush's addition of more than 20,000 U.S. troops.

"Over the next five to 10 years, clearly national security is going to be a major focus for our country," Hunter says after being asked why he is running. "I've concentrated on that function of government for the last 26 years in the House of Representatives."

Hunter announced his candidacy last week in South Carolina, one of the earliest primary states. With a big military presence and an apparel and textile industry hit hard by foreign competition, South Carolina will probably be a place where Hunter must do well to gain entry to the top tier of GOP hopefuls.

"He's very much a long shot," says Jack Pitney, professor of government at Claremont McKenna College in California and former head of research for the Republican National Committee. "He sees a niche for a social conservative with a strong defense background," he says. "He's putting a steel beam on the beach and hoping lightning will strike."

Hunter has solid claim to his conservative credentials. He was one of the sponsors of a law Congress passed last year authorizing construction of 700 miles of fencing along much of the U.S.-Mexican border, and he claims credit for fencing already in place along the border at San Diego. He says the millions of immigrants in the USA illegally should be sent home and told to apply for visas if they want to come back.

"As president, I will complete the border fence in six months," he says.

On trade, he accuses China of devaluing its currency to make its goods cheaper in the USA. He says he would tear up trade deals with China and demand more favorable ones. He sees China as a security threat, too.

"China is arming, and they're doing it with American trade dollars," he says.

On Iraq, he firmly supports Bush's decision to go to war. "I think going in was the right thing to do," he says.

Hunter grew up in Riverside, Calif., the son of a conservative activist and home builder who worked for Barry Goldwater's and Richard Nixon's campaigns and lost his own race for Congress in 1968.

In 1980, at age 32, Hunter defeated a Democratic House incumbent as the GOP picked up more than 30 House seats in the election that put Ronald Reagan in the White House.

Hunter dropped out of high school to join the Marines and earned a Bronze Star as helicopter pilot in the Vietnam War. He became a lawyer after leaving the service. A son, Marine 1st Lt. Duncan Duane Hunter, recently returned from a second tour of duty in Iraq.

Al Gore Nominated For Nobel Peace Prize (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

Oslo, Norway — Former Vice President Al Gore was nominated for the 2007 Nobel Peace Prize for his wide-reaching efforts to draw the world's attention to the dangers of global warming, a Norwegian lawmaker said Thursday.

"A prerequisite for winning the Nobel Peace Prize is making a difference, and Al Gore has made a difference," Conservative Member of Parliament Boerge Brende, a former minister of environment and then of trade, told The Associated Press.

Brende said he joined political opponent Heidi Soerensen of the Socialist Left Party to nominate Gore as well as Canadian Inuit activist Sheila Watt-Cloutier before the nomination deadline expired Thursday.

"Al Gore, like no other, has put climate change on the agenda. Gore uses his position to get politicians to understand, while Sheila works from the ground up," Brende said.

During eight years as Bill Clinton's vice president, Gore pushed for climate measures, including for the Kyoto Treaty. Since leaving office in 2001 he has campaigned worldwide, including with his Oscar-nominated documentary on climate change called "An Inconvenient Truth."

Norwegian lawmakers are among the thousands of people and groups with rights to nominate Nobel candidates. Others include members of national governments, past laureates, members of the awards committee and its staff, and many university professors.

The winner is traditionally announced in mid-October, with the prize always presented on the Dec. 10 anniversary of the death of its creator, Swedish industrialist Alfred Nobel.

Praying At The Pump (NYT)

By Ronald E. Minsk

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

Washington

ONCE again, the price of oil is making Americans nervous. After falling by more than one-third since peaking above $75 per barrel last summer, the price has rebounded to $58 with the re-emergence of cold weather and news of a production cut by OPEC. As Congress and President Bush face off over energy policy, we should reaffirm a few basic principles. A very important one is that our most critical goal in enhancing our energy security is to maintain a stable price for oil.

When we talk about energy “dependence” or “security,” we really mean oil. We do not import coal or wind or the sun or geothermal steam, and we import only a tiny percentage of the natural gas we consume from anywhere other than Canada. Thus there is virtually no geopolitical risk in using any of these sources.

This is why energy policy statements frequently begin with the goal of “eliminating the import of Middle East oil.” Such aims presume that our insecurity derives from oil imports, and reflect our distaste of being beholden to autocratic regimes in the Middle East and elsewhere that we perceive as sharing neither our interests nor our values. This presumption, however, is wrong.

Simply put, our oil addiction undermines our well-being because the volatility of oil prices threatens our economy. Because we spend so much on oil and there are no short-term substitutes, price spikes wreck household, business and government budgets alike. Our sense of insecurity is magnified because volatility is both unpredictable and generally beyond our control.

If we could predict future oil prices, we could plan for them. But few people can adjust their lifestyles to reduce their oil consumption significantly in response to price spikes. Likewise, businesses may be reluctant to invest in efficiency or alternative fuels because the higher oil prices that make such investments cost-effective could collapse virtually overnight.

DOJ_NMG_0126281

It is important to remember that our insecurity is related to price volatility and not to the source of the oil. If OPEC members suspended exports but the price of oil mysteriously did not rise, we would not care about the interruption. It is only because a supply interruption always affects price that we care about oil's uninterrupted flow.

Yes, the oil market does care where oil comes from, because the political and economic stability of the supplier informs the market about its reliability as a producer. And because there is a world market for oil, supply interruptions anywhere affect the price of oil everywhere. Even if we imported oil only from the most stable countries (or eliminated imports altogether), so long as unstable countries and regions supply the world market, we would be exposed to the risks of a volatile market. It is precisely the economic risk posed by price fluctuations that forces us to spend diplomatic and military capital in oil-producing regions.

This means that the percentage of oil we import is relatively unimportant. Even the use of alternative liquid fuel instead of oil-derived gasoline will not allow us to escape this volatility, because as direct substitutes for each other, gasoline and alternative fuels will be similarly priced, just as gasoline sold by different oil companies or at different gas stations is similarly priced today.

Accordingly, while the domestic production of oil or alternative liquid fuels may be critically important for other reasons — it can create jobs, stimulate development of new technology, reduce the trade deficit, protect our environment and lower the baseline price of oil — it won't do much to end oil price fluctuations.

It's true that we can help mitigate the effects of oil price volatility by increasing fuel economy standards on cars and trucks. In fact, the more efficient use we make of oil today as opposed to 25 years ago has certainly reduced some of the effects of recent price fluctuations. But tighter fuel standards cannot eliminate the effects of volatility, because new business and governmental budgets already assume increased efficiency; nor would they protect us from price spikes brought on by, say, a new military conflict in the Middle East.

The only way to truly address price instability is to find ways to, in a crisis, quickly and substantially increase fuel production, or to develop some means by which consumers could quickly switch from liquid transportation fuels to other fuels. Not only would it be remarkably difficult to develop these new abilities to such an extent that they could offset the effects of the largest foreseeable supply interruption, but achieving them might have an unexpectedly negative effect: undermining incentives to increase oil production and decrease demand.

In the short term, technology like plug-in hybrid cars could help with volatility, because it allows consumers to choose day to day whether to power their cars with oil or with the sources their utilities use. In the long term, however, if we cannot find a way to increase production and inoculate ourselves from oil-supply interruptions, we are either going to have to develop cars that need no oil, or learn to live with the risks of the global market.

When Americans fill up the tank, they do not care where their gasoline comes from — they just want a stable price. And the fact that we import so much oil does not, in itself, cause its price to fluctuate so wildly or promote inflation. There are many paths to take as we seek to improve our energy security, but all should be based on one principle: real security can come only through finding a way to keep prices stable.

Abrogating Workers' Rights (WSJ)

By Lawrence B. Lindsey

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Why is the new Congress in such a hurry to take away workers' right to vote? It seems extraordinary, but the so-called "Employee Free Choice Act" is right there near the top of the Democrats' agenda. This legislation replaces government-sponsored secret ballot elections for union representation with a public card-signing system.

Under the act, once a union gets a majority of the workers to sign a card expressing a desire for a union, that union is automatically certified as the bargaining representative of, and empowered to negotiate on behalf of, all workers. In the 28 states that do not have right-to-work laws, all employees would typically end up having to join the union or pay the equivalent of union dues whether or not they signed the card. Moreover, under the act, the bargaining process would be shortened, with mandatory use of the Federal Mediation Service after 90 days and an imposed contract through binding arbitration 30 days after that.

I am sympathetic to the argument that strengthening the negotiating position of workers is good public policy, and that expanding the choices available to them is the best way to accomplish that. So, for example, pension portability unlocks the golden handcuffs that financially bind workers to jobs they may become dissatisfied with after they have become vested. Health savings accounts are an important first step to liberating people from jobs they put up with only because they fear a disruption in health-care coverage.

When it comes to unions, it doesn't take a very deep appreciation of game theory to understand that a worker's best position comes when a nonunion company has a union knocking on the door. Indeed, one allegation about "union busting" by supporters of the bill is that, during union certification elections, one employer in five "gave illegal previously unscheduled wage increases while a similar number made some kind of illegal unilateral change in benefits or working conditions."

DOJ_NMG_0126282

In other words, they made workers better off. But, never fear, the Employee Free Choice Act will limit these unconscionable increases in pay, benefits and working conditions by imposing fines of up to $20,000 against employers who make such "unilateral changes." Similar penalties will be assessed against employers who caution that unionization may cause them to shut down or move production elsewhere.

Sometimes the interests of workers and unions coincide, sometimes they do not. The chief complaint by the bill's sponsors is that unions only win secret-ballot elections half of the time. Apparently workers, after they think things over and when neither the union nor the company knows how they vote, often decide they are better-off without the union. The solution of the Employee Free Choice Act is to do away with such elections. It is hard to see how that "empowers" workers. And it is hard not to conclude that this bill has little to do with employee choice or maximizing employee leverage, and everything to do with empowering union bosses and organizers.

The unions allege that companies use unfair election campaign tactics and that a pro-employer National Labor Relations Board doesn't punish them. But statistics cited by the leftwing Web site, Daily Kos, on behalf of this allegation come from 1998 and 1999 -- when the entire NLRB had been appointed by President Clinton. In any event, roughly half the injunctions brought against companies by the NLRB were overturned by federal courts: This does not suggest under-enforcement of the law by the NLRB.

All of this does not mean that there are no legitimate complaints about the union certification process. Companies have been found that fired workers for union organizing activities. One careful examination of NLRB data found that there were 62 such cases in fiscal 2005. This is not a large number in a work force of 140 million, or in a year where there were more than 2,300 certification elections. But it is 62 too many, and it would be reasonable to stiffen the penalties for employers who break the law. But it is hard to think of offering more pay or better worker conditions as something that should be punished with draconian penalties, as the Employee Free Choice Act does.

Most important, it is totally unreasonable to deny all 140 million American workers the right to a secret ballot election because some employers break the law. Not only is such a remedy disproportionate, it is counterproductive -- if one's goal is worker empowerment. How can a worker be better off if both his employer and his prospective union boss know his views on the union when the secret ballot is replaced with a public card signing? For the worker it is the ultimate example of being caught between a rock and a hard place.

The political rhetoric in support of this bill is a willful exercise in obfuscation. For example, on the presidential campaign stump John Edwards says, "if you can join the Republican Party by just signing a card, you should be able to join a union by just signing a card." The fact is, you -- and everyone else -- can join any union you want by just signing a card, and paying union dues and meeting any other obligations imposed by the union. But, under this bill, contrary to Mr. Edwards's false analogy, signing a card to join the Republican Party does not oblige you to vote for the Republican ticket in a secret ballot election. The Employee Free Choice Act would take care of that by abolishing such elections. If the Edwards principle was applied to the political process in the 28 non-right-to-work states, Karl Rove and Republican Party organizers could force all Democrats and independents to become Republicans and pay dues to the party if a majority of voters signed Republican Party cards. That is free choice?

The final proof that this bill is about union power, and not worker choice, is revealed by its treatment of the flip side of unionization: decertification elections. These are secret ballot elections in which workers get to decide that they have had enough of the union. So under the Employee Free Choice Act can a majority of workers decertify the union by signing a card? Not on your life. Here unions want the chance to engage in a campaign to give workers both sides of the story -- and maybe do a better job of representing them -- before the union's fate is decided, by a secret-ballot vote.

No one has ever argued that secret-ballot elections are a perfect mechanism, either in politics or in deciding unionization. But they are far and away the best mechanism we have devised to minimize intimidation and maximize the power of the people who really matter, whether citizen or worker. Congress should think a lot harder before it decides to do away with workers' right to vote.

Mr. Lindsey is president and CEO of the Lindsey Group.

Is $34.06 Per Hour 'Underpaid'? (WSJ)

By Jay P. Greene And Marcus A. Winters

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Who, on average, is better paid -- public school teachers or architects? How about teachers or economists? You might be surprised to learn that public school teachers are better paid than these and many other professionals. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, public school teachers earned $34.06 per hour in 2005, 36% more than the hourly wage of the average white-collar worker and 11% more than the average professional specialty or technical worker.

DOJ_NMG_0126283

In the popular imagination, however, public school teachers are underpaid. "Salaries are too low. We all know that," noted First Lady Laura Bush, expressing the consensus view. "We need to figure out a way to pay teachers more." Indeed, our efforts to hire more teachers and raise their salaries account for the bulk of public school spending increases over the last four decades. During that time per-pupil spending, adjusted for inflation, has more than doubled; overall we now annually spend more than $500 billion on public education.

The perception that we underpay teachers is likely to play a significant role in the debate to reauthorize No Child Left Behind. The new Democratic majority intends to push for greater education funding, much of which would likely go toward increasing teacher compensation. It would be beneficial if the debate focused on the actual salaries teachers are already paid.

It would also be beneficial if the debate touched on the correlation between teacher pay and actual results. To wit, higher teacher pay seems to have no effect on raising student achievement. Metropolitan areas with higher teacher pay do not graduate a higher percentage of their students than areas with lower teacher pay.

In fact, the urban areas with the highest teacher pay are famous for their abysmal outcomes. Metro Detroit leads the nation, paying its public school teachers, on average, $47.28 per hour. That's 61% more than the average white-collar worker in the Detroit area and 36% more than the average professional worker. In metro New York, public school teachers make $45.79 per hour, 20% more than the average professional worker in that area. And in Los Angeles teachers earn $44.03 per hour, 23% higher than other professionals in the area.

Evidence suggests that the way we pay teachers is more important than simply what they take home. Currently salaries are determined almost entirely by seniority -- the number of years in the classroom -- and the number of advanced degrees accumulated. Neither has much to do with student improvement.

There is evidence that providing bonuses to teachers who improve the performance of their students does raise academic proficiency. With our colleagues at the University of Arkansas we found that a Little Rock program providing bonuses to teachers based on student gains on standardized tests substantially increased math proficiency. Researchers at the University of Florida recently found similar results in a nationwide evaluation.

Of course, public school teacher earnings look less impressive when viewed on an annual basis than on an hourly basis. This is because teachers tend to work fewer hours per year, with breaks during the summer, winter and spring. But comparing earnings on an annual basis would be inappropriate when teachers work significantly fewer hours than do other workers. Teachers can use that time to be with family, to engage in activities that they enjoy, or to earn additional money from other employment. That time off is worth money and cannot simply be ignored when comparing earnings. The appropriate way to compare earnings in this circumstance is to focus on hourly rates.

Moreover, the earnings data reported here, which are taken directly from the National Compensation Survey conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, do not include retirement and health benefits, which tend to be quite generous for public school teachers relative to other workers. Nor do they include the nonmonetary benefit of greater job security due to the tenure that most public school teachers enjoy.

Educators sometimes object that hourly earnings calculations do not capture the additional hours they work outside of school, but this objection is not very compelling. First, the National Compensation Survey is designed to capture all hours actually worked. And teachers are hardly the only wage earners who take work home with them.

The fact is that teachers are better paid than most other professionals. What matters is the way that we pay public school teachers, not the amount. The next time politicians call for tax increases to address the problem of terribly underpaid public school teachers, they might be reminded of these facts.

Jay P. Greene holds the endowed chair of education reform at the University of Arkansas and is a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, where Marcus A. Winters is a senior research associate. Their report, "How Much Are Public School Teachers Paid?," was released this week.

A Bipartisan Trade Policy (NYT)

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

The newest Democratic members of Congress have arrived in Washington with an important message from the voters: American workers are feeling economically insecure, and globalization and trade are heightening their fears. The White House and the new Congress still have a chance to create a bipartisan consensus on trade. They should seize it, for the good of the American economy, and for the good of the world's poorest nations, which need freer trade to pull themselves out of poverty.

DOJ_NMG_0126284

There are some quick steps the White House and Congress should be able to agree on. To reassure workers at home, they could expand federal assistance to anyone thrown out of a job because of trade. At the same time, new tariff benefits for the least-developed countries, like Bangladesh and Cambodia, would send a positive signal to the rest of the world.

Over all, trade has been very good to the United States, which is still the world's largest exporter of goods and services. The trade liberalization measures put in place after World War II produce now, by one estimate, an additional $1 trillion in income for Americans annually, and millions of new jobs. The inexpensive foreign goods that arrive here because of free trade keep prices down. Low prices are good for consumers, and by keeping inflation and interest rates in check, they encourage economic growth and job creation.

Still, there is no question that the hundreds of thousands of workers who lose their jobs to trade-related dislocations each year are paying the price. The government has not done enough to take care of these displaced workers, and much of the blame lies with the economic policies of the White House and the last Congress, which was led by Republicans.

Now that the Democrats control Congress, they can champion both free trade and the rights of American workers. They should push to improve the social safety net, especially access to health insurance. And they should promote increased retraining and wage assistance for displaced workers.

To win Democrats' support, the White House will have to accept some of their demands for stronger labor provisions in future trade accords. Bans on forced labor and child labor, and similar mandates, are laudable goals. But Democrats who propose minimum-wage rules have to recognize that what is low pay for Americans may pull a family out of poverty in a less-developed country.

The administration's proposed farm legislation looks like a decent first step toward reducing subsidies and bringing American agricultural policy into line with our trade commitments. Now, if the administration can put together a solid plan for proceeding with negotiations for the Doha round of global trade talks, Congress should renew the president's fast-track negotiating authority. But if the global talks cannot be jump-started, the White House and Congress should move ahead with bilateral agreements with Peru, Panama and Korea.

Democrats are right to insist that the trade agenda advance the interests of all Americans, not just large corporations. But they need to acknowledge that putting the brakes on global growth is still the surest path to losing American jobs.

Free To Choose In Utah (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Another brick could soon fall from the Berlin Wall that surrounds America's failing public schools, as Utah's legislature considers what would be the first universally available statewide voucher program in America.

The voucher bill passed out of committee earlier this week and is backed by Governor Jon Huntsman. It would offer students who attend private K-12 schools from $500 to $3,000 in tuition reimbursement based on family income. While Utah is known for its Mormon population, the biggest winners under the plan would be the state's growing Hispanic population, who haven't done well in general in Utah public schools.

As usual, local school boards and the state teachers union (the Utah Education Association) are fighting the idea, claiming that it will "drain" money from public schools. This hardly seems likely because the $9 million cost of the program is about 0.5% of total school spending. And the voucher maximum of $3,000 is less than half the state per child public-school spending average of $6,325. The voucher bill also allows Utah public schools to keep the difference between the voucher amount paid out to students who leave and the $6,325 per pupil average.

Vouchers are working in a handful of cities, such as Cleveland, Milwaukee, and Washington, D.C. Former Florida Governor Jeb Bush also promoted a statewide plan, until a liberal state court invented constitutional objections. The evidence on student performance has mostly been favorable in these schools, and research by Harvard economist Carolyn Hoxby has found that the presence of vouchers has caused the public schools to improve their performance as well.

So let's hope Utah lawmakers stare down the opposition and give this statewide experiment a try. "For the unions, this vote is about protecting their monopoly," House Speaker Greg Curtis says. "They don't like vouchers for the same reason blacksmiths didn't welcome the Model T."

Rice To Seek Support For Mideast Effort (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will launch a new effort to forge a Palestinian state by seeking an endorsement today from a rare Washington meeting of a high-level group that monitors Middle East peace.

DOJ_NMG_0126285

The Quartet, made up of the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations, has played a largely backstage role in the long-stalled peace process. But Germany, which currently holds the rotating presidency of the E.U., has pressed to revive the role of the international group -- and U.S. officials decided that an endorsement would help bolster Rice's planned return to the region this month to host a meeting between Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

European officials say that Rice's decision to hold the meeting in Washington signals the administration's determination to make progress with just two years left in President Bush's term. "This sends a clear message that the United States is reengaged," one European official said yesterday.

Rice maintains that the prospects for peace have suddenly turned brighter, even though Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has dwindling support among Israelis and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has struggled against the Hamas-led legislature. In a series of recent trips to the region, Rice has tried to unite what she calls "mainstream" Arabs against extremist forces that she says include Iran, Hamas and Hezbollah. She suggests that the strategic interests of Israel and its neighbors have begun to overlap, making it easier to win Arab support for and interest in a peace deal.

Accepting an approach long urged by Europeans and Palestinians, Rice will push Olmert and Abbas to discuss the contours of a final peace deal, even though they have made little progress in implementing the initial steps of a peace plan promoted by the administration for the past four years.

Previously, the administration argued that such negotiations would be premature until the Palestinians met basic security requirements and Israel ended its settlement expansion. Now, Rice suggests that sketching a "political horizon" will boost the confidence of the two sides to take those initial steps -- and to ultimately give Abbas the leverage to defeat Hamas.

But turmoil in the Palestinian territories has increased in recent days. A tentative cease-fire collapsed yesterday as Hamas and forces loyal to Abbas's Fatah party engaged in an intense gunfight in the Gaza Strip that killed six people and wounded at least 50. The administration is pressing a $100 million plan to bolster and train Abbas's security forces.

Behind the scenes, there are tensions in the Quartet group over the administration's determination to maintain an economic embargo on the Palestinian government led by Hamas, which the State Department considers a terrorist organization. The Russians, in particular, have pressed for an end to the embargo. The Europeans last year won approval for a temporary -- now largely permanent -- aid program that directly benefits the Palestinian people, bypassing Hamas institutions. The aid ban, however, has allowed Iran to gain a greater role in Palestinian affairs as it provides huge amounts of smuggled cash to Hamas.

A senior administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the group's communique was still being drafted, said that "we need to review the mechanisms in place" for aiding the Palestinians. He said the administration views the aid ban on Hamas to be "a relative success," but he acknowledged that others might argue that it has not succeeded because Hamas still refuses to recognize Israel.

He noted that overall aid to the Palestinians has increased in the past year, and that "apocalyptical visions" of Palestinian suffering because of the aid ban have not materialized.

Over the past six years, the administration has promoted several peace initiatives, only to back off in the face of setbacks. One senior European official who recently met with Rice said he is impressed by her apparent determination to achieve a breakthrough. Asked why he believes this time is different, he smiled and said: "One must always be an optimist."

UN Chief Wants More Energetic Mideast Peace Quartet (AFP)

AFP, February 2, 2007

UN chief Ban Ki-moon wants the international Quartet for Middle East peace meeting Friday to strive for progress on the ground rather than merely making statements, his spokeswoman said.

Ban, who took office on January 1, will attend his first meeting of the diplomatic Quartet -- which includes the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia -- in Washington Friday.

"He hopes that the Quartet will seriously engage with the key issues that have a direct impact on the situation on the ground, going beyond mere statements," his spokeswoman, Michele Montas, told reporters Thursday.

"He is fully aware that within the region and beyond, many are looking at the Quartet to be more energetic in its efforts than it has been at times to break the current impasse in the peace process," Montas said.

She added that Ban "believes the Quartet should reach out to the parties and also all the key regional partners for a more systematic dialogue and involvement in the Quartet's deliberations."

In an AFP interview Wednesday in Nairobi, Ban expressed hope that Friday's meeting will yield a detailed agreement on how to implement the Quartet's blueprint for the creation of a viable Palestinian state.

"It's encouraging that we are now able to re-energize this Quartet process," Ban told AFP before traveling to Washington.

"The Middle East question has been too long unresolved, which has been having a negative impact on this regional situation," he said. "I hope we will be able to agree in a detailed manner on the implementation of the roadmap."

DOJ_NMG_0126286

The Quartet, which has not met formally since September, issued a "roadmap" for achieving Israeli-Palestinian peace in 2003, but the three-stage plan that should have led to the creation of a Palestinian state by 2005 has since languished.

The plan's phased implementation meant crucial "final status" issues like the borders and powers of a Palestinian state and the fate of Palestinian refugees could not be tackled until Israel's security was guaranteed -- allowing militants to stymie progress with continued attacks.

Friday's gathering will include Ban, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana.

Shootout In Gaza Deepens Bitter Split (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 1 — A fragile truce between Palestinian factions in Gaza broke down Thursday when Hamas members fired on a convoy from the rival Fatah group, touching off an intense gun battle that killed six people and wounded at least 50.

In the West Bank on Thursday, Israeli troops shot dead four Palestinians in three confrontations.

In the Gaza episode, Hamas members of the Palestinian security forces shot at what Hamas said was a truck convoy delivering weapons to the Presidential Guard, a security force that protects the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, who is a member of Fatah.

The trucks entered Gaza from Israel at the Kerem Shalom crossing, near the spot where the borders of Gaza, Israel and Egypt converge.

The convoy reached central Gaza before it was stopped by the Executive Force, a security agency made up mostly of Hamas supporters, said Islam Shahwan, a spokesman for the force. The Fatah men refused to allow any searches, and the shooting soon erupted, he said.

Mr. Shahwan said the convoy was stopped because “we have witnessed Fatah using new weapons and believe they were bringing in more.”

Fatah officials said the convoy was hauling generators, medical equipment and tents, and accused Hamas of violating the latest truce, which took effect on Tuesday and had brought relative calm for two days.

But Thursday’s shootout, near the Bureij refugee camp, claimed six lives, and at least four of them were security force members. Also, about 50 people were injured in central Gaza and in fighting elsewhere, according to doctors at Shifa Hospital in Gaza City.

Hamas, the radical Islamic group, controls most of the Palestinian government and the Executive Force, which Hamas established after coming to power last year. But Mr. Abbas also has a range of powers, and most members of the security forces are considered supporters of Fatah.

More than 60 Palestinians have died in the internal Gaza fighting over the past two months, and talks to establish a national unity government have again collapsed.

In the West Bank violence, the Israeli troops shot and killed three militants in clashes in Nablus and Tulkarm, the military and Palestinian residents said.

The Israelis also shot and killed a 17-year-old Palestinian who was trying to cut through a fence that is part of Israel’s separation barrier near Ramallah.

In another development on Thursday, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert testified for five hours before a commission investigating how Israel conducted its war last summer against Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Mr. Olmert was the last of dozens of political and military figures to give testimony at the closed-door sessions.

An Israeli official, who spoke on condition of anonymity but was briefed on the testimony, said Mr. Olmert gave a detailed explanation of the entire conflict and did not seek to assign blame. The commission questioned Mr. Olmert at some length about the ground offensive in the final days of the fighting, which resulted in heavy Israeli casualties.

Many Israelis feel the inconclusive war was mismanaged, and Mr. Olmert’s popularity fell sharply after the war. The commission is expected to issue an interim report in March.

Also, Defense Minister Amir Peretz selected the Israeli arms maker Rafael to develop a missile defense system designed to shoot down the short-range rockets that Palestinian militants and Hezbollah have directed at Israel.

Mr. Peretz chose Rafael’s “iron dome” system over a number of competitors, including the Lockheed Martin Corporation, the big American military contractor. The Rafael system will provide an answer to rockets with a range of several dozen kilometers, Mr. Peretz’s office said in a statement, and is expected to be ready for deployment in about two years.

6 Dead In Gaza After Renewed Palestinian In-fighting (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

JERUSALEM — Renewed violence between rival Palestinian factions in the Gaza Strip left at least six people dead today, despite a three-day-old cease-fire agreement.

Clashes broke out around the coastal strip after gunmen from the ruling Hamas movement ambushed a convoy of trucks they said were carrying arms from Egypt destined for its main rival, Fatah. Four members of Palestinian security forces and two bystanders died in the fighting and more than 40 others were injured.

Egyptian officials in Gaza and a spokesman for the presidential guard of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who belongs to Fatah, denied the trucks were carrying arms. They said the cargo was supplies for a presidential guard compound in Gaza.

The two sides called the truce following clashes that killed about 30 people last week. On-and-off again violence kicked up in December after Abbas called for new elections to break a political deadlock.

Hamas, which unseated Fatah in parliamentary elections a year ago, sees early elections as part of a coup attempt and accuses the United States of backing Fatah in the escalating violence.

The Bush administration plans to provide $86 million in what it describes as nonlethal aid to Abbas' security forces. Egypt has shipped weapons to bolster his forces in Gaza, with what Israeli officials say is their permission.

Hamas and Fatah have negotiated for months over terms of a coalition government aimed at breaking an international aid embargo against Hamas. But the talks have repeatedly faltered, mainly over the distribution of Cabinet portfolios and Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel.

Western nations cut aid because they consider Hamas a terrorist group, and set three conditions for a renewal: the Palestinian government must recognize Israel, renounce violence and agree to abide by past agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

How Lebanon's Army Could Hold Key To Peace (WSJ)

By Cam Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- For almost six months, Lebanese Army soldiers have helped control one of the world's most volatile flashpoints, patrolling near Lebanon's 49-mile border with Israel. Now, its troops are shouldering an even more urgent, and in many ways more difficult, task: standing between fellow citizens from rival groups on the same Beirut streets where the civil war that still haunts Lebanon raged two decades ago.

The job is severely testing what may be the last Lebanese institution that still holds public confidence, and perhaps the only one keeping the deeply fractured society intact. Yet without a quick settlement to the political crisis that has paralyzed the government since November, current and former army leaders warn, street violence like last week's could spiral beyond the military's ability to contain it.

"The unity of the army is the only thing that keeps this country from meeting the definition of a 'failed state,' " says Elias Hanna, a retired general in the Lebanese army and a strategic analyst.

About 6,000 soldiers have been patrolling the capital since December. That is when government opponents, led by Hezbollah, the Shiite Muslim political, social and militia group, flooded downtown Beirut in an effort to topple the U.S.-backed government. They contend it lacks constitutional legitimacy given the resignations of six ministers, including five Shiites, in November.

Tensions peaked last week when Hezbollah called a general strike, and its supporters burned tires and blocked roads to Beirut's airport. Although some members of the current government wanted the army to break through the barricades, commanders decided to let the protests play out, hoping they would relieve pressure, according to current and former senior officers.

By Jan. 25, the wisdom of that strategy was clouded by doubt, as a cafeteria brawl between Shiite and Sunni Muslims at a Beirut university spilled into the streets. Ensuing violence spread, leaving four dead and about 200 wounded. Clashes flared across the city and beyond in scenes reminiscent of Lebanon's civil war, complete with rooftop snipers.

About 20 soldiers, including three officers, were among the wounded, according to a senior commander who isn't authorized to speak officially. With perhaps one exception, soldiers helped contain the violence by not returning fire; they were under strict orders to avoid actions that could cause the fighting to escalate, the senior commander said. In the days that followed last week's clashes, all sides seemed to breathe easier.

Many fear the calm is temporary. They say the army's ability to maintain order can't last forever, making a political resolution urgent. Nizar Abdel-Kader, a retired senior army general, and others close to the current army leadership say senior officers warned rival political factions last week that soldiers couldn't keep the peace on Beirut's sidewalks forever. "The tension was raised to a degree where it is now too risky to believe that the army can continue with the same effectiveness in quelling these clashes," says Mr. Abdel-Kader, who is a columnist for the Lebanese Arabic-language newspaper Ad-Diar.

DOJ_NMG_0126288

Since last week's violence, the army's efforts on Beirut's streets seem to be most intense after sunset. Soldiers man mobile checkpoints, often stopping each passing car. Some are waved through quickly, while others are closely screened to be certain they aren't ferrying armed men -- another echo of Lebanon's past.

In the tent city near Martyrs Square, where government opponents have camped for weeks, protesters are nervous about who may be plotting against them -- but thankful for the presence of soldiers throughout the city. "We will lift our hats and bow in front of them," says Mohammad Kawar, a 46-year-old cab driver and Hezbollah supporter. The group's leader, Hassan Nasrallah, has pledged that his followers won't push Lebanon into civil war even if 1,000 of them are killed.

If street violence does resume, there are other factors that could make it difficult for the army to minimize. The soldiers in Beirut include members of special-forces and "intervention" units, men trained to respond aggressively to any threat. (Members of Lebanon's Internal Security Force, who are better prepared for a mission of this type, remained in their barracks last week. Their participation might prove combustible, since their leaders are viewed by some as being too close to the government.) The soldiers also are drawn from the same ethnic and religious groups now in conflict.

"The army reflects the fabric of this society," Gen. Hanna says. He and others also note that the integration since the early 1990s of each unit -- Sunnis, Shiites, Christians and others serve side by side -- is a major benefit.

The entire 60,000-man force also has endured the physical stress of a high alert for months, since the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah. And under the United Nations Security Council resolution that ended that conflict, the Lebanese Army, in tandem with a beefed-up U.N. force, is responsible for patrolling Hezbollah's stronghold in the south to deter renewed fighting.

Mr. Abdel-Kader says the Beirut mission is the most physically, psychologically and emotionally draining for any soldier. "After all," he says, "you are facing your own people."

U.S. Eyes Re-establishing Relations (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

The State Department said yesterday it is considering re-establishing a diplomatic presence in Somalia for the first time since U.S. troops withdrew from the African country in 1994 after an unsuccessful U.N. humanitarian operation amid a bloody civil war.

Even if the department determines that the political and security conditions on the ground have improved sufficiently, it will not reopen the U.S. Embassy, which has been closed since 1991, but will most likely set up a small presence post, officials said.

"It's something that's being actively examined right now," department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters. "We are going to take a look, obviously, at what is appropriate in terms of security [and] political presence ... in Somalia."

Although the United States never formally severed diplomatic relations with a Somali nation that dissolved into near anarchy from 1991 on, it closed its embassy there.

About a month ago, Somalia's weak transitional government, backed by troops and weapons from Ethiopia, drove out Islamists who had controlled the capital, Mogadishu, and much of the country's south for six months.

Since then, the security situation has improved, although there have been attacks in Mogadishu.

"There aren't any final decisions" about sending U.S. diplomats to Somalia, Mr. McCormack said. However, he added that if the situation continues to improve, the department could send diplomats.

Jendayi Frazer, assistant secretary of state for African affairs, considered visiting Somalia during a trip to the region early last month, but the State Department's Diplomatic Security Service decided it was not safe, a senior official said.

The U.S. Embassy in Kenya is responsible for watching developments in Somalia, but the lack of diplomatic presence on the ground limits the knowledge and potential influence of the United States, officials said.

In Mogadishu yesterday, mortar bombs and rockets killed at least three persons, wire reports quoted witnesses as saying. It was not immediately clear who was behind the attack. On Tuesday, a series of blasts rocked the capital's northern part, in an area where Ethiopian troops were based before they began a pullback withdrawal last month.

Officials have blamed remnants of the Islamist movement, who fled to the south after their defeat, for some of the attacks.

Miss Frazer pledged $40 million in financial assistance for Somalia during her trip.

She said the United States was trying to "mobilize international support to help build the governance capacity" of the transitional authorities and to "move forward with the deployment of an African stabilization force."

DOJ_NMG_0126289

"It is very important that the peacekeeping force is led by Africans, especially participation by Muslim countries," she said in a Jan. 17 speech at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

In 1993, Somali clan militiamen shot down two Black Hawk helicopters and killed 18 U.S. soldiers. The bodies of two of them were dragged through the streets of Mogadishu.

Shiite-Sunni Conflict Rises In Pakistan (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, February 2, 2007

MULTAN, PAKISTAN

In this Punjabi city of shrines, Shiites and Sunnis prayed side by side during Ashura this week, the holiest holiday for the world's 150 million Shiite Muslims. But a province away, suicide bombers attempted to strike Shiite processions throughout Pakistan's Northwest Frontier Province, leaving as many as 21 dead and more than 40 injured in three separate incidents, including two suicide attacks.

The violence, the latest in a sharp uptick against Pakistan's Shiite minority, has heightened concerns that Iraq's conflict may be feeding sectarian violence here. Whether the conflict in Iraq is capable of igniting Pakistan's simmering sectarian tensions raises questions about a growing global sectarian war.

The answer is important, analysts say, because Pakistan's 30 million Shiites – numbering more than Iraq's – could become a flash point if sectarian violence spreads.

"In Pakistan, it is not a battle like in Iraq. But in Pakistan, you have the same violence ... driving the conflict," says Vali Nasr, author of The Shia Revivial, a study of global Sunni-Shiite conflicts. "We are going to see increasing occurrences of the bombings like we've seen over the weekend." [Editor's note: The original version incorrectly titled Vali Nasr's book.]

It is said that Shiite Islam in Pakistan began here, in this dusty corner of Punjab, more than 200 years ago. Shiites, who constitute only 20 percent of Pakistan's 165 million people, have found themselves beleaguered ever since. As many as 4,000 people are estimated to have died in sectarian fighting in Pakistan in the last two decades, 300 in the last year alone. One of the largest attacks took place here in Multan, when a car bomb killed 40 members of an extremist Sunni organization in 2004. A Shiite militant was later tried and sentenced to death for the attack.

Multan's discord closely mirrors the age-old schisms in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, and elsewhere which, taken together, constitute a Shiite-belt stretching from the Gulf to Pakistan.

"Will the newly empowered Shiite majority in Iraq use its power to tame its sectarian radicals like Moqtada al-Sadr and make an accommodation with the Sunni minority, or will it pursue a politics of resentment and revenge and try to impose sectarian dominance? The outcome will profoundly affect the actions of other governments and of oppressed Shiites in Pakistan and elsewhere," writes John Brenkman, an international affairs analyst at the City University of New York, in an e-mail.

Many disagree, however, saying that what happens in Iraq will hardly convulse the community in Pakistan, more concerned as it is with its own troubles.

"When you ask Pakistanis about Iraq, they identify with Iraqis – not with Shiites or Sunnis," says Samina Ahmed, the South Asia Project Director of the International Crisis Group (ICG), a Brussels-based think tank.

That is certainly the feeling of Shiites in Multan, who make up 40 percent of the city's roughly 4 million people. Sitting around plates of food together, Sunnis and Shiites insist there is no conflict among them, and that foreign powers both here and in Iraq are trying to sow discord.

Even without Iraq, though, some fear Pakistan is particularly vulnerable because of the Taliban resurgence in its backyard. "We tend only to think of [the Taliban] in terms of Afghan politics. We don't think of it as being a resurgence of a Salafi extremist force in Afghanistan. The ideological implications fall on the Shiites," says Mr. Nasr.

For some, Al Qaeda's war against Shiites has already ignited tensions in Pakistan. Editorials in leading newspapers – particularly after this week's suicide bombings – speak of a "new anti-Shiite wave that is radiating from Iraq ..." and President Pervez Musharraf has warned of the need to diffuse sectarianism "not just for the country's security, but for the entire Muslim world."

Such fears may be well grounded, even though the number of sectarian killings is down when compared with the past. In January, police investigators in Karachi announced that Al Qaeda worked with local sectarian groups to carry out some of the largest suicide attacks against sectarian targets last year, which left more than 60 dead, according to local news reports. And this past week's suicide attacks bore the signature of Al Qaeda in Iraq and Afghanistan, observers say.

Whether or not it spells a war emanating from Iraq, the West should pay heed, say analysts.

"People tend to dismiss the sectarian groups ... because they're not targeting you. But they always could," says Christine Fair, a South Asia counterterrorism expert at the US Institute of Peace, a Congressionally funded think tank in Washington, D.C.

DOJ_NMG_0126290

Ms. Fair and others point out that extremist groups cross-pollinate: Those who attack Shiites today are the ones who attack Western targets tomorrow.

In January, Karachi investigators determined just that: A suicide attack last March, which killed an American diplomat, was carried out by Lashkar-i-Jhangvi, a sectarian group working with Al Qaeda.

"They have multiple goals. It's an external jihad. It's an internal jihad," says Ahmed of ICG, adding that Pakistan and the West have to address both sides of the coin.

But, say residents in Multan, Sunnis and Shiites enjoy strong family-to-family bonds for the most part, and interfaith boards and education have helped blunt sectarianism's impact.

If there is a growing global conflict, Malik Naseem Labar, a local Sunni politician, could not see it through the throngs during Ashura this week.

"We respect [Ashura]. All these young boys – they are all Sunnis," says Mr. Labar, gesturing toward swaths of young men mingling freely with Shiites. "I am Sunni, but I am here."

U.S. Hopes For Progress On N. Korea Deal (AP)

AP, February 2, 2007

The top U.S. negotiator on North Korea's nuclear program said Thursday he hopes six nations meeting in China next week will be able to take the first concrete steps toward eventual dismantling of the communist nation's nuclear weapons.

The comments by Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill could mean that North Korea might begin the process of denuclearization while receiving economic benefits from other countries participating in the talks.

This would be a significant breakthrough for a bargaining process that has achieved little since it began in August 2003.

Meeting with reporters on the eve of his departure for South Korea, Hill declined to say what specific actions he expects when the six nations convene for their sixth round of talks in 3 1/2 years. Participants are the United States, the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia.

"We will not achieve full denuclearization but we hope get a substantial start," Hill said.

A December meeting of the six made little headway but the State Department has been hinting for days that the next round should be different.

A Colossal Leap Of Faith In Fight Against Famine (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

EBERSWALDE, Germany -- Few people raise bigger bunny rabbits than Karl Szmolinsky, who has been producing long-eared whoppers since 1964. His favorite breed, German gray giants, are the size of a full-grown beagle and so fat they can barely hop.

Last year, after the retired chauffeur entered some of his monsters in an agricultural fair, word of his breeding skills spread to the North Korean Embassy in Berlin. Diplomats looked past the cute, furry faces with the twitching noses and saw a possible solution to their nation's endemic food shortage: an enormous bunny in every Korean pot.

The North Koreans approached Szmolinsky in November and asked whether he'd advise them on how to start a rabbit breeding program to help "feed the population," the 67-year-old pensioner recalled in an interview at his home in Eberswalde, an eastern German town a few miles from the Polish border. Sympathetic to the Koreans' plight, he agreed to sell some of his best stock at a steep discount and volunteered to travel to the hermetic nation as a consultant.

"They liked what they saw, and they liked how big they were," he said, as he showed off other bunnies that he raises in weathered hutches in his back yard. "It's harder than you think to raise them. They need a varied diet, but they have to be fed like pigs, basically, to get that big."

In December, Szmolinsky stuffed six of his rabbits into modified dog carriers and took them to the airport in Berlin, where they boarded a flight for Pyongyang, via Frankfurt, Germany, and Beijing. Robert, a 23-pounder, was the largest of the bunch, which included four female rabbits and one other male carefully selected for their breeding potential.

How, exactly, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea intends to parlay the small herd of German Flopsies into hunger relief for its 23 million citizens is unclear.

An official at the North Korean Embassy in Berlin, who would not give his name, confirmed that the Asian nation coveted the German bunnies for their gigantism. But he refused to answer any other questions about the breeding program.

In the hands of a skilled butcher, a German gray giant can yield up to 15 pounds of meat, according to Szmolinsky. "There's not much fat, and it's very tender." Their gray-and-white pelts are soft and supple but are generally worthless on the European market, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0126291

The breeder said he was notified by an attache at the North Korean Embassy that Robert and the other rabbits from Eberswalde had arrived safely at their destination. But he allowed that he was a little concerned their new masters might not know how to care for them properly. He said he hopes to travel to North Korea in April to inspect their living conditions.

"If they aren't able to feed them the way I do here, I won't send them any more," he said. "I don't want them to be half-starved."

The Koreans' choice of rabbits has other German breeders scratching their heads.

Karl-Heinz Heitz, chairman of the State Association of Rabbit Breeders in Berlin-Brandenburg, said that German gray giants are hard to beat for size but that they aren't cheap to fatten up. It takes wheelbarrow-loads of hay, vegetables and rabbit chow to bring them to maturity.

"Let me say this: There are certainly breeds that are more economically profitable; I do not know why the North Koreans wanted this one," said Heitz, who introduced the Korean officials to Szmolinsky.

Breeds such as New Zealand red or big light silver or Vienna blue are only half as big but are more cost-effective to raise. "You do not have to put in as much to get out a fair amount of meat," Heitz said.

For whatever reason, the German gray giants appear to hold a special allure in Asia.

A North Korean television crew visited Eberswalde last year to film Szmolinsky's rabbits for a children's program. And a couple of Chinese visitors showed up unannounced at his doorstep the other day, asking if they could buy some of his critters.

"I had to get rid of them," he said of the Chinese. He's not parting with any of his 14 remaining adult rabbits until he can breed some more.

Special correspondent Shannon Smiley contributed to this report.

N Korea Leader Finds Life's Luxuries In Gibraltar (FT)

By George Parker And Mark Mulligan

Financial Times, February 2, 2007

Kim Jong-il, North Korea's idiosyncratic leader, may be dispensing Hennessy cognac and Cartier watches to his cronies for a little while longer, thanks to a 300-year-old territorial dispute between the UK and Spain.

The precise status of Gibraltar, a hunk of British-owned rock at the mouth of the Mediterranean, has caused a new row between London and Madrid that is delaying a European Union ban on luxury goods sales to Pyongyang.

The ban was agreed by the United Nations last October as one of a number of sanctions against North Korea, following its testing of a nuclear device.

The aim was to deprive Mr Kim and his supporters of some of the finer things in life, including thoroughbred horses, luxury vehicles, watches, pearls and musical instruments.

The sanctions were adopted by EU foreign ministers in November, but they are still not in force across the bloc.

If Mr Kim is wondering why, he need look no further than the War of the Spanish Succession and the 1713 Treaty of Utrecht that ended it – handing Gibraltar to Britain.

Problems arose when Madrid spotted that the EU regulation needed to implement the sanctions contained a reference to the "competent authorities" responsible for enforcing them: listed in the small print was Gibraltar.

Spain's foreign ministry wants the reference to Gibraltar deleted before the EU regulation can come into force. "We do not recognise Gibraltar's authority in international policy," it said. "The UK is the only competent authority in this respect."

British diplomats say there would be a legal hole in the sanctions if Gibraltar was not included. Both sides are trying to resolve the dispute and insist it is a hiccup in improving relations over the colony.

In September the two countries, along with Gibraltar, signed an agreement on airport access, telecoms and border controls, hailed as the beginning of a new era of co-operation.

While the wrangling continues, European countries can apply the sanctions unilaterally, but Brussels diplomats say the matter must be dealt with at an EU level to ensure they are applied uniformly and enforced.

U.S. Halts China Space Ventures (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

The Bush administration has suspended plans to develop space ventures with China, including joint exploration of the moon, in reaction to Beijing's Jan. 11 test of an anti-satellite weapon that left orbiting debris threatening U.S. and foreign satellites.

National Aeronautics and Space Administration spokesman Jason Sharp said the weapon test undermined an agreement reached between President Bush and Chinese President Hu Jintao during an April summit.

DOJ_NMG_0126292

"We believe China's development and testing of such weapons is inconsistent with the constructive relationship that our presidents have outlined, including on civil space cooperation," Mr. Sharp said.

He said there were "some initial discussions looking at where there were mutual interests where we could cooperate with the Chinese," but there are no plans for future discussions. The two presidents had hoped to work on joint moon exploration and space-debris avoidance.

Bush administration officials said the suspension is meant to signal U.S. displeasure with the anti-satellite weapon (ASAT) test, as well as Beijing's failure to provide an explanation for its space arms program.

"Clearly it makes it more difficult to go down the path of cooperation when they're testing ASAT weapons," one official said.

China fired a missile on Jan. 11 that released a nonexplosive warhead that destroyed a Chinese weather satellite 530 miles above the Earth by ramming it at high speed. Thousands of pieces of the destroyed satellite are in orbit and could damage or destroy some of the hundreds of U.S. and foreign satellites, U.S. officials said.

In Beijing yesterday, amid growing criticism over the ASAT test, a Chinese spokesman repeated Beijing's past call for an agreement banning space weapons, a proposal that has been rejected by the Bush administration.

"Since other countries care about this question and are opposed to weaponization of space and an arms race in space, then let us join hands to realize this goal," said Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Jiang Yu when asked about U.S. and Japanese criticism of the test.

Both China and Russia in 2002 proposed adopting a treaty to ban deployment of space weapons during a session of the U.N. Conference on Disarmament in Geneva. Until last year, U.S. space cooperation with China was curbed over China's human rights abuses, including the 1989 Tiananmen massacre, and national security worries in the Pentagon that space technology transfers would boost China's military.

Robert Joseph, undersecretary of state for arms control and the administration's point man for space security policy, said yesterday that the space weapons test was a shock. It shows space is a "contested environment" and that "countries are developing capabilities to put at risk our assets for which we are dependent," he said.

"This is a wake-up call," Mr. Joseph said, noting that the United States needs "to ensure that we take the steps necessary to protect the space assets and the right to unfettered access to space."

Also, the space arms test should be viewed in the context of China's large-scale buildup of both strategic and conventional forces, not just their space weapons, he said.

Mr. Joseph said he is surprised by the muted international response to the test. "I think there has been very little outrage expressed," he said. "Just imagine the international reaction if the U.S. had conducted such a test."

On Capitol Hill, Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher, California Democrat and chairman of the House Armed Services strategic forces subcommittee, said China's action poses a "major problem and something the world community needs to address."

"We're now stuck with hundreds of pieces of this Chinese satellite for a hundred years, and it's having an impact on the entire global commons," she said, noting that there needs to be "common norms and acceptable rules of behavior in space."

Mrs. Tauscher called for engaging the Chinese and others in talks on space weapons, saying that while Beijing's ASAT test was "irresponsible and unacceptable ... sticking our heads in the sand isn't going to make it better; it will only make it worse."

U.S. intelligence officials said China has sought to obtain U.S. military space technology through espionage and other covert means but has been curbed by U.S. security measures.

"They've had trouble getting it through the back door so they decided to come in through the front," a defense official said.

Among the technologies sought by the Chinese are dual-use civilian and military goods used in maneuvering spacecraft, including propulsion and battery know-how, which have applications for anti-satellite guidance systems, the defense official said.

Joint U.S.-China space cooperation was first raised last spring by China's deputy space agency administrator, Luo Ge, shortly before the summit. He said China wanted to take part in the International Space Station, including making modifications on the orbiting station that would allow Chinese spacecraft to dock.

China launched its first manned spacecraft last year and has embarked on a major space program, that, unlike the NASA's program, is run entirely by the Chinese military.

U.N. Hopes China Pushes For Darfur End (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

AP, February 2, 2007

The United Nations hopes the Chinese president will push for a solution to the Darfur crisis during his landmark visit to Sudan on Friday. But Khartoum expects its staunchest diplomatic ally to stick to boosting commercial ties, particularly those assuring its access to Sudan's oil.

DOJ_NMG_0126293

The road to Khartoum's airport was lined with the red banners of communist China and the flag of Sudan's Muslim fundamentalist regime on Thursday ahead of Hu Jintao's two-day visit, the first by a Chinese president to Sudan.

China, which is the biggest foreign investor in Sudan and buys two-thirds of the country's oil exports, has used its veto-wielding status at the U.N. Security Council to prevent harsh measures against Sudan over the Darfur conflict.

But Beijing has raised expectations that Hu may pressure Khartoum to show flexibility in ending Darfur's bloodshed.

In an unusual foray into the field of human rights, Chinese officials have called on Sudan to cooperate with the United Nations in finding a solution in Darfur. China usually avoids such public pronouncements under its proclaimed policy of refusing to interfere in what it considers other countries' internal affairs.

More than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million chased from their homes in Sudan's remote western region since 2003, when ethnic African rebels rose up against the central government. On Thursday, an African Union peacekeeper was killed by unidentified gunmen in a Darfur refugee camp, the 11th peacekeeper to be slain in the conflict.

Sudan has resisted demands that it allow U.N. peacekeepers into the region, calling the deployment "neocolonial."

Khartoum has sought to keep the focus of Hu's visit on the two nations' booming economic ties. "This visit is going to be a great boost for the distinguished Sudanese-Chinese relations in various fields," Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir said, according to the official SUNA news agency.

Al-Bashir "commended the various Chinese investments in the Sudan, particularly in the domains of oil, agriculture and dams," said SUNA after the president met Thursday with the Chinese National Petroleum Corp.'s head of operations in Sudan.

The Sudanese economy grew by 12 percent last year according to the International Monetary Fund. Chinese investment has helped boost production of the country's prime resource — oil — which has risen to an output of 500,000 barrels a day.

China is also funding large projects such as the $1.8 billion Merowe hydroelectric complex. Hundreds of Chinese engineers and workers are believed to be living in Sudan, though no one at China's embassy was available to confirm figures.

"We like it here, it's promising for business," said Daisy Wan Chu, an employee at Mr. Wang, one of the flourishing Chinese restaurants that offer a rare alternative to Sudanese cuisine in Khartoum.

Hu's visit came amid signs that the Sudanese leadership was grudgingly moving toward acceptance of a compromise deal for U.N. troops to merge with the African Union force and form a joint peacekeeping mission.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon urged China to help persuade Sudan to accept U.N. peacekeepers during a meeting with Chinese U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya last week.

"We certainly hope Hu will deploy his substantial influence in order for Khartoum to have a more constructive approach to international efforts," said Lawrence Rossin of the Save Darfur Coalition, a grouping of humanitarian and rights organizations.

Khartoum is accused of responding to the insurgency with indiscriminate killings, and by unleashing the janjaweed militias of Arab nomads. The janjaweed are blamed for the worst atrocities in the conflict, which the White House and others have labeled genocide.

The government denies these charges, and denounces as neocolonial the U.N. Security Council plan to replace an overwhelmed African Union force in the region with some 22,000 U.N. peacekeepers.

In a phone interview, Rossin pointed to Chinese officials' recent comments on Darfur and to the fact that news about the crisis are now regularly allowed to appear in China's government-controlled media as signs that Beijing may be willing to press Sudan on the issue.

Diplomatic circles also sense that China's patience "is growing thin" with Khartoum on the Darfur issue, said Sudan expert Colin Thomas-Jensen of the International Crisis Group, a New York-based think tank.

He said China gave the impression it wants to become "part of the solution" to the crisis.

"But if Sudan follows its usual pattern of saying 'yes' to the international community and then doing 'no,' we don't know how China will react," he said.

Pressure On China As President Heads To Sudan (AFP)

By Mohammed Ali Saeed

AFP, February 2, 2007

International pressure was on China to try its hand at peace diplomacy as Chinese President Hu Jintao headed to war-racked Sudan, the highlight of an eight-nation tour of Africa.

China's energy-hungry economy -- the fourth largest in the world -- is badly in need of Sudan and other African countries' resources and Beijing is for the first time showing willingness to use its influence to solve the Darfur crisis.

During his two-day visit to Khartoum, Hu was expected to hold talks with President Omar al-Beshir on the situation in the western region of Darfur, where a conflict between the government and rebels has been raging unabated.

DOJ_NMG_0126294

"I believe this visit will not only boost bilateral ties, but also peace and stability in this region," Assistant Foreign Minister Zhai Jun told journalists before Hu set off on his tour.

No other country has more clout on the Khartoum government than China, which absorbs 60 percent of Sudan's total oil output and has repeatedly used its UN Security Council veto power to block further sanctions on the regime.

Led by Washington, the international community has been pressing Khartoum to accept the deployment of UN peacekeepers in Darfur, where African Union troops have failed to quell the bloodshed.

But Beshir has consistently rejected such a move, accusing the United Nations and western powers of seeking to invade his country and plunder its resources.

"If the Chinese put some pressure on Khartoum, it might have some potential," said the Save Darfur coalition's Larry Rossin, who recently travelled to Khartoum with US envoy Bill Richardson.

"I hope they can use their influence... to press President Omar al-Beshir to implement in good faith the hybrid peacekeeping agreement," Rossin told AFP.

Khartoum has yet to approve the final phase of a three-stage plan for UN forces to supplement the African contingent.

"It is encouraging that the Chinese government has been trying to have a very cooperative partnership and relationship with all African countries," UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said, according to the Chinese agency Xinhua.

At least 200,000 people have been killed and more than two million displaced in Darfur since fighting broke out four years ago.

China has had deep economic ties with Sudan since the 1990s, when other foreign companies pulled out because of the raging north-south civil war.

The China National Petroleum Corporation has huge stakes in Sudan's oil industry, producing around 500,000 barrels per day. China is also building a dam on the Nile, which is currently Africa's largest hydro-electric project.

Trade deals are expected to be signed during Hu's visit, further boosting bilateral trade that reached 2.9 billion dollars in the first 11 months of 2006.

Hu received a warm welcome Thursday in Liberia, the second leg of his tour of the continent.

He began his tour Tuesday in Cameroon, where he approved grants and loans worth more than 54 million dollars, signing a draft agreement on scrapping Cameroon's debt to China and a series of health and educational accords.

Emphasising its commitment to Africa, China said this week it would write off debts owed by 33 African countries as part of a multi-billion-dollar pledge made last year.

Hu's Trip To Sudan Tests China-Africa Ties (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, February 2, 2007

KHARTOUM, SUDAN

Chinese President Hu Jintao's arrival in Sudan Friday could well mark a turning point in China's growing relationship with Africa.

If Mr. Hu announces more investment and development projects, as promised at Beijing's summit of 43 African heads of state this past November, then China will cement its position as the continent's new business partner of choice. If he buckles to pressure from Western governments, and makes future aid dependent on Sudan's actions to halt the brutal civil war in Darfur, then African leaders will see that even China's aid comes with strings attached.

Whatever happens, Hu's visit to Sudan will be historic.

"It is a true partnership, and the Chinese are probably not getting the biggest share of it," says Abdul Rahim Ali Mohammad Ibrahim, a pro-Sudanese government analyst and director of the Institute of Arabic Language Study in Khartoum. "The Chinese are using it as a showpiece. It would be easy for China to tell other African countries, 'Come see what we've done in Sudan.' "

With the global race for African resources well under way, Mr. Hu's eight-nation Africa tour caps a portentous week, coming on the heels of the African Union summit in Ethiopia, and new UN Secretary-General Ban Ki Moon's five-day Africa visit.

Chinese investment has become the new driving force for economic development in Africa – with African-Chinese trade reaching $40 billion and Chinese aid expected to reach $10 billion in 2009 – and many African countries see China as their ticket to prosperity. Chinese aid is especially attractive, because it comes without all the troublesome conditions that Western donors tend to place on clean governance and human rights.

Nowhere is this more true than in Sudan. As a recipient of Chinese aid since 1959, and a close trading partner since Chinese investment jumpstarted Sudan's dormant oil industry in the late 1990s, Sudan has always felt that its friendship with China extended beyond economics.

Pressure over Darfur

DOJ_NMG_0126295

Now with the UN pushing Sudan to halt the humanitarian crisis in its Darfur region – a three-year civil conflict that has claimed the lives of more than 200,000 civilians and displaced 2.5 million more – and to accept UN peacekeepers, Sudan looks to China for high-level diplomatic support.

It's an expectation that Sudanese observers say may be increasingly hard to match.

"I don't think Sudan will benefit from the visit of the Chinese president," says Khalid Tijani El-Nour, a political commentator and editor in chief of the Sudanese business weekly Elaff. "China has huge economic relations with the United States ... so China is not supporting Sudan 100 percent. China has never promised to use its veto [to block UN action against Sudan over Darfur]. They have advised the Sudan government to be flexible, to find a political solution for Darfur."

The best China can do is "bridge the gap and minimize pressure on Sudan," adds Mr. Tijani. "China is a very important power, so this trip gives us some relief, but on the other hand, Sudan is facing a challenge in its relations with China. There are other African countries asking China to come in. Nigeria and Angola are also producing oil. We have to wake up. We are not the only players on the ground."

Lure of oil trumps stability concerns

Despite Sudan's political turmoil, and history of decades of civil war, the lure of oil and other natural resources, and access to the third largest country in Africa, has proved irresistible for China. In addition to Chinese investment in Sudan's oil industry, which supplied China with 7 percent of its energy needs last year, China has also invested $2 billion in the Merowe hydropower dam project. When it opens in 2008, the Merowe will meet Sudan's entire demand for electricity, and allow it to sell the excess to other African neighbors.

Sudan's oil fields, mainly in the southern region, today produce an estimated 500,000 barrels a day, up from 300,000 barrels last year. But that same southern oil belt is a land where a 50-year civil war between the Arab-dominated Sudanese government and Christian and animist black African minorities ended two years ago with a peace agreement.

Almost immediately after the North-South war ended, the conflict in the western region of Darfur began.

"China was more interested in doing business with the government of Sudan, to the detriment of the people of Darfur," writes Ali Trayo the spokesman for the Darfur rebel group, the Sudanese Liberation Army, in an e-mail. "It is in the general interest of the people of Sudan, and Darfur in particular, and that of China itself to exert pressure on the government of Sudan."

While Darfur rebel groups welcome the world's attention, one senior opposition leader says that the West's preoccupation with Darfur could be counterproductive, and even dangerous.

"I consider the West naive," says the opposition leader, speaking on the condition of anonymity from his home in Khartoum. "Instead of being involved in the oil business, and putting pressure on the dictator of the day, they have abandoned us. And believe me, when you abandon us to the hands of the Chinese, you are leaving Sudan quite naked."

The more the West pushes Sudan into a corner over Darfur, the more the Sudanese people will learn to hate the West, says Professor Ibrahim. "In my opinion, neither the US nor the Europeans can compete with China on its trade and development policies, so they want to push China out."

But that's not likely to happen any time soon. China's famous reluctance to intrude on other countries' sovereignty and its long-term investment approach allows it to overlook disagreements with the current government, says Ibrahim.

"China is very farsighted. Nothing is lost because of their cooperation with one regime. If that regime is overthrown, they work with the next government, too. They may offer advice, but they continue to invest, and this sustainability is the result."

In Africa, China's Expansion Begins To Stir Resentment (WSJ)

By Yaroslav Trofimov

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

CHAMBISHI, Zambia -- Chinese President Hu Jintao embarked on an upbeat tour of Africa this week, doling out aid and lauding China's growing economic and political ties with the continent.

But there is little love for China in this ramshackle township, which had to be dropped from the agenda of President Hu's weekend visit to Zambia because of likely unrest.

Set amid rolling hills in Zambia's copper belt, Chambishi was supposed to be a showcase of Sino-African friendship. China's state metals conglomerate, China Non-Ferrous Metal Mining (Group) Co., bought the mothballed copper mine here in 1998, bringing plenty of jobs and investments. Initial gratitude, however, quickly turned into seething discontent, as the new Chinese owners banned union activity and cut corners on safety. In 2005, dozens of locals were killed in a blast at the Chinese explosives facility serving the mine -- the worst industrial disaster in Zambia's history. Then, the following year, protesting Zambian employees were sprayed with gunfire. "The Chinese, they don't even consider us to be human beings," complains Albert Mwanaumo, a former Chambishi miner who says he was shot by a Chinese supervisor. "They think they have the right to rule us."

DOJ_NMG_0126296

Similar feelings of resentment about China's unfolding scramble for influence in Africa are beginning to bubble up across the continent. African leaders still hail China's burgeoning involvement as a solution to Africa's woes and a welcome alternative to the West. But among ordinary Africans, appreciation of this unprecedented influx of Chinese investments, products and settlers isn't nearly as uniform. Recognizing this opinion shift, South African President Thabo Mbeki has repeatedly cautioned in recent weeks that China risks replicating in Africa a "colonial relationship" of the kind that existed under white rule.

These concerns testify to China's maturing as a global economic and political superpower, a force that's beginning to challenge world-wide influence of the U.S. and Europe. That's especially true here in Africa, a continent dismissed by many Westerners as a hopeless case, and treated by Beijing as a high-priority area of national interest.

Nowhere has this grass-roots backlash been stronger than in Zambia. In elections last fall, opposition leader Michael Sata ran for president on a platform of outright China-bashing, unleashing against Beijing the same kind of fury that populist radicals in Latin America or the Middle East direct at the U.S. "Zambia is becoming a province -- no, a district -- of China," he thundered. "We've removed one foreign power and we don't want another foreign power here, especially one that is not a democracy."

Widespread Support

Though Mr. Sata failed to dislodge the China-backed incumbent, his Patriotic Front movement secured widespread support: It now controls Zambia's capital city Lusaka and most municipal governments in the nation's copper-rich mining areas. Following the Zambian campaign, similar political sentiments came to the open in neighboring countries, such as Namibia, Zimbabwe, Angola and Lesotho.

"Among ordinary people, a very strong resentment, bordering on racism, is emerging against the Chinese," says Henning Melber, a former activist in Namibia's struggle for majority rule who now heads the Dag Hammarskjöld Foundation think tank in Sweden. "It's because the Chinese are seen as backing the [African] governments in oppressing their own people."

China's hunger for raw materials is the main reason why it's become so involved in African affairs. Sino-African trade in 2006 more than quadrupled to more than $55 billion since 2002, and is expected to hit $100 billion by 2010. Angola has overtaken Saudi Arabia as China's main source of oil, with large-scale supplies also flowing from Sudan and Nigeria. Chinese companies have sought Guinea's bauxite, Namibia's uranium, and the assortment of rare metals that are found in the Congo, formerly known as Zaire.

In Zambia, a landlocked country of 11.5 million, the main draw for China is copper -- and the recent outcry is rooted in the tragic events that followed China's investment at the mine in Chambishi. China Non-Ferrous Metal Mining purchased the mine, which had been shuttered since 1987, for $20 million. It stepped forward after a Canadian company that had initially won the tender pulled out of the deal. Investing more than $100 million in the property, the Chinese conglomerate's Zambian unit, called NFC Africa Mining PLC, restarted production in late 2001, ramping up output to reach 50,000 metric tons of copper concentrate last year.

Dozens of Chinese managers and supervisors settled in the township, a maze of trash-strewn dirt alleys set across the paved road from the mine. Inside the mine itself, a red Chinese flag was hoisted above a wall covered with inspirational words of Wu Bangguo, chairman of the standing committee of the National People's Congress: "To Rouse Yourself in Vigorous Efforts to Make the Company Prosperous!"

As part of its prosperity plan, the mine's management paid Zambian employees less than the minimum wage, currently $67 a month, and strictly prohibited union activity, according to employees and union officials. A 2004 memo to staff, which still hangs inside NFC Africa offices, warned of "severe punishment" for anyone attending meetings of the "so-called action group [of union organizers], which is illegal." People suspected of union involvement were fired on the spot, says Gillian Mubanga, the current union leader at the mine.

To drive up production and save on costs, NFC also established on the Chambishi property a joint venture with the Beijing General Research Institute of Mining and Metallurgy. Dubbed BGRIMM Explosives Ltd., it set out to manufacture cheap explosives for the region's mining industry. "BGRIMM -- Turning Your Rocks Into Gold," boasted advertisement billboards that still dot the roadsides across Zambia's Copper Belt region.

Then, one sunny morning in April 2005, Chambishi was rocked by a huge blast. Earth shook and windowpanes broke in nearby houses. A runaway chemical reaction turned the BGRIMM facility into a giant fireball, pulverizing the entire structure. A total of 46 Zambian employees of BGRIMM were killed, their charred body parts strewn around the smoldering crater. Eyewitnesses say the Chinese staff had hurriedly driven away from the site shortly before this explosion occurred. Local residents theorize that the Chinese realized something was about to happen and didn't bother warning African employees before fleeing themselves.

Anger Intensifies

Unable to identify individual remains, the victims' families have had to bury plastic bags packed with flesh randomly collected at the site. Anger against the Chinese was intensified by widespread belief that safety rules had been flouted in pursuit of profit at the plant. "The Chinese didn't care about our children -- they just sacrificed them," said Iris Chibuye, a grieving mother whose 24-year-old son Sledge and 27-year-old daughter Vennie, a computer technician educated in Britain, both died in the BGRIMM disaster.

DOJ_NMG_0126297

Though the Chinese government sent condolences to victims' families, and eventually paid compensation of about $10,000 per killed employee, the anger didn't abate. As the Zambian government began an inquiry into the accident, the absence of union oversight was cited as the key cause of safety failures at BGRIMM. Public pressure made it impossible for the mine's management to continue prohibiting union activity any longer.

In November 2005, NFC Africa deputy CEO Wang Xiaowei shook hands with Zambia's National Union of Miners and Allied Workers leader Albert Mando, and signed a collective agreement that finally installed new safety measures and promised a salary increase. Assuring that the company treats its Zambian workers as "family members," Mr. Wang also urged the union "to understand that the high operational costs may often compromise the working conditions of employees," according to NFC Africa's in-house newsletter.

After drawn-out negotiations with the unions, NFC Africa set July 25, 2006, as the date for giving its workers back pay, in accordance with the new agreements. Miners had been expecting payments of as much as $500 each -- but were told on payday that they would receive only a few dollars, and in some cases even owe money to the company. On the evening of July 24, night-shift miners, stunned to hear that they wouldn't be getting the expected cash, stopped work, vandalized equipment and beat up a Chinese supervisor. The following day, furious morning-shift employees blocked the main road in Chambishi with tree trunks and stones, marching toward the mine.

As a scuffle broke out at the gate, mine security fired at one of the protesters, wounding him. According to witnesses, as false rumors that he had been killed spread across Chambishi, another group of about 40 NFC Africa miners from a later shift rushed toward the residential compound of Chinese employees, set on a winding road inside the township.

At the white-and-blue gate into the walled compound, a Chinese supervisor, known to the Zambian miners simply as Mr. Qui, took out a shotgun and opened fire as the crowd approached, according to witness accounts. Hit by the shots, three demonstrators collapsed on the ground, blood gushing out. Mr. Mwanaumo, a 34-year-old jackhammer operator who says he didn't take part in the initial protest, ran to the site after hearing that a close friend had been shot. As Mr. Mwanaumo pulled his injured comrade away, a new volley of fire burrowed into his back. According to his medical report, two lead fragments are still lodged in his body, too close to the vital organs to be safely extracted in the local hospital.

A day after these shootings, Mr. Qui hastily left Chambishi. Mr. Mwanaumo, like the other wounded workers, was fired. Feeling too sick to work, he spends his days in a tiny, dark hut set amid sewage-soaked mud, hoping that relatives and friends will collect enough money to file a compensation lawsuit.

Investigation Continues

The Zambian government investigation into the incident is still continuing, as is the inquiry into the 2005 BGRIMM disaster. Xu Riyong, NFC Africa's company secretary and manager of administration, declined to discuss the details of these events, or elaborate on Mr. Qui's status, saying that the company has already made a comprehensive report to the Zambian government on the matter.

"By complying with the laws of Zambia, we are confident that no problems will come to us," said Mr. Xu, the only NFC Africa official who agreed to be interviewed for this story. "We will do our best to run this mine successfully. We have to keep quiet and to keep working. Why should we fear?"

The Zambian government has so far apportioned no blame for the Chambishi tragedy. In an interview, Zambia's minister of mines, Kalombo Mwansa, declined to forecast when the investigations into the explosion and the shootings at the mine might be concluded, when the report will be released, and whether any penalties might be levied against the Chinese company. In the meantime, he said, NFC Africa's BGRIMM affiliate has been allowed to rebuild and reopen an explosives factory at the site of the 2005 tragedy. NFC Africa has also announced that it will invest $220 million into a crude-copper smelting plant in Chambishi. President Hu was scheduled to visit Chambishi this weekend to lay the cornerstone for the smelter -- but, according to Zambian officials, this part of his schedule was called off because of planned protests by miners and families of BGRIMM explosion victims.

The risks in Chambishi are real. Sitting next to Mr. Mwanaumo, the worker who was shot in July, a friend currently employed by NFC Africa warned of even bloodier unrest to come at the mine. "There will be a strike soon if they don't improve our salary, and a lot of people will die," he said. "This time the police won't be able to contain us." The management seems to be getting the message. On a recent afternoon, workers were busy at the Chinese staff's Chambishi residential compound. Perched on the perimeter wall, they reinforced fortifications, installing a new row of high-voltage fencing atop an existing layer of spiky glass shards.

DOJ_NMG_0126298

China Gets Cold Feet For Foreign Investment (WP)

By Ariana Eunjung Cha

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

SHANGHAI -- "I know you don't know that you don't know."

Those insulting words, thrown out by a Chinese man to a Westerner, are the punchline of an Internet commercial that ends with a beautiful Chinese bride jilting her confused Western fiance for the Chinese hero.

The wildly popular video was created by Baidu, a Chinese search engine, to poke fun at its U.S. competitor, Google. It is but one of the growing signs that China is rethinking its stance on foreign companies and investment within its borders.

Since the mid-1990s, China has aggressively courted foreign investment, crediting capital from abroad with helping it become a world economic power. In recent months, however, the Chinese government, saying it needs to protect homegrown companies from unfair competition, has thrown a multitude of new regulations at foreign firms seeking to do business in China.

While some believe the new restrictions -- which affect several sectors, including real estate, retailing, shipbuilding, banking and insurance -- may be only temporary measures to control growth, others worry that there's a larger political issue: that economic nationalism or even protectionism is rising.

"A mood of self-questioning has swept over China," said Barry Naughton, an economist at the University of California at San Diego. In a report published in the China Leadership Monitor, Naughton said he believes the regulations are a response to government fears of a "loss of economic sovereignty."

China's shifting policies on foreign companies have prompted several U.S. firms, which complain that the new rules are too restrictive and overly complex, to reassess their plans in China.

Last month, eBay said it would close its Web site in China, saying it was facing difficulties because Chinese regulations limit the types of financial transactions foreign companies can conduct. In November, Warner Bros. International Cinemas, part of Time Warner, which had been planning a massive expansion in China, abruptly announced plans to close operations in the country. It cited a recent policy change that no longer allowed foreign companies to control domestic theaters except in a handful of large cities.

The Chinese government steadfastly maintains that it still embraces the policy known as gaige kaifang-- literally, reform and opening up -- initiated by Deng Xiaoping in 1979. However, several Chinese officials have in recent months called foreign investment "malicious" and promised "severe measures to curb and punish hostile takeovers aiming to monopolize the Chinese market."

China remains the largest recipient of foreign direct investment among developing economies. But after a decade when heavy capital flows from abroad were credited with bringing the country out of poverty, that investment is leveling off.

According to the Commerce Ministry, foreign investment in 2006 decreased 4 percent from the year before, to $69.5 billion. The United States' piece of that dropped 6.4 percent, to $2.87 billion. (China receives additional investment from American companies that, for tax purposes, have their headquarters in places like the Virgin Islands.)

The significance of the new regulations has been debated at the highest levels -- U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez said it was a key subject of the Cabinet-level talks with Beijing in November -- and on Internet bulletin boards where the Baidu-Google video has been distributed under the headline "economic nationalism."

Negative publicity on blogs and chat rooms linked to by popular Chinese portals Sina.com and Sohu.com is credited with fueling criticism of several high-profile deals.

For instance, the District's Carlyle Group tried in 2005 to buy an 85 percent stake in Xugong Construction Machinery, a market leader. Xiang Wenbo, chief executive of a state-owned rival company, wrote on his personal blog that the government shouldn't permit the sale of valuable strategic assets like Xugong. After he and other opponents waged a months-long online campaign against the deal, Carlyle scaled back its offer, taking a 50 percent stake.

Albert Keidel, a former U.S. Treasury official now at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, said there seemed to be a sense among ordinary Chinese citizens of "how much are we going to allow foreign companies to continue to take advantage of us?"

Egged on by a public concerned about the growing influence of foreign companies, the Chinese government in July placed restrictions on the purchase of real estate by foreign individuals and institutions. The next month, it put a moratorium on foreign acquisitions of brokerages and limited the competitiveness of foreign-funded retail companies.

In November, the government issued new guidelines for cross-border mergers and acquisitions, making it more difficult for foreign companies to be involved in deals with companies related to "national economic security" or those that have a "famous trademark" or "traditional brand."

DOJ_NMG_0126299

In a report issued last month, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development complained that the new regulations were so vague that they "may have a serious unintended discouraging effect on investments."

Some economists, however, say fears about Chinese nationalism and protectionism are overblown. Zhao Xijun, a professor of economics at Renmin University, said that rather than being seen as a hostile move against foreigners, the restrictions should be seen as "progress to a mature market."

Kenneth Louie, a visiting professor of economics at the Johns Hopkins-Nanjing University Center for Chinese and American Studies, points out that the United States limits technology transfers to China and restricts foreign purchases in defense industries.

"There are certain sectors China believes are vital to economic security, and there is a fear of a high level of foreign intrusion. The United States also has similar fears," he said.

Keidel said China has in a short period moved from a closed economy where foreign capital was not allowed to one that welcomes it, particularly in such areas as financial services, one of the key conditions China agreed to when it acceded to the World Trade Organization.

The conditions China ratified were quite specific and provided an industry-by-industry timetable. The new foreign-investment regulations do not seem to violate the letter of these conditions, Keidel said, though some parties have complained that they go against the spirit of the WTO agreement.

Richard Ji of Morgan Stanley Hong Kong said some companies have used China's new rules as an excuse for their own marketing or strategic shortcomings. He said that in the cases of Google and eBay, the companies' challenges have had more to do with failure to tailor the content of their Web sites to Chinese tastes and needs.

In the Baidu commercial about Google, the Western man begins by saying "I know" repeatedly as he stands, smirking confidently, next to his bride-to-be. But after the Chinese man bursts on the scene and the two get into a war of words, the Westerner becomes confused. By mistake, he says, "I know I don't know that I don't know" -- at which point the disgusted bride runs away.

So the commercial is "not about nationalism and protectionism," Ji said. "It says that it's localization that gives success. If you localize services, it means you understand the people you are selling to."

Russian TV Shines Warmly On A Likely Successor To Putin (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 1 -- Every Sunday morning, two favorites of President Vladimir Putin play prominent supporting roles on a television game show called "Happy Bus." In sunny clips spliced into the show's airtime, Dmitri Medvedev and Sergei Ivanov hand out awards and urge young people in general to live healthy lives.

Ostensibly, the two men have perfectly straightforward reasons for appearing on the show: Each week, one team of contestants is sponsored by Gazprom, the state-controlled energy giant chaired by Medvedev. The opposing team is sponsored by the New Generation Foundation, headed by Ivanov, who is also defense minister.

But "Happy Bus" is widely viewed here as proof of the Kremlin's ability to commandeer the airwaves -- even the most trifling show -- to aid Putin in anointing a successor. By most accounts, the president has narrowed his choice to Medvedev or Ivanov, and over the last year each man's image, particularly Medvedev's, has been rigorously burnished. "Happy Bus" debuted in May on NTV, a network owned by a Gazprom subsidiary.

With the centralization of power in the Kremlin, Russian politics has become ever more tightly scripted, and genuine electoral competition has withered. Whoever turns out to be Putin's nominee will dominate television and almost certainly ride unimpeded through the presidential elections in early 2008, analysts said.

"Putin, Medvedev and Ivanov are the three main heroes, the three main characters on the news," said Anna Kachkayeva, a professor of broadcast journalism at Moscow State University. "It's a command from the administration."

Producers at Russian television stations, including the makers of "Happy Bus," declined to discuss coverage of Ivanov and Medvedev.

In presidential politics, Russia has an electoral college of one -- Putin. When Vladimir Ustinov, the former prosecutor general and a perceived favorite of the security services, started making some very president-in-waiting noises last year, Putin fired him. He was rehired as justice minister, a much less influential position.

Putin himself denies he is the decider. "There will be no successors. There will be candidates for the post of president of Russia," he said Thursday at his annual news conference, which this year ran to three hours and 30 minutes and was attended by about 1,200 journalists. "I reserve the right to express my preference. But I will only do it once the election campaign begins."

DOJ_NMG_0126300

Since the reelection of Boris Yeltsin in 1996, when a group of media tycoons threw the full weight of their television stations behind his faltering candidacy and demonized his Communist opponent, tight management of broadcast journalism has been a critical instrument in Russian presidential elections, including Putin's two campaigns.

But unlike in 1996, when the power of television was wielded by wealthy businessmen, today those media assets are controlled by the state or companies loyal to the Kremlin.

Ivanov, 54, has long been well known both at home and abroad as minister of defense. Medvedev, 41, was an obscure figure until 15 months ago.

In November 2005, Medvedev and Ivanov were simultaneously made first deputy prime ministers, in addition to their other titles. Since then, Medvedev's public image, down to his haircut (shorter and more stylish), weight (he's clearly lost a few pounds) and choice of clothes (more casual), has been carefully refashioned.

The makeover has become the talk of the town. The wooden, cautious and loyal official of a year ago has become a self-confident and assertive politician tinged with some very Putinesque characteristics -- in particular, his occasionally brusque scoldings, sometimes directed at other ministers, delivered with the colloquial phrases and tightly coiled physicality that many Russians love in their president.

Speaking in November about improving health care and access to drugs, Medvedev said: "There are swindlers who manufacture pharmaceuticals. Then there are other swindlers who sell those pharmaceuticals, and there are still other swindlers who act as intermediaries using state funds. The situation in the pharmaceutical industry is disgusting."

Medvedev, who is married and has one child, is a lawyer by training and first worked with Putin in the city administration of St. Petersburg in the 1990s. Putin brought him to the Kremlin, where he became chief of staff in the presidential administration. He is regarded as a relatively liberal counterweight to the staffers around Putin who served in the security services. Medvedev has no background in the KGB or its successor agencies.

He never publicly criticizes Putin, however. And he defends Gazprom, where the Kremlin placed him in charge in 2002, from charges that it is secretive, bloated and inefficient, and is used by the state as a political weapon to punish neighboring countries. On television recently, he called Gazprom a "crucial Russian company" and noted that its capitalization has jumped from $10 billion to $225 billion under state control.

Increasingly, Medvedev speaks of his modest background. "Just like everyone else, I lived in the kinds of apartments that used to be given to Soviet citizens, first a communal one and later a cramped apartment in St. Petersburg," he said in a television interview in November. "And like everyone else, I went, and still go, to a polyclinic," the state-run outpatient facilities that many Russians avoid.

For all the campaign-style insights he offers into his background, Medvedev remains studiously ambiguous about his ambitions. "I find it distressing that I have been made a participant in some sort of race," he said.

Nonetheless, he is now the second-most-popular politician in Russia after Putin, according to opinion polls and analysts.

In a poll conducted in November by the independent Levada Center, 38 percent of respondents said they would vote for Medvedev for president, making him the leading candidate. Ivanov trailed with 23 percent. Little more than a year ago, Medvedev's rating was barely above zero.

While image-building is not unique to Russia, and Medvedev's new position in government ensured he would get more news coverage, the almost universally friendly treatment he has received on Russian television has been striking.

Among 2,064 news stories on Medvedev in 2006, there was not a single negative report on the news broadcasts of six television channels, including the three major national stations, according to a survey by Medialogia, an analytical group in Moscow. There were 17 negative reports on Ivanov, most of them centered on a brutal hazing incident in the military to which he was slow to respond, according to Medialogia.

Other potential candidates are not treated so kindly. In the same period, there was not a single positive report on Mikhail Kasyanov, a former prime minister and Putin critic who has said he may seek the presidency. Of the 40 stories in which Kasyanov was the main subject, 60 percent were negative and the balance neutral, according to Medialogia statistics.

The Kremlin declined a request to allow a Washington Post reporter to accompany Medvedev on a typical daily event; he is normally covered by a small pool of reporters.

Assigned as a frontman for the government's spending priorities -- generous social programs to revamp health care, education and housing and reverse a population decline -- Medvedev has been transformed into Santa Claus in the public mind, according to Vyacheslav Nikonov, a political analyst with close ties to the Kremlin.

"He has good PR, doing good, practical things for the country," Nikonov said. "Every image is deliberately cultivated, but that is not different than what goes on at the White House."

Last week was typical. Three of the national channels, ORT, RTR and NTV, ran expansive reports Wednesday night on a meeting chaired by Medvedev in which he talked about raising the birthrate and other projects. Medvedev held up a certificate that will guarantee cash payments to women who have a second child, and his remarks were spliced with images of cooing babies in maternity wards.

DOJ_NMG_0126301

No critic of the management of the so-called National Projects was quoted on any of those news reports.

"The National Projects are an imitation of activity," Ivan Melnikov, deputy chairman of the Communist Party, said in parliament last month. "Upbeat TV pictures that we see practically every day have nothing to do with the real state of things."

"He is being built up, and he is changing himself," said Igor Bunin, head of the Center for Political Technologies in Moscow, referring to Medvedev. "The first task was to get people to recognize him. . . . The next task was to associate him with most pleasant things from the state. He cuts all the ribbons now.

"At the beginning, he was soft, like a teddy bear, but now he seems much stronger. Like Putin, he can summon up some thunder and lightning when he criticizes incompetent officials."

Bunin added, "There may be no final decision, but he is candidate number one, with Ivanov in reserve."

Putin Denies Using Energy As A Weapon (FT)

By Neil Buckley

Financial Times, February 2, 2007

Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, on Thursday hit back at accusations that the country was using energy as a weapon, saying critics were deliberately distorting its policy of moving to market prices for oil and gas supplies to former Soviet neighbours.

In a three-and-a-half hour annual press conference – much of it on live television – Mr Putin insisted Russia had helped safeguard the sovereignty of newly-independent states after the collapse of the Soviet Union. But he said subsidies could not go on for ever.

"We must not subsidise the economies of other countries in large amounts, comparable with their budgets. No one else does that. Why do they demand that we should do it?" he said.

He added that new pricing and tariff arrangements agreed with transit countries such as Belarus and Ukraine were aimed "precisely at ensuring the interests of key consumers" in western Europe, despite temporary disruptions to supplies last month and in January 2006.

He said "experts" understood what Russia was doing, and should be thankful to Moscow.

"But instead, we can see unfair attitudes to interpretation of those events. Naturally, this has been done by those who are not well disposed to Russia. I am not saying that this has been done on a national scale, but there are such forces. Those who write about it, they are the ill-wishers," the Russian president said.

Mr Putin also insisted the transition to his successor, when he stands down as president in 2008, would be democratic and not orchestrated. He stressed several times during the press conference that "the Russian people will make their choice".

He hinted he would indicate which candidate he favoured as a successor – but only after the presidential campaign had begun.

"I reserve the right to express my preferences. But I will do it only once the election campaign starts," Mr Putin said.

Dmitry Medvedev and Sergei Ivanov, both promoted to the rank of first deputy prime minister in late 2005, are seen as vying to be the favoured candidate to succeed Mr Putin. But speculation has been intensifying about how and when the Russian president will mark out his choice.

Any successor, he added, would face the task of maintaining rapid economic growth, which Mr Putin said was expected to come out at 6.7 to 6.9 per cent last year, and which delivered 13 per cent increases in average wages and retail sales. But other big challenges were to narrow the yawning gap between the richest and poorest Russians, and diversify the economy away from reliance on natural resources.

Asked about the murder of Alexander Litvinenko, the former KGB officer, Mr Putin said only the courts and investigators could determine who was responsible. But he reiterated comments by other senior officials that Mr Litvinenko had been an insignificant figure not considered a threat by the Russian authorities.

"He was not privy to any secrets, he had been convicted in the Russian Federation for abuse of office, specifically, for beating people when arresting them when he was a security man and for stealing explosives," Mr Putin said. "All the negative things he could have said about his previous employer, he had already said a long time ago."

Blair Gives 2nd Interview In Inquiry About Graft (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0126302

LONDON, Feb. 1 — After a news blackout lasting six days, the British police acknowledged Thursday that officers interviewed Prime Minister Tony Blair a second time last Friday over allegations that high honors had been traded for campaign contributions.

The interview itself was unusual, as was the decision to cloak it in secrecy. Mr. Blair is said by British political analysts to be the first prime minister to be interviewed by the police while still in office. Only on Wednesday, Mr. Blair's official spokesman was asked at a routine briefing for reporters whether the prime minister had been approached by the police a second time and he replied that "nothing had changed," according to the prime minister's Web site (www.pm.gov.uk).

But the broader impact of the development was to cast an ever darker shadow over the closing days of Mr. Blair's almost 10 years in office — a period that began with his promises that the Labor administration, in contrast to its Conservative predecessor, would be "purer than pure."

Mr. Blair has been questioned by the police as a witness, not as a suspect. The first interview was in December. After that a senior aide, Ruth Turner, was formally arrested and questioned not only in the honors inquiry but also on suspicion of failing to cooperate with or trying to frustrate the investigation.

Then, earlier this week, Lord Levy, the prime minister's chief fund-raiser, Middle East envoy and tennis partner, was arrested for a second time to be questioned in relation to the same offense, known in Britain as perverting the course of justice.

Around 90 people have been questioned in the inquiry, which concerns payments equivalent to $27 million made as loans to the Labor Party before the May 2005 national election. At that time, campaign financing arrangements offered as loans did not require public disclosure. Mr. Blair's critics have charged that the money was made available in return for promises of knighthoods or seats in the unelected and prestigious House of Lords.

The prime minister's office said in a statement on Thursday that Mr. Blair had been "briefly interviewed by the police as a witness. At the request of the police this was kept utterly confidential and, as a result, the press and communications team in Downing Street were not informed. As far as they were concerned nothing had changed."

In a separate statement, the police said that they had requested secrecy for unspecified operational reasons, and that the meeting with the prime minister had been sought "to clarify points emerging from the ongoing investigation." All of the politicians drawn into the inquiry have denied wrongdoing.

Mr. Blair was interviewed shortly before he flew to Davos, Switzerland, to attend the World Economic Forum, where he seemed untroubled by events back home as he rubbed shoulders with the rich, the powerful and the famous. For all that, his adversaries pounced on Thursday's announcement as evidence that the emerging scandal could stain Mr. Blair's final months in office before he redeems a pledge made last fall to relinquish power this year. "It is clear that this inquiry is going to haunt Tony Blair throughout his last months in office and beyond," said Sir Menzies Campbell, leader of the smaller opposition Liberal Democrats.

For Blair, Round 2 Of Police Questions (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 1 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair has been interviewed for a second time by police investigating allegations that his Labor Party offered seats in the House of Lords and other government honors in exchange for cash, police and Blair's office said Thursday.

Police interviewed Blair for about 45 minutes last Friday but asked Blair's office "for operational reasons" to keep the meeting secret until Thursday, police and Blair's office said in statements. Police said Blair was "interviewed as a witness, not as a suspect and cooperated fully" in an inquiry in which the prime minister's top fundraiser and a top adviser have been arrested on suspicion of hampering the investigation into the widening scandal.

Known here as the "cash-for-honors" probe, it has further damaged a leader whose approval ratings have been badly hurt by his enthusiastic support of the U.S.-led wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Blair was first questioned by police in December at his 10 Downing Street office, the first time a sitting British prime minister had been questioned by police in a criminal inquiry.

"Blair's position is looking more and more difficult as each day goes by," said Iain McLean, professor of politics at Oxford University.

Blair, who took office in May 1997, announced last year that he will step down before his party's annual conference in September. But as the scandal widens, political opponents are increasingly calling for Blair to resign sooner.

David Cameron, leader of the opposition Conservative Party, directly challenged Blair in Parliament on Wednesday at the weekly Prime Minister's Questions session when he said that Blair's authority to lead was "draining away" and that he should resign immediately "in the national interest."

"When is Mr. Blair going to realize it is all over?" Cameron asked.

DOJ_NMG_0126303

Since at least last April, police have been investigating allegations that Blair's government has enticed political donors with promises of appointments to the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament. Blair and other Labor officials have denied those allegations, but four people have been arrested either on suspicion of offering honors for cash or for "perverting the course of justice" -- which has led political opponents to allege a coverup.

No one has been charged with a crime, and police have stressed that the investigation is a "cross-party" probe into campaign finance irregularities.

But only Labor supporters have been arrested. Blair's chief fundraiser, Michael Levy, has been detained twice. A top Downing Street aide, Ruth Turner, has also been arrested, as have Christopher Evans, an entrepreneur and major Labor Party donor, and Des Smith, a Labor government adviser. All were later released and have denied wrongdoing.

Chancellor Gordon Brown, Blair's presumed successor, this week urged people not to rush to judgment about allegations of wrongdoing or coverup. "I believe when people see the full facts, then they will be satisfied," Brown said.

Official Says U.S. Willing To Help Cuba (AP)

By Traci Carl

AP, February 2, 2007

U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said Thursday that Washington is willing to help Cuba make the transition to a more open, democratic society.

Speaking to reporters during a one-day visit to Mexico, Gutierrez said the U.S. supports a "peaceful transition to democracy."

Ailing Cuban leader Fidel Castro has been seen only in government-released videos and photos since ceded power to his brother Raul in late July while he recovers from intestinal surgery.

On Tuesday, Cuban state television released images of a stronger-looking Castro meeting with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, a close ally.

Gutierrez, who was born in Cuba, said the United States does not plan to meddle in Cuban politics but wants to see the country make the transition to democracy.

"The future of Cuba is in Cuba," he said, but added that "if we can be of help, we are ready to help in that transition."

Gutierrez did not elaborate, but last September he suggested that Cubans could work with the Organization of American States and other groups to hold a referendum on whether they want to live in democracy.

Gutierrez also said Thursday that President Bush's administration is working to pass an immigration reform that would allow the United States to protect its borders while recognizing the millions of people who already work illegally in the country.

"Unless we tackle the problem in a comprehensive fashion, it is just going to get worse," he said.

He said the U.S. must find a middle ground between "amnesty" and "animosity" and he spoke out against mass deportations, saying: "That's not humane or moral."

Gutierrez also praised a recent anti-drug crackdown launched by new President Felipe Calderon and said he expects Calderon to take action against Mexican industries that have been accused of monopolistic practices, such as telecommunications and television.

"We believe President Calderon is off to a strong start, and he'll need time to do what he needs to do," Gutierrez said.

Europe Faults U.S. Farm Proposal (WSJ)

By Juliane Von Reppert-bismarck

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

BRUSSELS -- The European Commission expressed disappointment at a U.S. plan to overhaul subsidies to its farmers, saying "more ambitious cuts" are required to relaunch a stalled round of global trade talks.

The White House's proposal to Congress on how to overhaul the U.S. Farm Bill will make "extremely modest" cuts to loan-deficiency payments and keep payments to dairy and sugar farmers "virtually untouched," said EU farm spokesman Michael Mann.

The U.S. initiative, presented to Congress Wednesday, foresees cutting total farm spending to $87 billion over the next five years, down $18 billion from the total spent by the U.S. on basic programs and disaster assistance during the past five years.

Much of this is based on the assumption that farm prices remain at their current high levels, Mr. Mann said. A reversal of price trends will see trade-distorting farm support rise once again, he said.

"The U.S. will need to propose more ambitious cuts and disciplines," Mr. Mann said. "We had hoped the administration's proposal for the new farm bill would signal this more clearly," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0126304

Global trade talks at the World Trade Organization ground to a halt in the summer, largely over the unwillingness of wealthy countries to cut protective measures for their farmers. Most trading nations now say it is up to the U.S. to revive the talks with a promise of deep and lasting subsidy cuts.

WTO spokesman Keith Rockwell said officials were still studying the 183-page document, but added, "it is a positive first step."

The plan, announced by U.S. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, still needs approval by Congress. Analysts expect key aspects to come under attack, notably a $360,000 subsidy ceiling for U.S. farmers.

EU officials and diplomats warned an overhaul that makes limited cuts to market-distorting payouts sends a bad signal to negotiators at the WTO. Yet Washington has pointed out that if a palatable deal can be struck at the WTO, commitments made there will override any domestic farm plan.

Farm products account for less than 7% of world trade, and for 4.5% of U.S. exports. Political sensitivities over the sector in rich countries, and dependence on the sector in the developing world, have nonetheless placed it at the heart of a global trade round expected to tear down trade barriers and boost global wealth.

EU farmers slammed the plan, which they said paves the way for farm supports to increase.

"Either the U.S. is simply not serious about wanting a WTO agreement or it wants one at the expense of all farmers in the world except its own," Rudolf Schwarzboeck and Donal Cashman, presidents of Europe's leading farm lobby, said in a joint statement.

The White House plan would increase spending on farm projects that boost conservation and the environment -- a method of cutting direct production subsidies employed by the EU in its own farm-payment cuts. It would also put more emphasis on making payments to farmers that aren't tied to production.

Trade and development advocacy group Oxfam Wednesday praised the Bush administration for attempting to steer U.S. farm policy "in a new direction." The farm plan also foresees allowing farmers to grow fruit and vegetables on land eligible for subsidies.

The plan, which underlines an increasing desire in Washington to cut U.S. dependence on fossil fuels and simultaneously guarantee farmer income, reserves $2.1 billion in loan guarantees for plants that make ethanol fuel from wood chips, grasses and feed stocks other than corn and provides $1.6 billion to research noncorn sources of ethanol.

Solution For Kosovo (WP)

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

TODAY U.N. envoy Martti Ahtisaari is due to travel to the Balkans to kick off what should be the final resolution of Serbia's conflict with the province of Kosovo. It's been eight years since the United States led a NATO military operation to stop an ethnic cleansing campaign by Serbia against Kosovo's Albanian majority; since then the Connecticut-size territory of 2 million has been governed by the United Nations. NATO troops, including Americans, are still there.

All along it's been obvious what the permanent solution must be: the recognition of Kosovo as an independent nation, with protections for its Serb minority. The question has been whether that outcome can be arranged without a diplomatic or even military blowup -- between Kosovo and a Serbia still infected by belligerent nationalism, or between the West and an increasingly troublesome Russia.

The Bush administration is cautiously optimistic that the transition can be pulled off in the next several months. But it will take some deft Western diplomacy and, in the end, probably some American toughness.

A measure of the deftness has already been supplied by Mr. Ahtisaari, a former Finnish president who has been working on the issue for more than a year. Recognizing that Serbia and its ally Russia would strongly oppose a U.N. resolution explicitly granting Kosovo full independence, the envoy will propose that the Security Council adopt a measure ending the current U.N. regime but not mentioning independence.

The province would continue under international supervision, with the European Union to be given a major role, but would be allowed to join the United Nations and other international organizations. Once the Security Council approved these terms, Kosovo's Albanian-led government could declare independence and would win quick recognition from the United States and most European countries. Serbia could object but not stop the new arrangement.

The pitfalls along this winding course are easily spotted. Serb militants in Kosovo could respond violently to an independence declaration, as could Albanian nationalists disappointed that independence is not complete. Would-be Serb splinter states could appear in northern Kosovo or neighboring Bosnia. Russian President Vladimir Putin could trigger a crisis by vetoing the U.N. resolution. Or he could accept the resolution and cynically use it as a precedent to recognize the independence of Moscow-backed separatist regions in pro-Western Georgia or Moldova.

DOJ_NMG_0126305

That's where U.S. firmness might be needed. The Bush administration has avoided responding to multiple Russian provocations in recent months, the most recent being Moscow's sale of antiaircraft missiles to Iran.

If Mr. Putin decides to make trouble over Kosovo, the United States will either have to push back or abandon allies it has supported against aggression: the Kosovo Albanians, or Georgia's liberal democratic government. The administration ought to make clear now that it will not go wobbly.

Ulster's Last Holdout (NYT)

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

Northern Ireland has lost thousands of lives, billions of dollars in economic opportunity and decades of democratic self-rule to what its people euphemistically call "the troubles." One man now has it in his power to help this British-ruled province finally put this lamentable era behind it and move on to a brighter future — or to stand in the way. That man is the Rev. Ian Paisley, the fiery Protestant preacher, now 80 years old, who leads the province's largest party, the Democratic Unionists. Mr. Paisley, though, has yet to rise to the moment and acknowledge that the times have changed and his former foes have changed with them.

To say that Mr. Paisley has not built his long career on compromise would be a breathtaking understatement. But in the past he could point to the maddeningly ambiguous declarations of his foes — the Irish Republican Army and its political arm, Sinn Fein — to justify his unyielding stubbornness. Not any more. Over the past two years, the republican side has taken the decisive steps it had long dodged.

The I.R.A. has destroyed its weapons. According to the independent commission set up to monitor Northern Ireland's paramilitary groups, it has followed through on its commitments to dismantle its clandestine apparatus and end all organizational involvement in criminal activities. This week, Sinn Fein voted to cooperate with Northern Ireland's reformed police service, a historic turnabout for a movement that once considered itself at war with the old Protestant-dominated police force.

Yet Mr. Paisley has so far seemed unable to acknowledge these historic changes. He needs to state plainly that his party's conditions for forming a power-sharing cabinet with Sinn Fein, as called for by the 1998 Northern Ireland peace agreement, have now been met. In the hope that Mr. Paisley will eventually do the right thing, Britain's prime minister, Tony Blair, has called new Northern Ireland elections for next month.

This is Mr. Paisley's last chance to leave a constructive, forward-looking legacy. If he continues to live in the past, the promise of self-rule will be postponed indefinitely. And one man will be to blame.

DOJ_NMG_0126306

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, February 02, 2007 8:31 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Friday, February 02, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070202.pdf; agnb070202.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

4th Circuit Panel Questions Administration's Detainee Policy..4
Federal Jury Acquits Two In Hamas Funding Trial 5
DOJ Officials Brief Senators On Arar Case.....6
Chinese Official Issues Rebuke Of Bush's "Unilateral" War On Terror.....6
Guantanamo Detainees Complain About Saddam Execution Poster.....6
CIA Agents Sought By Germany Tracked Due To Stay In Resort Island 6
British Terror Suspects Brought To Court.....7
European Bank Told To Stop Sharing Data With US Antiterror Investigators 7
LATimes Calls For End To Renditions.....7

Homeland Response:

NID Nominee Says He Would Resist Attempts To Politicize Intelligence 7
Judge Explains Dismissal Of Anthrax Defamation Lawsuit.....8
Changes To Armed-Pilot Program Intended To Boost Participation 8
Survey Finds Poorest Gulf Coast Residents Still Struggling To Recover From Katrina.....8

War News:

Senate Debate To Pit McCain Versus Warner Resolutions 9
Casey Says Bush's "Surge" Calls For More Soldiers Than Needed To Pacify Baghdad..... 12
Suicide Attack Kills 45 At Baghdad Market 13
Administration Delays Release Of Evidence Backing Claims On Iran..... 14
Afghan Parliament Urges Amnesty For Citizens From Past Wars..... 16
Pentagon Reorganizes Non-Fatal Casualty Statistics On Web Page..... 17

DOJ:

DOJ Concedes Prosecutorial Misconduct In MA Mob Slaying Case.....17
Massachusetts Federal Prosecutor Heading To Main Justice.....18

Corporate Scandals:

Senate Report Finds SEC Mishandled Pequot Probe 18
Investors Sue Dell Alleging Improper Accounting 18
DOJ Probes Siemens For Possible Bribery 19
AOL Case Heads To Jury After Three Months Of Trial 19
LATimes Criticizes Bid To Crack Down On CEO Pay.....19

Criminal Law:

FBI Agent Testifies At Libby Trial, Casting Doubt On Libby's Veracity.....20
Crackdown On Online Gambling Freezes Funds.....21
Jury Convicts New York Drug Kingpin Of Rivals' Murder Plot.21
Judge Revokes Bail Of Former UN Official Charged With Bribery.....22
Coke Trial Jury Deadlocked, But Judge Says To Continue Deliberations 22
FBI, New Jersey AG Investigating Nonprofit's Land Deal 22
South Florida Genovese Capo Pleads Guilty To RICO Charges.....22
Phoenix FBI Agents Arrest Priest Wanted For Assault In Nevada.....23
Indiana Man Pleads Guilty To Katrina Relief Fraud.....23
Massachusetts Man Sentenced To Four Years In Prison For Defrauding Cisco.....23
Judge Revokes Bail Of Alleged Pennsylvania Child Pornographer 23
Report Warns Of Increasing Deaths, Imprisonment Of Reporters.....24
Inmate Who Escaped With Official's Wife Is Sentenced 24
Mother Reunited With Abducted Boy.....24

DC Transit Police Cracking Down On Metro Robberies 24
"Failure To Appear" Charges Face Opposition In Connecticut 25
Kaine Questions Expansion Of Death Penalty In Virginia 25

Civil Law:

FEC To Examine 527 Group Activities 25

Civil Rights:

DOJ Suit Claims Pennsylvania Apartments' No-Dog Policy Discriminates Against Blind 26
DOJ Settles Voting Rights Allegations With New Mexico County 26
Mississippi Voting Rights Trial To Resume February 15 26
Alabama Appeals DOJ Ruling On County Commissioner's Appointment 27
Texas Deputy At Center Of Furor Over Convicted Border Agents 27
DC Hairdresser Sued For Sexual Harassment 27
Florida To Abandon Touch-Screen Voting Machines 28
55% Say Military Should Let Gays, Lesbians Serve Openly ... 28

Antitrust:

US Subpoenas PackerKiss Securities In Bond Probe 28
Microsoft Plans To License Instructions In Bid To Pacify EU 28
United Airlines CEO Sees Mergers As Still Viable 29

Environment:

Report Expected To Heighten Pressure On Governments To Reduce Emissions 29
Judge Mulls Release Of Material From Rocky Flats Grand Jury 30
CDC Issues Guidelines For Battling Flu Pandemics 30
Army Corps Releases Locations Of 122 Substandard Levees 31

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Drug Kingpin Sentenced To 40 Years 31
"Operation Dawg Pound" Targets Bloods Gang In New Jersey 32
Federal Officials' Handling Of Afghan "Drug Lord" Case Scrutinized 32
St. Kitts Man Gets 11-Year Sentence In Cocaine-Smuggling Case 33
Georgia Man Faces Attempted Murder Charges Following Drug Investigation In New York 33
Former Maryland Teacher Gets 6-Year Sentence In Meth Case 33
ATF, FBI Probing Similar Bombs Found In Kansas City, Chicago 33
13 In San Diego Charged With Weapons Violations In "Operation Colt .45." 33
Connecticut Gun Dealer Pleads Guilty To Federal Violation . 34
ATF Gang Probe Leads To Drug Charges Against Two In Washington 34

Immigration:

Judge Rules Louisiana Law Banning Illegal Immigrants From Driving Unconstitutional 34
Texas Immigration Raid Nets 53 Arrests 35
Martinez Endorses Guest-Worker Measure 35

Tax:

Protective Order Granted In Nebraska Tax Case 35
Judge Rejects Tax Shelter Once Sold By KPMG 36

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Seek $70 Billion Savings From Medicare, Medicaid 36
Bush To Propose Large Boost In Pell Grants 36
Portman Defends Bush Budget Plans 37
"Emergency" Bill Expected To Include Unneeded Spending 37
Democrats Put Imprint On 2007 Spending Measure 37
OMB Deputy Director Suggests There Has Been Too Little Congressional Oversight 38
Bush Approval Edges Up To 38% In Fox News Poll 38
Bush Says Cheney Optimistic, Not Out Of Touch 38
Senate Passes Minimum Wage Hike With Business Tax Cuts 38
Bush Says Healthful Diet Is Individual, Not Government Responsibility 39
Democrats Rescue Bush Global Health Package 40
Bush Administration To Give Vaccine Companies Immunity From Avian Flu Suits 40
FDA Reform Proposals Contain "Bitter Pills" For Pharmaceutical Companies 40
Congress Moves Quickly On Children's Health Insurance Program 40
Senate Democrats Urge Stricter FCC Rule Enforcement 40
Frank To Push For Data Privacy Laws 41
Two More Lawmakers Criticize Baca, But Don't Resign From Hispanic Caucus 41
NYTimes Calls For More Protection For Federal Judges 41

Other News:

Bush, Democrats Painting Dramatically Different Economic Pictures 41
GOP Fundraising Slow Since Election Defeat 42

DOJ_NMG_0126309

Sharpton Grills Biden Over Remarks On Obama 43
Obama's Multicultural Background A Sticking Point For Some African-Americans..... 43
Clinton Asking Top Donors To Raise At Least $1 Million 44
Simon Says Edwards Emphasizing Sacrifice To Demonstrate Authenticity..... 44
McCain, Giuliani No-Shows At Some Conservative Events.... 44
'08 Hopeful Hunter Targeting Social Conservatives 45
Gore Nominated For Nobel Peace Prize 46
Oil Price Stability Said To Be Key To Energy Security 46
Lindsey Criticizes Move To Ease Union Representation 46
Teaching Said To Be Among Better Paid Professions 46
NYTimes Calls For Bipartisan Trade Consensus 46
WSJournal Urges Utah To Adopt School Voucher Plan 47
Rice To Seek Support For Renewed Mideast Peace Push... 47
Street Protests Pose Challenge To Lebanese Army..... 47
US Considers Re-Establishing Relations With Somalia 47
Sectarian Violence Rising In Pakistan 48
US Expresses Hopes For Progress On Deal With Pyongyang 48
US Suspends Space Ventures With China 48
UN Hopes China's HU Will Push For Resolution On Darfur During Visit..... 48
China's New Rules On Foreign Investment Spark Concern .. 49
Russian TV Aids Putin In Anointing Successor 49
Police Interview Blair About Cash-For-Honors Scandal..... 49
Gutierrez Says US Willing To Help Cuba Transition 50
European Commission Critical Of US Farm Proposals..... 50
WPost Urges Bush Not To "Go Wobbly" On Kosovo 50
NYTimes Urges Ulster's Paisley To Support Peace Process 50

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 51

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 52

DOJ_NMG_0126310

TERRORISM NEWS:

4th Circuit Panel Questions Administration's Detainee Policy. The New York Times (2/2, Liptak) reports, "In a series of probing and sometimes testy exchanges with a government lawyer, two of three judges on a federal appeals court panel here indicated Thursday that they might not be prepared to accept the Bush administration's claim that it has the unilateral power to detain people it calls enemy combatants." The Times continues, "The case was brought by Ali al-Marri, a citizen of Qatar who is the only person on the American mainland being held as an enemy combatant, at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C. Mr. Marri, a legal resident whom the government calls a sleeper agent for Al Qaeda, was arrested in Peoria, Ill., on Dec. 12, 2001, where he was living with his family and studying computer science at Bradley University. … 'What would prevent you from plucking up anyone and saying, "You are an enemy combatant?"' Judge Roger L. Gregory of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit asked the administration's lawyer, David B. Salmons. … Mr. Salmons said the executive branch was entitled to make that judgment in wartime without interference from the courts. 'A citizen, no less than an alien, can be an enemy combatant,' he added." The Times adds, "Mr. Marri's appeal had been expected mostly to concern the impact of a new law, the Military Commissions Act, which says the courts have no jurisdiction to hear challenges from any noncitizen 'who has been determined by the United States to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant.' … But questions from Judge Gregory and Judge Diana Gribbon Motz suggested that the court might be willing to reach the more fundamental question of when and how such enemy-combatant determinations should be made."

The Washington Post (2/2, A6, Horwitz) reports, "Attorneys for Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, held for 3 1/2 years in the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., have contested the president's authority to indefinitely detain a lawful resident of the United States without charges. … If the government is right, said lawyer Jonathan Hafetz, 'they can pick up any immigrant in this country, lock them in a military jail and hold the keys to the courthouse. If this case stands, the United States could effectively disappear people.'" The Post reports that "administration lawyers contended that the Marri case is unique and does not represent a threat to immigrants with no ties to terrorist organizations." The Post adds, "Judge Diana Gribbon Motz questioned under what circumstances the president can order someone on U.S. soil to be detained as an enemy combatant. Under the traditional laws of war, she said, combatants are captured on a battlefield and connected to a nation or state at war with the United States. … Motz said that she is concerned about giving the government broad authority 'to pluck up anyone from the streets of the United States' and added: 'We don't want other nations to do that to our people.' … But Judge Roger L. Gregory suggested that Congress knew it was dealing with an 'amorphous enemy' when it passed the Military Commissions Act last year, creating a tribunal system for accused combatants such as Marri to challenge their status."

The Financial Times (2/2, Sevastopulo, Virginia) reports, "Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a Qatari citizen studying computer science in the US, was arrested in Illinois in late 2001 in connection with the investigation into the September 11 attacks. He was slated for a criminal trial in 2003 on charges including credit card fraud. … Just weeks before the trial, however, President George W. Bush classified Mr Marri as an unlawful 'enemy combatant' in the 'war on terror'. He was removed from the criminal justice system and transferred to a prison in South Carolina, where he has remained without direct access to his family. The administration has designated hundreds of detainees at Guantánamo Bay as 'enemy combatants'. … But lawyers for Mr Marri argued in a federal appeals court in Virginia on Thursday that Mr Bush did not have the authority to declare legal US residents as enemy combatants. 'The president cannot militarise the case of a man in Peoria [Illinois] with the stroke of a pen,' said Jonathan Hafetz, a New York University lawyer representing Mr Marri." The Times notes, "Critics say Congress intended the president to have the authority to classify only prisoners captured on the battlefield, not legal US residents or US citizens, as enemy combatants. … In court on Thursday, the Justice Department argued the battlefield in the 'war on terror' included the US. That view seemed to receive support from one judge on the three-member panel but another appeared to question the administration's argument, saying while Congress could have given Mr Bush the ability to declare legal residents and citizens as 'enemy combatants', it was unclear it had done so."

DOJ_NMG_0126311

Federal Jury Acquits Two In Hamas Funding Trial. The Washington Post (2/2, A1, Eggen) reports, "A federal jury in Chicago acquitted two men yesterday of charges that they were part of a long-running conspiracy to finance Hamas activities in Israel -- marking the latest defeat for the Justice Department in cases involving support for radical Palestinian groups." The Post continues, "Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former Howard University professor who lives in Springfield, and Muhammad Salah, 53, a former grocer from suburban Chicago, were found not guilty of racketeering conspiracy. The charge was the most serious allegation against them and could have drawn life sentences for each. … But the two men were found guilty of lesser charges: Ashqar was convicted of obstruction of justice and criminal contempt for refusing to testify in front of a grand jury, while Salah was convicted of obstruction for providing false answers in a civil lawsuit." The Post adds, "The case provides the latest example of the serious difficulties faced by the Justice Department in its attempts to prosecute supporters of radical Palestinian organizations. In the Chicago case, prosecutors faced the additional challenge of trying to punish activities that occurred before Hamas was declared a terrorist organization by the U.S. government in 1995."

The Chicago Tribune (2/2, Bush, Coen) reports, "Salah and Ashqar, a business professor living outside Washington, D.C., were found not guilty of the racketeering charges that could have resulted in life prison terms. The men were convicted of lesser charges including obstruction of justice, and their lawyers promised to fight to keep them out of prison altogether when they are sentenced in June." The Tribune continues, "The case was among the first to level allegations that America was being used as a fundraising base for a government-designated terrorist organization, but it was built largely on evidence that was more than a decade old. Some of that evidence was gathered in Israel—including what the defense contended was Salah's coerced confession—and involved conduct that occurred in the early 1990s, before the U.S. had given Hamas the terror designation. … Former U.S. Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft had announced the charges against Salah and Ashqar in a 2004 news conference in Chicago that heralded a significant shift in the Justice Department's approach to allegations about domestic support for foreign militant groups. … But Salah's lawyers said their win shows the government was overreaching. … 'It's a huge victory—what's left is a relatively minor charge,' said Salah's lawyer, Michael Deutsch. 'I think the jury rejected this idea that you can criminalize this kind of organizing activity under RICO [Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act] in the U.S.,' he said. 'It's a stretch.'" The Tribune notes, "Leaders of the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI in Chicago disagreed, and said the outcome of the Salah trial would do nothing to dissuade them from using the same tools again to fight terrorist organizations with branches or operatives here. … 'This case is not going to prevent us from aggressively pursuing terrorism and terrorism financing cases,' said Gary Shapiro, first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago"

The New York Times (2/2, Sander) reports that "after a three-month trial and 14 days of deliberations, a jury of seven women and five men rejected the core of the government's case and acquitted Mr. Salah and Dr. Ashqar of the most serious charge brought under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, that the two men used United States bank accounts to funnel money to Hamas's military leaders and were therefore responsible for the group's violent tactics against Israel." The Times continues, "Defense lawyers said the verdict was a blow to what they called the United States government's decision to litigate the dispute between Israel and the Palestinians in American courtrooms. … 'The government has tried to turn the Israeli-Palestinian conflict into something criminal,' said William Moffitt, who is Dr. Ashqar's lawyer. 'Maybe the government will get it in their heads that the conflict won't be settled in the criminal courts of the United States.'" The Times notes, "Prosecutors said they accepted the jury's decision, but also stood by the evidence they presented at trial. … 'This was about an organization that has publicly claimed credit over and over and over again for terrorist acts,' said Gary S. Shapiro, the first assistant United States attorney in Chicago, 'not just acts against the Israeli military, but acts against civilians where Americans and foreign nationals were killed.'"

The AP (2/2, Robinson) reports, "Salah, 53, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a one-time assistant business professor at Howard University in Washington, had been accused of laundering money for Hamas terrorists fighting to topple the Israeli government. … Defense attorneys portrayed the men as freedom fighters, comparing them to Nelson Mandela, Malcolm X and the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr." The AP adds, "Salah and Ashqar, who lives in Springfield, Virginia, have always denied being members of Hamas. But they have made no secret of their dislike of the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza."

DOJ_NMG_0126312

DOJ Officials Brief Senators On Arar Case. The Canadian Press (2/2) reports, "Two U.S. senators who have been briefed on the Maher Arar case say they have a lot more questions. … But Democrat Patrick Leahy and Republican Arlen Specter clammed up about what they were told by Justice Department officials today during a meeting that lasted an hour and 40 minutes. … They say the information is classified but wanted to assure people that the file was receiving a lot of congressional oversight." The CP continues, "The two senators say they want to know more about why Arar was sent to Syria and why the United States won't take him off its security watch list when he's been completely exonerated in Canada. … Leahy also wants the Government Accountability Office to look into Arar's case. The office is already conducting a study of how people make it onto the U.S. no-fly list." The CP adds, "Leahy angrily demanded answers from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a public hearing last month, saying the case was a black mark on the United States."

CNN The Situation Room (2/1, 4:29 p.m.) broadcasted, "It was one of the most heated confrontations we've seen in the US Senate in quite a while. It was when the Senate judiciary committee Patrick Leahy went after the Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. The whole debate focuses on a man named Arar," who "was held by the United States and deported to Syria on the suspicion he had terrorist tiles." After he was released he said "he was held and tortured for ten months," and Senator Leahy "was angry why that happened." Today, Leahy got a "briefing today from the attorney general," but the "only problem he couldn't say much about it, claiming it was all classified." Leahy said, "The conclusion I reached from the briefing today is that we've only begun to ask the questions and we have more questions that have to be asked." Just recently, the US "told Canada that the man remains under a US Watch List. However, Justice "will not talk about this."

Chinese Official Issues Rebuke Of Bush's "Unilateral" War On Terror. The New York Times (2/2, A6, Kahn, 1.16M) reports a senior Chinese government official issued "a rare public rebuke" of President Bush Thursday, "accusing him of waging a 'unilateral' battle against terrorists that had worsened global tensions." Ye Xiaowen, director of China's State Bureau of Religious Affairs, said in a front-page article in the overseas edition of The People's Daily that Bush's "past references to a 'crusade' and to 'Islamic fascism' were verbal gaffes that revealed his effort to turn the fight against terrorism into a religious war." Partly as a result, he said, the United States "had lost support for the war in Iraq and had frittered away the good will Americans gained after the 9/11 attacks." Ye wrote that Bush had "effectively 'hijacked' one religion, Christianity, to engage in a battle against another one, Islam."

Guantanamo Detainees Complain About Saddam Execution Poster. The New York Times (2/2, Rohde, 1.16M) reports that "military officials have removed a poster of Saddam Hussein from the American detention center in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, after complaints from a detainee that it was intended to intimidate the prisoners there." The poster was described by a detainee to his lawyers as a "7-by-3-foot poster, in a small recreation area for prisoners" that "featured images of Mr. Hussein being sentenced to death and a heading in Arabic that stated, 'Because Saddam chose not to cooperate and not to tell the truth, because he thought by lying he would get released, for that reason he was executed.'" In response, Cmdr. Robert Durand, "chief military spokesman in Guantánamo…said the lawyers' description of the statement on the poster was inaccurate, but he declined to give its exact wording" saying "the intent of this poster was to show that the Iraqi people are making progress and have delivered justice." Detainees also were provided news articles describing Hussein's execution and the "accidental decapitation of a Hussein co-defendant in a subsequent hanging" which their lawyers have described as "psychological warfare and for mental torture and intimidation."

CIA Agents Sought By Germany Tracked Due To Stay In Resort Island. The Washington Post (2/2, A11, Whitlock, 690K) reports from Berlin, "If not for the pit stops on a Mediterranean resort island, where they relaxed in four-star hotels and went to the spa for a massage, the CIA operatives who now face arrest on kidnapping charges in Germany would have remained safely in the shadows, according to German prosecutors." German "investigators said they received detailed records of the intelligence agents' stopovers on the Spanish island of Palma de Mallorca from Spanish police last year. The documents, which included the operatives' passport numbers, hotel bills and aviation records, enabled prosecutors to identify a CIA abduction crew that allegedly kidnapped Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen, in a bungled counterterrorism operation in early 2004. … It's not the first time that CIA officers have left a long trail of clues during an undercover counterterrorism operation in Europe. Italian prosecutors charged 25 CIA operatives and a U.S. Air Force officer with kidnapping a radical cleric in Milan in 2003 after investigators traced their cellphone logs and frequent-flier records. They also found that the operatives had racked up more than $150,000 in expenses while in Italy, including long stays at $500-a-night hotels."

DOJ_NMG_0126313

British Terror Suspects Brought To Court. The CBS Evening News (2/1, story 11, :20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Security was very tight today in Britain as nine terror suspects were brought to court," arriving "in a convoy of police vehicles. The nine, believed to be of Pakistani descent, are suspected of plotting to kidnap and behead a Muslim British soldier and then show it on the Internet."

Suspects' Neighbors Skeptical Of Charges. The New York Times (2/2, Perlez, 1.16M) reports many residents in the area of Birmingham, England, where the arrests were made, "said Thursday that they were unconvinced" of the accusations against the suspects. By most neighborhood accounts, "for example, one suspect, Amjad Mahmood, is a father of two in his late 20s who has worked tirelessly to keep his father's grocery business going and who has shown no discernible interest in Islamic affairs." Because of this and because of "recent instances of the British police arresting suspects and then releasing them for lack of evidence linking them to terrorism, people here said they were not convinced of the accusations against Mr. Mahmood and the other eight suspects. The public and startling nature of the arrests in predawn raids made them angry and dismayed, they said."

European Bank Told To Stop Sharing Data With US Antiterror Investigators. The New York Times/AFP (2/2) reports the European Data Protection Supervisor told the European Central Bank Thursday that it "must take action by April to stop the transfer of personal information from Swift, the bank-data consortium, to American authorities for use in antiterrorism investigations." The agency "told the bank to come up with measures 'to make its payment operations fully compliant with data-protection legislation,' urging it to 'take appropriate measures as soon as possible.'" AFP adds that Swift "has come under scrutiny for taking part in an American program that allows analysts from the Central Intelligence Agency and other agencies to search for possible terrorist financing activity among the confidential financial transactions that Swift oversees."

LATimes Calls For End To Renditions. The Los Angeles Times (2/2, 850K) says in an editorial, "There are plenty of legal and moral reasons why the CIA shouldn't be snatching terrorism suspects off the streets of Europe and shipping them to unsavory countries to be tortured. But there is a simple, practical reason why the Bush administration should forthrightly repudiate its disastrous rendition policy: The United States cannot prevent terrorist attacks without help from its European allies, and they will be less inclined to cooperate when confronted with a policy they rightly believe to be beyond the pale." The Administration "needs to gain cooperation with local authorities before snatching suspects, ban the outsourcing of torture and keep its word to allied governments about the treatment of detainees. We damage the cause of fighting terrorism together when we don't respect European laws. There can be no more disappearances, no more renditions and no more Masris."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

NID Nominee Says He Would Resist Attempts To Politicize Intelligence. USA Today (2/2, Willing, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush's pick for director of national intelligence told senators Thursday that he'll blow the whistle on the president or any other official who tries to skew intelligence reports for political purposes. 'There have been a number of occasions in my career when I had to not be popular but to speak truth to power,' J. Michael McConnell told the Senate Intelligence Committee at a hearing on his nomination. 'I've lived it, I've learned it, I believe it and I can only tell you that's what I'll do,' he said." McConnell's comments "came as committee Democrats, including Ron Wyden of Oregon and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, repeated now-familiar charges that the Bush administration had "cherry picked" intelligence about threats posed by Iraq in 2003. If confirmed, McConnell said, he would inform committee members if that occurs."

DOJ_NMG_0126314

Judge Explains Dismissal Of Anthrax Defamation Lawsuit. The New York Times (2/2, Labaton, 1.16M) reports, "A federal judge who dismissed a defamation lawsuit against The New York Times acted after concluding that the scientist who brought the case, a bioterrorism expert investigated over deadly anthrax mailings in 2001, was a public official and could not show that the newspaper had knowingly published false information. In an opinion released Thursday," US District Judge Claude M. Hilton "laid out the reasons for his order last month dismissing a long-running case brought by Steven J. Hatfill," but defense lawyer Mark A. Grannis "said Judge Hilton's opinion was unsurprising and was not the last word in the case."

The Washington Post (2/2, A8, Jerry, Lengel, 690K) reports, "Columnist Nicholas D. Kristof did not act with malice and did not believe his columns about…Hatfill were false," Hilton said. "Although the columns identified Hatfill as a 'likely culprit' in the deadly anthrax-spore mailings, Kristof 'made efforts to avoid implicating his guilt,' Hilton wrote. 'Mr. Kristof reminded readers to assume plaintiff's innocence, and highlighted the fact that plaintiff was viewed by his family and friends as a patriot who could not have perpetrated the crime in question.'"

Changes To Armed-Pilot Program Intended To Boost Participation. The Washington Times (2/2, Hudson, 88K) reports, "Homeland Security officials are making changes to the armed-pilot program to encourage more of the nation's 90,000 captains and co-captains to participate. Armed pilots will be issued badges to identify themselves, they will be allowed to carry their weapons on flights they are not piloting, and US officials will seek to expand the program for overseas flights." Conan Bruce, spokesman for the Federal Air Marshal Service, which now operates the armed-pilot program, said that a proposal to phase out air marshals in favor of the armed pilots in order to cut costs "is 'absolutely not' under consideration. … However, such a suggestion is coming from Capitol Hill, said one source familiar with the proposal. 'It is being advocated they use resources that are already in place, and that's the pilots, and use air marshals on targeted, high-risk and threat flights rather than scattered throughout the system like they are now,' the source said."

Survey Finds Poorest Gulf Coast Residents Still Struggling To Recover From Katrina. The New York Times (2/2, Dewan, 1.16M) reports a new study by the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University and the Children's Health Fund has found that many of "the poorest families" displaced by Hurricane Katrina "still suffer from a significant loss of income, a higher-than-normal rate of chronic diseases like hypertension and an exponential rise in mental health problems among children. The study, conducted in the Gulf Coast region of Mississippi a year after the storm," consisted of "face-to-face interviews with families living in private trailer parks, in Federal Emergency Management Agency trailer parks, or on their own property, usually in trailers provided by FEMA. The FEMA park residents, who are often isolated by lack of transportation, were the poorest and least financially stable, and the most likely to view their environment as dangerous. 'For all practical purposes, these FEMA trailer parks are in fact internal refugee camps,' Dr. Redlener said."

The CBS Evening News (2/1, story 10, 2:55, Keteyian, 7.66M) reported that the study's "most startling finding" was that "as many as 10,000 displaced children across the Gulf are now suffering from clinically diagnosed depression, a 400% increase from before the storm." Redlener was shown saying, "The loss of hope is a very powerful factor here." Gil Jamieson, the deputy director for Gulf Coast recovery for FEMA was shown saying, "We have families living with children. We're doing all that we can do to move those people into a permanent housing alternative as quickly as we can." Keteyian: "All you can do?" Jamieson: "We are." Keteyian: "That's not what I'm hearing in the camps and trailer parks. You know there's a great deal of anger." Jamieson: "Sure." Keteyian: "A great deal of hopelessness in those sites right now." Jamieson: "There is, indeed, and I think you need to look at that against the context of what we have accomplished." Keteyian: "FEMA has found emergency housing for more than 80% of those displaced by the hurricane, but that's little comfort to the residents still stuck in this trailer camp, ironically named Renaissance Village. FEMA recently signed a new four-year contract with the company that provides security here."

WSJournal Says Insurers Being Made "Scapegoats For Acts Of God." The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A18, 2.04M) editorializes, "Hurricane Katrina was ugly enough, but leave it to Gulf state politicians to guarantee that even a mild future hurricane may cause more human hardship. They're busy rewriting private insurance contracts in such a way that will raise property and casualty rates for everyone, especially if you live near the coast." The Journal states that the "populist opportunism" of Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood, who "has bludgeoned insurer State Farm into a gigantic settlement over hundreds of dubious claims," is also seen in "Florida, where legislators have passed a 'reform' that forces insurers to lower their premiums and allows the state-run insurer to co-opt the local market." The Journal continues, "More Americans are choosing to live in places at risk for natural calamity, only to seek a bailout from politicians when the worst happens. This trend is bad enough. But politicians compound the problem when they make insurers the scapegoats for acts of God."

DOJ_NMG_0126315

WPost Says Coast Guard Guilty Of Poor Contract Management. The Washington Post (2/2, A14, 690K) editorializes, "Though some of it is overblown," recent criticism of the Coast Guard's Deepwater modernization program "is deserved. The Coast Guard is guilty of one of the classic errors that other federal agencies within and without the Department of Homeland Security make all the time: poor contract management, an alarmingly -- and unnecessarily -- large source of government waste." Coast Guard chief Adm. Thad W. Allen's statements in front of "an irate House oversight panel," where he "took responsibility for the performance of his contract managers and detailed needed reforms to the service's contracting process" were "a start." The Post says, "After a year's time, the Coast Guard's retooling must be back on course or more drastic measures will be warranted."

WAR NEWS:

Senate Debate To Pit McCain Versus Warner Resolutions. The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Levey, Gaouette, 850K) reports, "The shape of the Senate debate over President Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq came into clearer focus Thursday as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz) and two other senators introduced a resolution to support the buildup. After weeks of back-and-forth negotiations over resolutions, it appears likely the Senate debate over the 4-year-old war will pit McCain's resolution of 'full support' against one introduced by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) that 'disagrees' with the president's proposal." But "how that debate is likely to turn out became even murkier Thursday as lawmakers continued to mull the details of the two lengthy resolutions." The Times adds, "Thursday afternoon, Sens. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) and George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who have criticized the troop buildup but have not endorsed any critical resolution, uncharacteristically rushed past reporters and into the Senate chamber." Meanwhile, "McCain and other senators escalated their attacks on the Warner measure and its supporters."

The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A4, Rogers, 2.04M) says Bush's "Senate allies want a vote next week calling on the Baghdad government to 'make visible concrete progress' toward 11 political, military and economic benchmarks." The McCain resolution "is designed to slow the momentum behind a tougher Iraq measure crafted by Sen. John Warner (R., Va.), the former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee." Sen. Joseph Lieberman, "the Connecticut independent who usually caucuses with Democrats, is among the sponsors, but the support comes overwhelmingly from Republicans" led by McCain. The Journal notes "a handful of liberal Democrats, notably Sens. Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, announced their opposition to the Warner language yesterday as too weak in its opposition to the administration's policy." And GOP Sen. Judd Gregg, "an ally of the White House, had surprised many this week when he said he was 'considering' supporting the Warner language." Yesterday, he said "he had decided not to vote for the measure."

The New York Times (2/2, Hulse, 1.16M) says the "shifting allegiances -- and the intense procedural gamesmanship preceding votes next week on Iraq policy -- left it uncertain whether Mr. Warner's compromise could attract the 60 votes needed to overcome procedural obstacles. Given the party divide in the Senate, it appeared that about a dozen Republicans would have to break from the president to allow the debate to move forward; he had only six Republicans firmly on board."

McClatchy (2/2, Talev, Schoof) notes "some key Republicans said they hadn't made up their minds, and Senate Republican Whip Trent Lott of Mississippi said he thought he could rally enough opponents to sustain a filibuster. 'I'm always working,' he said." Majority Leader Harry Reid "left open the possibility Thursday that he might bring in South Dakota Sen. Tim Johnson, who's recuperating from brain surgery, if Democrats need his vote to move the resolution forward. 'We'll have to see. He's doing very well,' Reid said in a brief interview with McClatchy Newspapers." But "Johnson's chief of staff said later that while the senator is making good progress, he physically wouldn't be able to return to the Senate to cast a vote by next week. While Reid stressed that there was no firm plan to try to get Johnson to the Senate to vote, the fact that he was willing to consider it demonstrates how fluid the parliamentary situation remains."

DOJ_NMG_0126316

The Washington Post (2/2, A4, Weisman, Murray, 690K) says "Democratic defections would probably not prevent the legislation from passing the Senate, provided that the measure gets to a final vote over a threatened filibuster by Republicans." But "defections would deprive Democratic leaders of a strong united vote against Bush's decision to boost troop levels in Iraq by 21,500." The Post adds, "Democratic leaders noted that the compromise puts them in a far stronger position to defeat a Republican-led filibuster against the resolution."

The Washington Times (2/2, Hurt, 88K) headlines its report "Majority In Senate Support 'Stay The Course' Resolution," and says "a bipartisan majority in the Senate yesterday united behind a firm 'stay the course' resolution on the war in Iraq, despite searing public criticism from both sides in Congress over President Bush's handling of the war." The resolution "is critical of the war's execution and condemns any effort by Mr. Bush to send reinforcements to the region. In the measure, the Senate also promises not to cut off funding for the increasingly unpopular war. … Although backers say they are deeply dissatisfied with the execution of the war, the resolution says that the United States 'should continue vigorous operations' in parts of Iraq and that early withdrawal 'would present a threat to regional and world peace.'"

The network newscasts largely ignored the McCain resolution. Instead, they focused on Warner's, and suggested it is gathering strong bipartisan backing. NBC Nightly News (2/1, story 2, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported on "an unusual joining of forces on Capitol Hill over the war. Senators in both parties seem to have agreed on a single one of those resolutions opposing the President's troop buildup." NBC (Reid) added, "A big development in the Senate today. A compromise between two groups of senators opposed to sending more troops to Iraq. One group is led by Democrat Joe Biden and Republican Chuck Hagel. The other by Republican John Warner who felt the Biden-Hagel resolution was too harsh. Today the two groups joined forces for the most part adopting Warner's language. Now on the eve of a major showdown, the Senate breaks down into three major factions. First, nearly all Democrats and at least half a dozen Republicans plan to vote for a nonbinding resolution opposing the President's troop buildup. The second faction, most Senate Republicans, who intend to support the President's plan. And third, a small number of liberal Democrats who say they won't vote for any nonbinding resolution."

ABC World News (2/1, lead story, 3:15, Tapper, 8.78M) reported passage of a Senate resolution "with a bipartisan majority…would be a harsh political blow to the President. But the worst thing for the White House is the man putting together the compromise legislation" is Warner, "a leading Republican." The resolution "has a good chance of winning a bipartisan majority. … To win Republicans, the bill now states that funding for troops in the field should not be cut. But that provision may cause defections by the Democrats' liberal wing, who are frustrated that a non-binding resolution does not actually do anything. And want to use the power of the purse to force the President to change course." Also on ABC World News (2/1, story 2, 1:30, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said, "This would be the first time the Senate would be on record opposing the President's policy. That has great moral and political force. It also puts the Senate and Congress one step closer to using their constitutional power to restrict funding for the war effort if the situation doesn't improve on the ground in Baghdad. There would be no more intermediate steps."

The Senate debate was extensively covered by local TV. Like the network reports, local broadcasts also focused on the Warner measure. Some examples: ABC affiliate WSET-TV (2/2, 11:22 pm) in Roanoke said "there seems to be little doubt that the Senate will pass a resolution opposing the measure. The questions are how tough the language will be and how many Republicans will go along. … A new compromise resolution, designed to win over more Republicans, gained momentum Thursday and will most likely be voted on early next week. … The Bush Administration has resigned itself to the fact that there will be a vote voicing opposition to the President's policy." Almost identical stories ran on many other ABC affiliates, including KFBB-TV Great Falls, MT (2/1, 10:13 pm), WJET-TV Erie (2/1, 5:18 pm), KXXV-TV Waco (2/2, 5:05 pm), and KABC-TV Los Angeles (2/1, 5:02 pm).

WFXW-TV Terre Haute (2/2, 10:02 pm) reported, "The Senate may be on the verge of a final agreement to oppose the President's surge plan, and the resolution getting support has been brought to the table by a Republican, Virginia Senator John Warner. It appears to satisfy some Republicans who were concerned that a strongly worded resolution could send the wrong message to the troops," but it also "meets the demands of many Democrats who had sponsored their own resolutions to stop the troop surge."

DOJ_NMG_0126317

KTVU-TV San Francisco (2/1, 5:15 pm) reported, "A bipartisan, nonbinding resolution offered by Democrat Carl Levin and Republican John Warner gained attention as it brought together important elements of earlier proposals. Key to some Republicans, it makes clear that funding for our troops will not be cut, and for Democrats, a strong call not to build up troop levels. But the White House says it's not a true solution."

On CNN's The Situation Room (2/1, Blitzer), DNC Chairman Howard Dean said, "The Democrats, in fact, are not split. And the resolution is not watered down. They changed a few words. I think this is a very smart move on the part of Harry Reid. If we can get significant numbers of Republicans to repudiate the Republican president's policy, which is about to happen, then I think that's very, very positive."

CNN's The Situation Room (2/1, Blitzer) interviewed Sen. Levin, who said, "There's a broad consensus against sending the 21,000 additional troops in the country and among Democrats. And if we can get 60 votes -- if we can get 60 votes to defeat a Republican filibuster against the Warner resolution, which I've co-sponsored, which says that we disagree with the President's plan to increase forces by 21,000, it would be a very dramatic statement of senatorial disagreement with the president and would be an important first step, we believe, in turning this ship around and forcing a change of course."

On MSNBC's Hardball (2/1, Matthews), Rep. Jack Murtha, who has just returned from a trip to Iraq with Speaker Nancy Pelosi, said, "One of the things we found in Iraq confirming the things we've been saying, we can't win it militarily. We don't think so. In our opinion, there's got to be some negotiations between the Shias and the Sunnis. And that doesn't look like it's going to happen. As a matter of fact, I told the Prime Minister of Iraq I wasn't about to recommend funding $5 billion for their equipment if they weren't more cooperative and if they didn't do some negotiations because I think that may help. I don't think it's going to win the war, but I think it will certainly help." Murtha said the Administration "understand[s] that the appropriation process -- we're building a case to actually divert some money from the surge to the resupplying and resetting our equipment."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (2/1), Morton Kondracke of Roll Call said, "Senator [Christopher] Dodd is exactly right. This is a resolution says we disagree with what the President wants to do, we want to oppose the status quo, and we're not going to do anything about it. We do not want them to increase the number of troops, we're not going to call for withdrawal of any troops. We're not going to cut off funds. So, it really is the status quo. And everybody acknowledges that the status quo is not working. So, I do not know what they think they're going to get done here, but it is a way of demonstrating dissatisfaction with the president, and that's the political impetus behind it."

Bush To Discuss Iraq With GOP Senators Today. USA Today (2/2, Kiely, 2.27M) reports, "As the Senate prepares to debate his plan to increase troop levels in Iraq…Bush will be trying to sell it Friday to an unexpectedly skeptical audience: senators from his party. Republican senators are scheduled to wrap up a day-long strategy session with a visit to the White House, where Bush will host a meeting and a reception." USA Today adds, "It could be an awkward visit: Some of the president's guests are leading an effort to put the Senate on record opposing Bush's plan to commit an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. Perhaps not coincidentally, many of the mutinous senators are up for re-election in 2008. At least seven of the 20 Republican senators due to face the voters next year already are on record expressing misgivings about the president's planned troop increase. Among them are Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., chief sponsors of the critical resolution that the Senate will begin debating Monday. Another Republican supporter of the Warner resolution, Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota -- one of the most vulnerable Republicans after winning with just 50% of the vote in 2002 -- expressed exasperation with Bush's policies in Iraq at a hearing earlier this week."

Making Case On Senate Vote, Snow Notes Bin Laden's Words About Lack Of US Resolve. CNN's The Situation Room (2/1, Blitzer) reported White House press secretary Tony Snow "is sending a harsh word of warning to those senators about putting their opposition to the president's new Iraq strategy on the record. He even invoked the name of America's most wanted terrorist." Snow was shown saying, "Osama bin Laden thought that a lack of American resolve was a key reason he could inspire people to come after us after September 11th. I am not accusing members of the Senate of inviting carnage on the United States of America. I'm simply saying you think about what impact it may have."

DOJ_NMG_0126318

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (2/1), Juan Williams of National Public Radio said, "At moment, the White House is involved in a very aggressive campaign to try to hold the line. They say to people, give us time, don't hurt the president, don't hurt the troops. That's the way they're posturing it. But, I mean, they're going against a tidal wave of public sentiment."

"Surge" Could Involve 48,000 US Troops, Cost Nearly Triple Bush's Price Tag. CQ (2/2, Oliveri) reports, "Democratic leaders questioned whether President Bush fully disclosed the size and cost of his plan to send additional troops to Iraq, citing a report that said it could require more than double the number of soldiers." The report by the Congressional Budget Office "found that Bush's decision to deploy 21,500 extra combat troops in Iraq actually could require a total increase of as many as 48,000 troops when support units are counted, and cost as much as $27 billion over 12 months. That cost is also far higher than the figure administration officials previously discussed." McClatchy (2/2, Rosen) says the surge "could cost as much as $10 billion this year, nearly triple the initial $3.2 billion price tag that Bush aides placed on the surge," according to the CBO. If "the additional troops remain in Iraq for more than a year, the CBO said, the cost could rise as high as $29 billion."

NIE Estimate Sees Strong Chance Of Further Deterioration, With Little US Control Of Outcome. The Washington Post (2/2, A1, Deyoung, Pincus, 690K) reports, "A long-awaited National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, presented to…Bush by the intelligence community yesterday, outlines an increasingly perilous situation in which the United States has little control and there is a strong possibility of further deterioration, according to sources familiar with the document." The NIE "comes to no conclusion and holds out prospects of improvement. But it couches glimmers of optimism in deep uncertainty about whether the Iraqi leaders will be able to transcend sectarian interests and fight against extremists, establish effective national institutions and end rampant corruption." The document "emphasizes that although al-Qaeda activities in Iraq remain a problem, they have been surpassed by Iraqi-on-Iraqi violence as the primary source of conflict and the most immediate threat to US goals. Iran, which the administration has charged with supplying and directing Iraqi extremists, is mentioned but is not a focus."

"Element Of Principle" In Feingold's Move To Cut Off Funding Praised. In a Wall Street Journal column (2/2), Kimberly A. Strassel writes, "The Senate is teeming with courageous souls these days, most of them Republicans who have taken that brave step of following the opinion polls and abandoning their president in a time of war. Meanwhile, one of the few senators showing some backbone in the Iraq debate is being shunned as the skunk at the war critics' party." Sen. Russ Feingold "held a hearing this week on Congress's constitutional power to shut off funds for the Iraq war, and followed it up a day later with legislation that would do just that. The Wisconsin pacifist might not understand the importance of winning in Iraq -- or the cost of losing -- but at least there's an element of principle to his actions. He's opposed the war from the start and his proposal to cut off money after six months would certainly end it. It also happens to be Congress's one legitimate means of stopping a war. … For a month the Senate has been trying to wrestle control of Iraq from the president, but undercover, and in a way that that avoids accountability. Sen. Feingold shone a light under that rock this week, and now the hard questions begin."

Casey Says Bush's "Surge" Calls For More Soldiers Than Needed To Pacify Baghdad.

The AP (2/2, Espo) reports, "The outgoing top US general in Iraq diplomatically aired his differences with the commander in chief on Thursday, telling lawmakers that President Bush has ordered thousands more troops into Iraq than needed to tamp down violence in Baghdad." Casey "quickly added he understood how his recently confirmed successor, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, could want the full complement of 21,500 additional troops that Bush has ordered to Iraq. Casey said they could 'either reinforce success, maintain momentum or put more forces in a place where the plans are not working.'" USA Today (2/2, Brook, 2.27M) reports White House spokesman Tony Snow "said the president has talked to Casey, and 'Gen. Casey supports the plan.'" In fact, McClatchy (2/2, Schoof) says "Casey didn't criticize Bush's plan. He said that the three brigades it adds above his recommendation would give the new commander more flexibility."

The Washington Times (2/2, Scarborough, 88K) also says Casey "broke with his superiors, including…Bush, by telling a Senate committee he does not agree with their dire assessments that the Iraq war is failing. 'I do not agree that we have a failed policy,'" he said.

Much of the coverage of Casey's testimony focuses on the strongly worded criticism he faced from senators, particularly Republican John McCain. ABC World News (2/1, story 3, 1:25, Gibson, 8.78M) said Casey "did not get much support on Capitol Hill today. Testifying before senators, he found himself under attack. Unusual to find a commanding general subjected to such criticism." McCain: "General I don't question your honorable service. I question seriously the judgment that was employed in your execution of your responsibilities in Iraq. And we have paid a very, very heavy price in American blood and treasure because of what is now agreed to by literally everyone as a failed policy." Casey: "Senator, I do not agree that we have a failed policy. I believe the President's new strategy will enhance the policy that we have." Sen. Lindsey Graham: "In what percentage of the country would it be impossible for an American to walk down the street without being afraid of being shot at or killed?" Casey: "Probably about half, actually, Senator." Graham: "Here we are, two and a half years later. Half the country, no American can walk down the street." Casey "was on Capitol Hill because he's been nominated to be Army chief of staff. Despite the clashes and criticism General Casey is expected to be confirmed by a wide margin." The Washington Post (2/2, A4, Ricks, 690K) says that "summarizing the day's proceedings, Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) , chairman of the Armed Services Committee, told reporters after the hearing that he thought the majority of its members would vote to confirm Casey."

DOJ_NMG_0126319

NBC Nightly News (2/1, lead story, 3:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported Casey "was grilled by members of the Senate. It was verbal combat and it got heated." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "This was an unprecedented public reprimand of a senior US military official over the war in Iraq." And the CBS Evening News (2/1, story 5, 2:25, Martin, 7.66M) noted that "if he is confirmed, Casey will be responsible for providing all those extra troops he didn't want to send to Iraq."

Focusing on McCain's criticism, the Washington Post (2/2, A13, 690K) reports that though the senator "has been a firm supporter of the Iraq war and of…Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Baghdad in the coming months," yesterday "he expressed stark concerns about the war." Said McCain, "Things have gotten markedly and progressively worse, and the situation in Iraq can now best be described as dire and deteriorating. I regret that our window of opportunity to reverse momentum may be closing."

The New York Times (2/2, Cloud, 1.16M) refers to "withering criticism from some Senate Republicans," and says the exchanges "underscored the anger that dominates much Congressional sentiment on Iraq as well as the tensions between the White House and the military over Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq." The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Barnes, 850K) reports Casey was "was berated by leading Senate critics," and describes the general as "an unenthusiastic supporter of the new strategy."

Suicide Attack Kills 45 At Baghdad Market.

The CBS Evening News (2/1, story 4, :15, Couric, 7.66M) reported that in Iraq yesterday, "45 people were killed…when suicide bombers attacked a market 60 miles south of Baghdad. And in the capital, six Iraqis were killed and a dozen others hurt when a car bomb went off near a busy shopping area." NBC Nightly News (2/1, story 3, :25, Williams, 9.87M) reported "one Iraqi official says 1,990 civilians were killed in the month of January alone."

USA Today/AP (2/2, 6A) reports that in the market, two blasts "hurled the bodies of victims through the air and set fire to wooden stalls where vendors sold fruits and vegetables. Some shoppers fled, screaming in panic, while others stopped to help rescuers carry away the wounded." The Washington Post (2/2, A1, Londono, Sarhan, 690K) says the first explosion "sent a throng of shoppers at the covered market rushing toward another exit. There, a second attacker detonated his bomb, laced with nails and shards of metal, killing far more people than the first, Capt. Muthana Ahmed said."

The New York Times (2/2, Glanz, 1.16M) reports "the explosions were the latest incidents in a wash of violence that has swept over a belt of Shiite-controlled Iraq starting about 30 miles south of Baghdad and stretching about 70 miles farther south. … The reasons for the violence are unclear, although American and Iraqi officials cite increasing rivalries between armed Shiite groups, possible meddling by neighboring countries like Iran, and sectarian hatreds between Sunni and Shiite Arabs. A mixture of the two groups populates the northern part of the belt, while the southern part is overwhelmingly Shiite."

Baghdad Sees First Signs Of Security Crackdown. The AP (2/2, Hurst) reports, "US Army engineers have torn down houses and surrounded the newly cleared space with razor wire atop concrete blast walls for neighborhood bases, the first outward signs of the coming Baghdad security crackdown." American and Iraqi commanders "are pulling together a force that numbers -- on paper at least -- about 90,000 troops for what many see as a last-chance drive to curb the debilitating violence that has turned Baghdad into a battleground and killed -- according to the United Nations -- more than 34,000 civilians last year alone. … Of the 90,000-troop force now assembling for a new try at calming the capital, more than half were to be Iraqi soldiers and police, a large majority of whom are Shiite Muslims. It remains an open question whether those forces will be any more inclined this time to battle heavily armed fellow Shiite militiamen or Sunni insurgents, including al-Qaida in Iraq and its suicide bombers."

DOJ_NMG_0126320

The CBS Evening News (2/1, story 6, :15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Iraq's government is gearing up for that upcoming security crackdown. Today it closed a key border crossing with Iran and also suspended flights to and from Syria."

American Troops Strive To Provide Positive Image To Iraqis Amid "Chaos Of War." The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Perry, 850K) reports that "a new batch of troops is trying to win the hearts and minds of the public" in Iraq. Marines face a challenge due to recent transgressions of a few soldiers as well as occasions when "insurgents flooded into Haditha, massacring police officers and other townspeople who had cooperated with the Americans." Along with "dozens of deaths…suspicion and hostility and made the Marine mission here exceedingly difficult and dangerous." Rumors and tales of mistakes about Marines in the region are "tragic but understandable in the chaos of war," according to one Haditha resident.

Krauthammer Says US "Midwifed" Iraq's "Freedom," But Iraqis "Chose Civil War." In the Washington Post (2/2, A15, 690K), Charles Krauthammer writes, "Iraqis were given their freedom, and yet many have chosen civil war. Among all these religious prejudices, ancient wounds, social resentments and tribal antagonisms, who gets the blame for the rivers of blood? You can always count on some to find the blame in America. 'We did not give them a republic,' insists Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria. 'We gave them a civil war.'" Adds Krauthammer, "Of all the accounts of the current situation, this is by far the most stupid. And the most pernicious. Did Britain 'give' India the Hindu-Muslim war of 1947-48 that killed a million souls and ethnically cleansed 12 million more? The Jewish-Arab wars in Palestine? The tribal wars of post-colonial Uganda? We gave them a civil war? Why? Because we failed to prevent it? Do the police in America have on their hands the blood of the 16,000 murders they failed to prevent last year?" The argument "infantilizes Arabs. It demonizes Americans. It willfully overlooks the plainest of facts: Iraq is their country. We midwifed their freedom. They chose civil war."

Administration Delays Release Of Evidence Backing Claims On Iran. The New York Times (2/2, A13, Sanger, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports President Bush's national security advisers "have ordered a delay in publication of evidence intended to support Washington's contention that Iran supplies lethal technology and other aid to militias in Iraq," senior administration officials said Thursday. The decision was described by officials "who were struggling to explain why American officials in Baghdad have twice canceled plans to present the evidence, delays that have raised questions about the quality of the intelligence." Some administration officials said there was "a continuing debate about how well the information proved the Bush administration's case." One official who has reviewed elements of the briefing "said the decision to delay it -- made by [Secretary] Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and [NSA] Stephen J. Hadley -- was also motivated by concern about potentially disclosing the sources of the intelligence, and by a debate over what might be the most politically opportune moment to press the case that Iran is the source of some of the most deadly attacks on American and Iraqi forces."

US Says It Won't Block Iran's Moves To Establish Banks In Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A8, Solomon, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports senior Bush administration officials said the US "won't block Iran's efforts to establish financial institutions in Iraq, a decision that sets up a delicate balance in US efforts to limit Iranian influence there." US approval of Iran's "economic engagement with Iraq is complicated by allegations by some White House and Pentagon officials that Tehran is training and arming Shiite militias and may be directly targeting American soldiers inside Iraq." US officials had "initially reacted coolly" to the Iranian plans, but in interviews yesterday, senior Bush administration officials 'said the US accepted the Iranian economic moves and would make no effort to block them."

Iraq Fears Being Caught In Middle Of US-Iran Tensions. The Chicago Tribune (2/2, Sly, 617K) reports, "Alarmed by rising tensions between the United States and Iran, Iraqi government officials fear their country is in danger of being dragged into the middle of a new conflict between its two main allies." The Bush administration's increased rhetoric towards Iran "has fueled concerns in Baghdad that Iraq will become the battleground in a showdown between Iran and the US," Iraqi officials say. Iraqi government spokesman, Ali al- Dabbagh, told a news conference Thursday in Baghdad, "We want to maintain good relations with our neighbors, especially Iran. We have long borders with them, we have local interests with [them] and we would like to have this relationship not in the shadow of the others." Iraq "also wants to maintain good relations with the US," he added, "stressing that Iraq does not condone attacks against US forces in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0126321

The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Richter, Roug, 850K) reports that "the Iraqi government Thursday invited Iran and Syria to Baghdad for talks next month on regional security, amid growing tension and accusations by the Bush administration of foreign meddling in Iraqi affairs." Although the US has yet to receive and invite from the Iraqi government, "the meeting is intended to 'promote support for the government of Iraq on security and other issues,' said Samir Shakir Mahmoud Sumaidy, the Iraqi ambassador to the United States." According to Sumaidy, this summit is "part of a series of regional gatherings sponsored by Iraq's fledgling government that have not included nations from outside the region. It is tentatively scheduled to start March 10." This summit "comes at a time when U.S. officials have accused Iran of meddling in Iraq" and "the Bush administration…has complained that Syria is allowing foreign fighters to cross into Iraq."

Brzezinski Warns Iraq War Will Lead To Other Conflicts. The AP (2/2, Schweid) reports former national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski warned Thursday the Iraq war was likely to lead to "a head-on conflict" with Iran and other parts of the Muslim world. Appearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Brzezinski said, "If the United States continues to be bogged down in a protracted bloody involvement in Iraq, and I emphasize what I am about to say, the final destination on this downhill track is likely to be a head-on conflict with Iran and with much of the world of Islam at large."

Military Source Says Israel Preparing To Attack Iran's Nuclear Sites. The Washington Times (2/2, Gertz, Scarborough, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, that "a military source tells us the talk among Israeli military officials is how and when to counter Iran's nuclear weapons program, most likely in a pre-emptive attack on Iranian nuclear facilities." Sources say "the Israelis know that any attack will require overflying U.S.-dominated Iraq, but one solution would be to set up a secret base in another area between Iran and Israel to refuel Israel's bombers" explaining their recent purchase "U.S. precision-guided joint direct attack munitions, or JDAM, kits for their bombs and special bunker-buster explosives that could be used to destroy underground Iranian nuclear facilities." While "the Bush administration is hardening its position on Iran" it "is holding Israel in check from attacking" although this has not stopped Israel from acting unilaterally with its military before.

Ahmadinejad Calls UN Sanctions Ineffective. The New York Times (2/2, A10, Fathi, 1.16M) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "said Thursday that his nation was becoming a superpower and that the United Nations sanctions would not deter it from pursuing its nuclear program." Speaking to reporters, he said Iran is "rapidly becoming a superpower," and its "strength does not come from military weapons or an economic capability." Ahmadinejad's comments come "as some conservatives in Iran joined moderates to warn that his dismissiveness toward sanctions by the [UNSC] over Iran's nuclear program could have dangerous consequences."

The AP (2/2, Dareini) reports Ahmadinejad also "suggested Tehran would announce next week that it is beginning to install a new assembly of 3,000 centrifuges in an underground portion of its uranium enrichment facility at Natanz." The installation would be "a major jump in Iran's uranium enrichment program, though it could take months to" complete. Meanwhile, AFP (2/2, Adler) quotes a Vienna-based diplomat as saying Iran has already begun installing centrifuges at the Natanz site.

Russia Calls For Delay In Imposing Sanctions. The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/2, A8) reports Russia Thursday "signaled that it backs a 'time-out' proposed by the head of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency that calls for holding off on imposing U.N. sanctions if Tehran suspends uranium enrichment." The Foreign Ministry said in a statement, "We believe the initiative put forward by the IAEA head...suggesting that Iran suspend uranium enrichment in exchange for the U.N. Security Council's reciprocal step regarding resolution 1737 deserves close attention."

Russia May Seek Gas Accord With Tehran. The New York Times (2/2, A10, Myers, 1.16M) reports, "Even as the United States intensifies its efforts to isolate Iran, President Vladimir V. Putin said Thursday that Russia would consider OPEC-like cooperation with Tehran on sales of natural gas."

DOJ_NMG_0126322

He "stopped short of endorsing price fixing, however, saying he was concerned only with ensuring stable supplies for consuming nations." At the same time Putin also reiterated Russia's opposition to Iran acquiring nuclear weapons, but his remarks "underscored a widening rift with the United States and its allies over how to force Tehran to comply with United Nations Security Council resolutions."

On its front page, the Wall Street Journal (2/2, A1, Gold, White, 2.04M) notes that "while there are several reasons why a gas cartel isn't likely to work as well as OPEC has managed the oil markets, the talk has alarmed big gas consumers, particularly in Europe, which gets a quarter of its gas from Russia. A cartel would be less menacing economically in the short-term to the US, which still gets most of its gas within North America." The Journal also writes that the "prospect of Russia and Iran working together to influence markets can't be comforting for Western countries. While Russia doesn't have the same pariah status as Iran, Moscow has under Mr. Putin faced increasing criticism for using its vast energy riches as a diplomatic lever."

Chirac Again Seeks To Clarify Remarks On Iran. The New York Times (2/2, Bennhold, 1.16M) reports French President Jacques Chirac, "seeking to limit the diplomatic reaction over his remarks on Iran's nuclear ambitions, reaffirmed Thursday that France remained committed to preventing Iran from becoming a nuclear power." The statement was issued "within hours" of the publication of an interview in which Chirac "said that if Iran had one or two nuclear weapons, it would not pose a serious danger because the launching of such a weapon would lead to the immediate destruction of Tehran." The president's office denounced the publication of his comments as a "shameful campaign" and accused American news media outlets of "using any excuse to engage in France-bashing."

The Washington Times/AP (2/2, Keaten) questions whether the comments reflect that Chirac "at age 74 and in the waning months of his second and likely last term" is "losing his political touch" or "even his mental vigor?"

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/2, A18, 2.04M) writes, "They're certainly going to miss [Chirac] in Tehran" after his term ends later this year. The Journal notes that Chirac" won't make public his political intentions before March, but in one recent poll only 2% of the French want him on the ballot again. Privately, Chirac aides believe that only a foreign policy crisis -- say, over Iran -- could revive his political career. His remarks this week make it more likely that Iran will become a crisis, but at least we can hope he won't be around to make it any worse."

Regime Change Urged In Iran. Author Amir Taheri writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/2, A19, 2.04M) that the question in Tehran "these days" is "Will they hit or not?" The question is "wreaking havoc on Iran's fragile economy by fomenting an atmosphere of uncertainty even before the sanctions imposed by the U.N. Security Council start to bite." In addition, the Khomeinist leadership is "divided over the reality of the threat, and over ways of dealing with it." While President Ahmadinejad "claims that the US is in no position to do much damage," the "bulk of the Khomeinist leadership, including the 'Supreme Guide' Ali Khamenei, however, take the threat seriously and are preparing public opinion for a climb-down by the Islamic Republic." Taheri warns the international community about being "duped by a tactical retreat in Tehran or a temporary modification of the regime's behavior." Instead, he says, "what is needed is a change in the nature of the regime."

Friedman Urges Oil Conservation To Undermine Iranian Regime. In his New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) column, Thomas L. Friedman writes that "getting addicted to selling oil can make your country really stupid, and if the price of oil suddenly drops, it can make your people really revolutionary. That's the real story of the rise and fall of the Soviet Union -- it overdosed on oil -- and it could end up being the real story of Iran, if we're smart." The "sharp rise in oil prices in the 1970s deluded the Kremlin into overextending subsidies at home and invading Afghanistan abroad -- and then the collapse in prices in the '80s helped bring down the overextended empire." Iran has been spending billions on subsidies "to buy off interest groups. ... So if oil prices fall sharply again, Iran's regime will have to take away many benefits from many Iranians, as the Soviets had to do. For a regime already unpopular with many of its people, that could cause all kinds of problems and give rise to an Ayatollah Gorbachev. We know how that ends." The "best tool we have for curbing Iran's influence is not containment or engagement, but getting the price of oil down in the long term with conservation and an alternative-energy strategy. Let's exploit Iran's oil addiction by ending ours."

Afghan Parliament Urges Amnesty For Citizens From Past Wars. The New York Times (2/2, Gall, 1.16M) reports that "Afghanistan's lower house of Parliament has approved a nonbinding resolution urging the government to grant immunity to all Afghans involved in the wars of the last 25 years." This resolution "brought protests on Thursday from human rights advocates and the United Nations…who had been working with the government on a plan to address the many abuses over the last three decades." Afghan lawmakers remain firm and support the resolution "in the interest of peace and stability" which "was approved just days after President Hamid Karzai began work on the government's reconciliation plan," including proposed "talks with Taliban leaders as Afghanistan braced for a spring offensive by insurgents linked to the Taliban."

DOJ_NMG_0126323

US Military Makes Arms And Equipment Donation To Afghan Army. The AP (2/2, Faiez) reports that "the United States presented hundreds of armored vehicles and trucks and thousands of weapons to the Afghan army Thursday as Afghanistan braces for renewed fighting with Taliban-led insurgents. The donation included "800 military vehicles and more than 12,000 weapons is part of a critical effort to build an Afghan army able to defend the country on its own and eventually allow U.S. and NATO-led forces to pull back" after the more modern technology enables the Afghan National Army to evolve into "a well equipped, well-trained, well-led, self-sustaining army," according to U.S. Maj. Gen. Robert Durbin at the donation ceremony at a military base in Kabul. During the ceremony, Afghan President Karzai "thanked the U.S. officials and said that such donations and further training would enable Afghans 'to stand on our own feet.'

Rising Drug Trade Linked To Terrorism In Afghanistan. The New York Times (2/2, Risen, 1.16M) reports in detail the US deal with known Afghani drug lord and Taliban ally Haji Bashir Noorzai. After years of deals with Mr. Noorzai in an attempt to collect counter-terrorism knowledge all of the negotiations went sour resulting in his recent arrest in New York. "In Afghanistan, finding terrorists has always trumped chasing drug traffickers," according to Bobby Charles, "the former top counternarcotics official at the State Department." Illustrating the complex issues involved "in fighting the war on terrorism," when "government officials have often accepted trade-offs in developing relationships with informants with questionable backgrounds who might prove useful" although "it is often not clear whether the benefits outweigh the costs."

Pentagon Reorganizes Non-Fatal Casualty Statistics On Web Page. The New York Times (2/2, Grady, 1.16M) reports that "statistics on a Pentagon Web site have been reorganized in a way that lowers the published totals of American nonfatal casualties in Iraq and Afghanistan." According to Dr. Michael Kilpatrick, the deputy director of force health protection and readiness at the Defense Department, "the previous method of tallying casualties was misleading and might have made injuries and combat wounds seem worse and more numerous than they really were." The change was motivated when "public perceptions of the wounded increased last month after Linda Bilmes, a Harvard professor, published an opinion article in The Los Angeles Times mentioning 50,508 'nonmortal woundings' in Iraq and Afghanistan." That number was a miscalculated mistake "from a Web page posted by public affairs employees at the Department of Veterans Affairs" who combined "combat and noncombat injuries as well as illnesses and labeling them all 'woundings' instead of casualties." Now both web sites have been changed.

DOJ:

DOJ Concedes Prosecutorial Misconduct In MA Mob Slaying Case. The Boston Globe (2/2, Murphy) reports, "An internal Justice Department investigation concluded that a federal prosecutor in Boston 'engaged in professional misconduct and exercised poor judgment' while prosecuting a federal racketeering case against the hierarchy of the New England Mafia during the early 1990s, according to a letter filed in federal court yesterday." The Globe continues, "In response to a critical letter from the judge who presided over the high-profile case, a Justice Department official wrote back that 'disciplinary action' had been taken against Assistant US Attorney Jeffrey Auerhahn because of his misconduct in prosecuting Mafia capo Vincent Ferrara and mob associate Pasquale Barone. … Chief US District Judge Mark L. Wolf had found three years ago that Auerhahn had withheld evidence in a 1985 gangland slaying. … Yet the internal probe remains shrouded in secrecy as federal authorities, citing employee privacy rights, refused yesterday to detail their findings or disclose what disciplinary action had been taken against Auerhahn, a longtime prosecutor who currently handles counterterrorism cases." The Globe notes, "In a Jan. 23 letter to Wolf , Associate Deputy Attorney General David Margolis wrote that the Justice Department was 'preparing a more detailed response' to an earlier letter from Wolf. … Samantha Martin , a spokeswoman for US Attorney

DOJ_NMG_0126324

Michael J. Sullivan, citing Department of Justice regulations protecting employees' privacy, said, 'We are prohibited from commenting on any internal personnel matters beyond what is available in the public record.' … Boston lawyer Bernard Grossberg , who represented Barone in the criminal case, said that the government has an obligation to reveal what punishment it meted out to Auerhahn, so that the public can assess whether it was appropriate."

Massachusetts Federal Prosecutor Heading To Main Justice. The Worcester (MA) Telegram & Gazette (2/2, Hammel) reports, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Paul G. Casey will spend the next year in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy in Washington, DC." The T&G continues, "Mr. Casey, 41, has been a prosecutor in the Worcester branch of the U.S. attorney's office since 2002. At the conclusion of his stint at Justice Department headquarters it is expected that he will return to the Worcester office, where he has specialized in prosecuting violent gang members." The T&G adds, "The Office of Legal Policy manages development of a variety of civil and criminal policy initiatives for the attorney general, creation of Justice Department regulations, and the department's role in the confirmation of the president's judicial nominees. Mr. Casey is scheduled to begin his duty Feb. 12 as a senior counsel in Office of Legal Policy. … The U.S. attorney intends to announce a replacement for Mr. Casey, who holds one of two full-time assistant U.S. attorney slots in the Worcester branch. In addition to David H. Hennessy and Mr. Casey, other assistant U.S. attorneys regularly prosecute cases in U.S. District Court here. … Mr. Casey said of his new assignment, 'I'm honored that they asked me.'" The T&G notes, "Son of a Swampscott police officer, Mr. Casey said, 'I like to prosecute violent guys. I think there's a federal interest in keeping the community safe. … In part because of the employment of his father, who died in the early 1990s, he said, 'I've always loved working with police departments.' … That has kept Mr. Casey in the forefront of President Bush's policy, which U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan has vigorously promoted, of expanding the number of criminal cases in federal court, cases that years ago would have been prosecuted in the state courts, where penalties are less severe."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Senate Report Finds SEC Mishandled Pequot Probe. The New York Times (2/2, Bogdanich) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission mishandled its inquiry into suspect trades by a prominent hedge fund, then may have tried to cover up those mistakes after its chief investigator on the case complained, according to an interim Senate report released yesterday." The Times continues, "The report, released by the former chairmen of the Senate Judiciary and Finance Committees, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, also asked the S.E.C. or the Justice Department to consider investigating whether false testimony was given to S.E.C. officials who examined the hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management. … The report did not cite examples of what testimony might have been false." The Times adds, "The two Senate committees began looking into the case in July after the investigator, a commission lawyer named Gary J. Aguirre, said he was fired for complaining that the Pequot investigation had been derailed because of political considerations. … Though the S.E.C.'s handling of the Pequot matter came under fire at Senate hearings last year, yesterday's report provides the strongest condemnation yet of how that investigation was run. … 'At best, the picture shows extraordinarily lax enforcement by the S.E.C.,' Senate investigators concluded. 'At worse, the picture is colored with overtones of a possible cover-up.' … The report strongly suggests that Mr. Aguirre was fired in retaliation for his criticism. At the same time, Senate investigators said they were 'deeply troubled' by the failure of the S.E.C.'s inspector general, Walter J. Stachnik, to investigate Mr. Aguirre's accusations properly. … The S.E.C. should also consider reopening its Pequot investigation, the report states, though it takes no position on whether the fund or anyone connected to it engaged in any wrongdoing. … The S.E.C. closed its inquiry without charging anyone in connection with the Pequot inquiry."

Investors Sue Dell Alleging Improper Accounting. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A14, Clark, Lawton, Wilke) reports, "Dell Inc., reeling from business problems that led to Wednesday's departure of Chief Executive Kevin Rollins, was accused in an investor lawsuit of improper accounting in its longtime partnership with chip maker Intel Corp." the Journal continues, "The suit, which seeks class-action status on behalf of Dell shareholders, alleges that Dell's profits were inflated by hundreds of millions of dollars in quarterly rebates from Intel that Dell failed to properly account for and disclose. At times, the suit asserts, Dell was receiving as much as $1 billion a year in what the plaintiffs characterize as 'secret and likely illegal' kickbacks by Intel to ensure that Dell use no other chip supplier." The Journal adds, "In a 251-page complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Austin, Texas, the plaintiffs also allege that Dell investors were misled about serious accounting, quality and customer-service problems -- even as Dell executives sold billions of dollars in Dell shares. It accuses Intel of participating in a scheme to defraud Dell investors. … Dell declined to comment on the suit, which was prepared by the law firm of class-action specialist William Lerach. Intel, which has defended the legality of its marketing practices in response to an antitrust suit filed by rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc., flatly denied the allegations, and said it would 'move quickly' to defend itself. … The suit was filed late Wednesday, about the time Dell announced Chairman Michael Dell would resume the CEO position1 in place of Mr. Rollins."

DOJ_NMG_0126325

DOJ Probes Siemens For Possible Bribery. The Financial Times (2/2, Milne) reports, "Siemens' problems escalated on Thursday night as Europe's largest engineering group revealed it is under investigation by the US Department of Justice and facing an informal inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission over its €420m bribery scandal." The Times continues, "The DoJ is investigating possible criminal breaches of US law by Siemens while the SEC's enforcement division is conducting an informal inquiry, Siemens said on Thursday night in its first-quarter report." The Times adds, "The probes are a further embarrassing blow to the German group's embattled management, who had sought contact with US authorities soon after the scandal broke to try to contain its impact. … Prosecutors in Munich – alongside several other European counterparts in Italy, Liechtenstein and Greece – are leading the investigation, which has ensnarled several former high-ranking executives and led to allegations against some current top managers." The Times notes, "Siemens, which listed in the US in 2001, said it was co-operating with the DoJ and SEC and had hired an independent law firm, Debevoise, to conduct an independent inquiry into the allegations. The results of the ongoing investigation were available to US authorities, Siemens said. … The nature of the DoJ investigation was unclear on Thursday night but it can, in some circumstances, merely open a file because of a probe abroad by prosecutors. Equally it could be conducting its own enquiries as to whether the company has violated the US's Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, which bars paying bribes in overseas operations."

AOL Case Heads To Jury After Three Months Of Trial. The Washington Post (2/2, D1, Johnson) reports, "An Alexandria jury concluded its first day of deliberations yesterday without reaching a verdict on two former AOL executives accused of conspiring to help a business partner create phony revenue as the Internet boom turned bust in early 2001." The Post continues, "The six-man, six-woman jury began discussing more than three months' worth of evidence yesterday morning after a marathon session of closing arguments that ended hours after the federal courthouse had closed for business Wednesday." The Post adds, "Prosecutors got the last word in one of the longest-running criminal proceedings in the history of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, known as the 'rocket docket' for its speedy and efficient proceedings. Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles F. Connolly urged the jury shortly after 8:30 p.m. Wednesday not to follow defense lawyers' invitation to 'look away from the facts' but instead to remember 'a lesson we all learned from the time we were children: Simply tell the truth.' … Kent D. Wakeford, former vice president of AOL's Business Affairs unit, and John P. Tuli, a former official with AOL's Netbusiness unit, have been charged with helping Las Vegas software maker PurchasePro meet revenue targets in March and April 2001 by lying to auditors and backdating contracts. At the time, both companies were struggling to meet analyst expectations and ultimately resorted to fraud to preserve the illusion of success, prosecutors said. … 'These guys would rather cheat than fail,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Adam Reeves told the jury Tuesday." The Post notes, "U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr., however, has repeatedly pared the scope of the case and the number of criminal charges. Most recently he agreed to cut multiple wire fraud counts against Tuli, Wakeford and former PurchasePro employee Christopher J. Benyo."

LATimes Criticizes Bid To Crack Down On CEO Pay. The Los Angeles Times (2/2, 850K) says in an editorial, "In 1993, outrage over sky-high salaries for corporate chieftains led the Democratically controlled Congress to declare that, unlike other business expenses, salaries above $1 million couldn't be deducted from corporate taxes. The move worked so poorly that the Senate's newly restored Democratic majority is back for an encore." The Clinton-era "rules not only failed to stop executive pay from rising, they promoted a slew of accounting maneuvers — such as stock options and supplemental retirement plans — that made it even harder to discern exactly how much was being paid out. Now the Senate Finance Committee is attempting to crack down on one of those techniques." The "issue here is not the gaudiness of executive salaries but whether the federal government should use the tax code to fight what is essentially a moralistic (and losing) battle. Publicly traded companies will pay what the market bears for top executive talent. Shareholders who object can always sell their stock."

DOJ_NMG_0126326

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Agent Testifies At Libby Trial, Casting Doubt On Libby's Veracity. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/2, Apuzzo) reports, "In a case that hinges on credibility, FBI agent Deborah Bond is making it clear from the witness stand just how believable she finds former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby to be: not very. … Libby told the FBI that he learned about Plame from Vice President Dick Cheney, then forgot about it and was surprised to hear it again from a reporter weeks later. 'He said that?' defense attorney Theodore Wells asked. 'That's what he claimed,' Bond replied. 'He said it,' Wells persisted, prompting an objection that led U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to step in. … Bond didn't flinch: 'He told us that, yes,' she said."

Fox News' Special Report (2/1, Herridge) reported Bond "testified that…Libby told agents that Dick Cheney was his source. … However, according to the prosecution, Libby told the grand jury that he first heard the Plame information from journalist Tim Russert…a full month after Libby said he talked to the Vice President. The question is whether Libby lied or his memory failed him." MSNBC's Hardball (2/1, Shuster) noted that Bond's testimony "was dramatic, and it was all about Vice President Cheney. … This is a huge deal politically, as far as the vice president is concerned. It's also very big deal legally, as far as Scooter Libby is contend, because it's yet another nail in the coffin for prosecutors to show that Scooter Libby had motive to lie about his statements about where he learned information about Valerie Wilson."

Under the headline "Libby Left Out Some Facts In Interviews, FBI Agent Says," the Washington Post (2/2, A8, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "Coming on the seventh day of testimony in Libby's perjury trial, Bond's description of the FBI's two interviews with Libby in his White House office gave jurors their first account of what the prosecution alleges were lies that Cheney's former top aide told investigators to obscure his role in spreading classified information." The Post adds, "During cross-examination, defense attorney Theodore V. Wells Jr. pressed Bond to acknowledge that Libby had said during his first FBI interview that he was very concerned that his memory was bad and that he needed to review his notes to jog it. Wells also questioned the thoroughness of the agent's notes about Libby's account of a third conversation with Miller, on July 12."

Under the headline "F.B.I. Agent Says Libby Denied Being Leak Source," the New York Times (2/2, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "In an intriguing but unexplored exchange with a prosecutor, Peter Zeidenberg, Ms. Bond also said that Mr. Libby had acknowledged in one of the interviews that he might have talked to Mr. Cheney aboard Air Force Two about whether to tell the press about Ms. Wilson as part of the effort to rebut Mr. Wilson's criticisms. The prosecution will resume its case Monday by playing audiotapes of Mr. Libby's testimony before the grand jury in March 2004 to show a similar conflict when he denied discussing Ms. Wilson with reporters."

Jurors See Video Of McClellan Saying Libby "Had Nothing To Do" With Leak. USA Today (2/2, Willing, 2.27M) reports, "Federal Judge Reggie Walton agreed Thursday morning to let prosecutors show video clips of a White House spokesman telling reporters in 2003 that former vice presidential aide Lewis 'Scooter' Libby 'had nothing to do' with leaking information about the wife of a Bush administration critic. … After McClellan spoke, Libby 'couldn't walk back from his story' without risking being fired," Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald argued. "The video clips were "highly prejudicial" to Libby, defense attorney Theodore Wells told Walton," and "Walton agreed to edit questions from the videos in which reporters pressed McClellan on his claims that Libby and two other officials — Karl Rove and Elliot Abrams — 'had nothing to do with the situation.'"

In its story focusing on FBI Special Agent Deborah Bond's testimony yesterday, the Washington Post (2/2, A8, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) notes that before allowing jurors to see the video excerpts, Walton "expressed doubts about defense arguments that Libby was made a scapegoat by the White House in 2003 as the furor over the CIA leak grew. With the jury out of the courtroom…Walton said that argument was undercut by evidence that…McClellan, at Cheney's direction, publicly denied that fall that Libby had any role in leaking information about Plame." Under the headline "Video Undercuts Libby's Defense," the Los Angeles Times (2/2, Schmitt, 850K) also reports that the McClellan video "dealt a blow" to Libby's "contention that he was made a scapegoat to protect White House political strategist Karl Rove." The Times also briefly notes Bond's testimony about Libby's conversation with Cheney about Plame.

DOJ_NMG_0126327

Ignatius Says Cheney, Libby Attempted "Cover-Up." In a Washington Post (2/2, 690K) column titled "A Failed Cover-Up," David Ignatius writes, "Why was the White House so nervous in the summer of 2003 about the CIA's reporting on alleged Iraqi attempts to buy uranium from Niger to build a nuclear bomb?" The Libby "trial record suggests a simple answer: The White House was worried that the CIA would reveal that it had been pressured in 2002 and early 2003 to support administration claims about Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, and that in the Niger case, the CIA had tried hard to resist this pressure. The machinations of Cheney, Libby and others were an attempt to weave an alternative narrative that blamed the CIA." After reviewing "the documentary evidence" from the trial, Ignatius concludes, "Let me say it again: This trial is about a cover-up that failed."

Crackdown On Online Gambling Freezes Funds. USA Today (2/2, Swartz) reports, "The federal crackdown on online gambling has tied up the funds of thousands of U.S. patrons of two of the largest services." USA continues, "The crackdown on BetOnSports, which no longer takes sports wagers from the USA, and Neteller — an Internet payment service popular among gamblers — is intended to put a dent in the $10.6 billion industry. … And it has: Following federal charges against executives from both companies, dozens of the more than 2,300 websites that service online gambling have stopped taking U.S. wagers." USA adds, "Still, the actions against BetOnSports and Neteller have left the online accounts of their U.S. customers frozen until legal issues are resolved. … 'The truth is that the money is in limbo and the companies are not required to refund any money until a successful prosecution or settlement takes place,' says Michael Tew, principal of gaming consultant CapitalHQ. 'This could take years.' Funds from other gambling sites are not tied up, Tew and others say." USA notes, "Most U.S. customers of BetOnSports have been waiting to cash out money in their accounts since July, when a federal grand jury issued a 22-count indictment charging CEO David Carruthers with racketeering, conspiracy and fraud. BetOnSports handled $1.77 billion in bets during its 2005 fiscal year, with more than 90% of wagers from the USA. … Neteller founders Stephen Lawrence and John Lefebvre were arrested in January on a charge of conspiracy to transfer funds with the intent to promote illegal gambling. … Though money-transfer companies such as Neteller do business with financial institutions and merchants, many also allow gambling companies to transfer money collected from U.S. gamblers to bank accounts outside the USA. Neteller last month closed its U.S. Internet gambling services, erasing about two-thirds of its business."

Jury Convicts New York Drug Kingpin Of Rivals' Murder Plot. The AP (2/2, Hays) reports, "A notorious crack kingpin with ties to the hip-hop industry was convicted Thursday in a federal death penalty case for paying $50,000 to have two rivals gunned down in 2001." The AP continues, "A jury deliberated five days before finding Kenneth 'Supreme' McGriff guilty of murder conspiracy and drug dealing. McGriff, who was acquitted on lesser drugs and weapons charges, looked back and smiled at his supporters when the verdict was issued." The AP adds, "In the 1980s, McGriff founded the Supreme Team, a notoriously lucrative and ruthless drug crew that became legendary on the same Queens borough streets that later produced rap stars like Ja Rule and 50 Cent. … The defense claimed that after an earlier prison sentence for drugs, McGriff went straight in the late 1990s and pursued his dream of producing movies and music by teaming with Irv 'Gotti' Lorenzo, a neighborhood friend who headed the successful Murder Inc. record label. … Prosecutors alleged McGriff, 46, instead resumed his drug dealing operations in New York and Baltimore, and used Murder Inc. to launder more than $1 million in proceeds. When a little-known rapper named E-Money Bags shot and killed one of McGriff's friends in a 1999 dispute, the defendant allegedly paid a hit team to kill the rapper and a second man who McGriff feared might retaliate. … 'That man sitting in the courtroom is one of the most dangerous, feared, ruthless gangsters in all of Queens,' prosecutor Carolyn Pokorney said during closing arguments. 'And when Supreme gets in a fight with somebody ... he doesn't go to the cops. He doesn't hire a lawyer. He hires a hit team to assassinate them, to blow them away, so that their moms can barely recognize them when they go down to the morgue.'" The AP notes, "The same jury will return next Tuesday to deliberate the death penalty against McGriff. At the least, McGriff would face a sentence of life in prison without parole. … U.S. District Judge Frederic Block surprised prosecutors last week by asking them to contact U.S. officials and ask them to reconsider their decision to seek a death sentence for McGriff, saying a penalty phase would be an 'absurd' waste of time and money. The prosecutors told him this week the officials had not changed their minds."

DOJ_NMG_0126328

The New York Times (2/2, Rashbaum) reports, "Shortly after the verdict was delivered in United States District Court, the mothers of the two victims told reporters in the courthouse hallway that they would be uncomfortable with a death sentence for their sons' killer." The Times adds, "The jury's decision came just two days after a jury in the same courthouse voted in an unrelated case to execute Ronell Wilson, who had been convicted of killing two police detectives. That was the first time a federal death sentence had been handed up in New York in more than 50 years."

Judge Revokes Bail Of Former UN Official Charged With Bribery. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/2, Neumeister) reports, "A judge revoked the bail of a former senior United Nations official and ordered him detained until his trial on bribery charges. Sanjaya Bahel, an Indian diplomat and the former head of the U.N. commodity procurement section, has pleaded not guilty of using his influence to steer contracts worth more than $50 million to a man who rewarded him with valuable real estate. … Bahel had been free on $900,000 bail, but U.S. District Judge Denise L. Cote said that was insufficient to ensure he would appear at trial." The AP adds, "Prosecutors said Bahel was fired from the United Nations last month and no longer was lawfully in the United States. The judge said his immigration status was 'precarious' but not illegal."

Coke Trial Jury Deadlocked, But Judge Says To Continue Deliberations. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/2, Weber) reports, "A federal jury deliberating the fate of a former Coca-Cola secretary charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage maker in an effort to sell them to Pepsi told a judge Thursday it is unable to make a decision." US District Judge J. Owen Forrester "did not declare a mistrial. Instead, he told the jury to take another crack at reaching a verdict Friday in the case against Joya Williams."

FBI, New Jersey AG Investigating Nonprofit's Land Deal. The Camden Courier-Post (2/2, Walsh) reports, "State and federal investigators are probing a private nonprofit organization run by Randy Primas," former Camden chief executive. "The FBI and the state Attorney General's Office have subpoenaed records related to the Primas-led Camden Redevelopment Corp., according to City Council President Angel Fuentes. The nonprofit paid $1 for six properties in Cramer Hill that had been acquired for $692,000 by a city agency, the Camden Redevelopment Authority, that was also overseen by Primas until late last year." The Courier-Post notes Primas "previously has said the land deal was done to provide affordable housing, and not for personal gain. He said $30,000 in cash obtained as part of the deal was to be used for future audits for the nonprofit group."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/2, Ott, Moroz, 385K) reports, "Another wave of subpoenas from the New Jersey Attorney General's Office and the FBI has landed at the Camden Redevelopment Agency, city officials said yesterday. The subpoenas, delivered Wednesday, were the second batch of requests for documents from the agency in the last four months, amid questions about its relationship to State Sen. Wayne Bryant (D., Camden) as well as its role in the stalled $1.2 billion Cramer Hill Redevelopment Plan, which would have displaced more than 1,000 families."

South Florida Genovese Capo Pleads Guilty To RICO Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/2, Anderson) reports, "The admitted boss of the Genovese organized crime family's South Florida operations pleaded guilty Thursday to federal racketeering charges and could spend 20 years in prison. Renaldi 'Ray' Ruggiero, 73, admitted in a plea agreement that he was a 'capo' in the New York-based Mafia family and supervised a crew that committed numerous crimes including extortion, robbery, money laundering and possession of stolen property." The AP notes, "The guilty plea came after another federal judge rejected Ruggiero's attempt to throw out evidence from more than 12,000 phone calls intercepted on FBI wiretaps and 130 other undercover recordings that provide details about the group's plots and crimes. Four other defendants in the case have also entered guilty pleas to racketeering conspiracy charges, and two others are still pending."

DOJ_NMG_0126329

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/2, Blum, 237K) reports, "The 29-page indictment detailed a bloody assault against a South Florida businessman in October 2003 that prosecutors said Ruggiero approved. Ruggiero was not present at the beating, which took place in a Coral Springs office, but he later described the attack in a telephone call that was taped by authorities. Ruggiero said his crew 'broke [the victim's] fingers, messed up his other hand, beat him up, and told him if he did not pay him his money by next week, he'll know what to expect.' Ruggiero, who owns a Palm Beach County restaurant called Soprano's, also admitted that he helped launder purported drug proceeds and accepted stolen goods worth more than $100,000 from an undercover agent."

Phoenix FBI Agents Arrest Priest Wanted For Assault In Nevada. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/2, Myers) reports, "A Roman Catholic priest accused of beating and sexually assaulting a female employee at his Las Vegas parish and fleeing to Arizona could soon be extradited to Nevada to face charges, an FBI official said. The Rev. George Chaanine, 52, was arrested without incident Thursday by FBI agents in Apache Junction, about 30 miles east of Phoenix, said Deb McCarley, a spokeswoman for the FBI office in Phoenix." The federal unlawful flight "charge most likely would be dropped so Chaanine can be quickly extradited to Las Vegas, where he is wanted for attempted murder, sexual assault, kidnapping and battery with a deadly weapon, McCarley said." The AP notes, "In a statement from the Roman Catholic Diocese of Las Vegas, Bishop Joseph Pepe praised authorities for finding Chaanine."

Indiana Man Pleads Guilty To Katrina Relief Fraud. The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel/AP (2/1) reported Alan King of Bloomington "pleaded guilty Wednesday to collecting nearly $44,000 in funds meant to help Hurricane Katrina victims and $105,000 in fraudulent student college loans, federal authorities said. … Federal investigators allege King collected 12 government payments totaling $43,972 after claiming he and a family member lived at two addresses in New Orleans and one in Biloxi, Miss., during the hurricane and flood in September 2005."

Mississippi Women Charged With FEMA Relief Fraud. The Biloxi Sun Herald/AP (2/1) reported, "Two Saucier women are charged with multiple counts alleging they made false statements to the Federal Emergency Management Agency for disaster assistance after Hurricane Katrina. Teresa M. Baumgart and Mandi D. Ely appeared Wednesday before U.S. Magistrate John M. Roper in Gulfport and were released on $25,000 bond each to await arraignment in federal court on Feb. 26." The AP notes, "Indictments…say Baumgart received $6,914 from FEMA in four wire transfers between Sept. 12, 2005, and Feb. 22, 2006, and Ely received $4,358 in wire transfers on Sept. 12, 2005 and Oct. 18, 2005."

Massachusetts Man Sentenced To Four Years In Prison For Defrauding Cisco. The Boston Herald (1/31, Fitzgerald, 184K) reported, "A Pepperell man and former worker at Hanscom Air Force Base was sentenced" Tuesday "to more than four years in prison for scamming Cisco Systems out of more than $4.7 million." Nicholas Stoupis, "who used to work as a military contractor at Hanscom, was also ordered by U.S. Judge Richard G. Stearns to repay Cisco $3.1 million that he stole from the firm by tricking it into sending him products that he resold on the Internet by touting them as used military equipment." The AP (1/31) also reported on the sentencing.

Judge Revokes Bail Of Alleged Pennsylvania Child Pornographer. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/2, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "A federal judge yesterday revoked the bail of a Delaware County woman accused of helping a boyfriend tape a staggering amount of child pornography. Dorothy Prawdzik, 43, had been free on bail pending trial, but was jailed yesterday after authorities alleged that she had not been truthful with investigators, specifically that she failed to tell agents about a sexual encounter with her boyfriend, John Jackey Worman, and a 10-year-old girl." The Inquirer notes, "Worman is accused of taping himself having sex with children of ages from 3 months to 15 years. The FBI said it discovered on Worman's computer 11,000 movies of him having sex with children. In a separate proceeding yesterday, Worman, 39, pleaded not guilty, and U.S. Magistrate Judge Charles Smith ordered him held without bail."

DOJ_NMG_0126330

Report Warns Of Increasing Deaths, Imprisonment Of Reporters. The AP (2/2, Yen) reports, "The number of journalists killed or jailed worldwide has reached its highest level in a decade, with arrests rising as governments seek to control the Internet, an advocacy group said Thursday." The AP continues, "The survey by Reporters Without Borders, a media-advocacy group, found that 81 journalists were killed last year and more than 140 are behind bars. It was the worst year for deaths since 1994, which was marked by the Rwandan genocide, civil war in Algeria and conflict in the former Yugoslavia." The AP adds, "In the United States, blogger Josh Wolf was jailed in August after defying a federal judge's order to hand over his video of a protest at an economic summit of the world's industrial powers. Sudanese Al-Jazeera cameraman Sami al-Haj was imprisoned at the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, without charges on suspected al-Qaida links. … 'There has never been a more dangerous time to be a journalist,' said Lucie Morillon, Washington director of Reporters Without Borders. 'But even more deplorable was the lack of interest, and sometimes even the failure, by democratic countries in defending everywhere the values they are supposed to incarnate.'" The AP notes, "The report said many governments seek to gain more control over the Internet, a popular medium for dissent in less democratic countries and a growing source of news in the U.S. … At least 60 people are in prison worldwide for posting criticism of their governments online. … China has been a leader among those countries in installing spyware and demanding that U.S. companies Yahoo Inc., Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Cisco Systems Inc. alter their search-engines to filter out Web sites critical of the government, the report said. … In the U.S., the report said journalists and bloggers' 'freedom of expression' is at risk. It called for laws requiring that telecommunications companies treat all Internet broadband content alike. … Legislation to do that was rejected by the Senate in June, but backers are hopeful that the new Democratic-controlled Congress will change course. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, meanwhile, has said Congress should require Internet providers to preserve customer records as a way to assist prosecutors' investigations into child pornography and possibly terrorism."

Inmate Who Escaped With Official's Wife Is Sentenced. The New York Times (2/2, Blumenthal) reports from Mangum, OK, "A confessed murderer who slipped out of prison with the deputy warden's wife and hid for more than 10 years before being recaptured was sentenced Thursday to the maximum seven years for escaping. … Questioned by prosecutors about details of the relationship, the escapee, Randolph F. Dial, said he could not remember." The Times continues, "The warden's wife, Bobbi Parker, 44, disappeared from the Oklahoma State Reformatory in Granite with Mr. Dial in August 1994. They were discovered living together in a trailer on a chicken farm in East Texas in April 2005. … Mr. Dial, 62, a sculptor, writer and spinner of tales, was shaggily white-haired and bearded when he appeared in state court here in western Oklahoma, telling Judge Richard Darby that heart disease and tumors left him only months to live. … But Judge Darby added seven years for escaping to his previous life sentence for murder and fined him $1,000 plus court costs and restitution, penalties that his public defender said Mr. Dial had no way of paying."

Mother Reunited With Abducted Boy. The Washington Times (2/2, Wagner) reports from Linthicum, MD, "A young mother arrived on a flight from Missouri yesterday, shedding tears and clutching her toddler, whom authorities said was taken from her home 16 months ago by her boyfriend, a Mexican national. … 'My grandma told me we would never find him,' said Crystal Debrodie, of Jefferson City, Mo., upon being reunited with son Abraham Felipe Monroy, 2, at Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport." The Times continues, "Authorities say Felipe Monroy, of Hyattsville, took the child Sept. 17, 2005. Mr. Monroy was charged with parental kidnapping and was being held in a Prince George's County jail. State police on Monday arrested Mr. Monroy at his most recent residence, in Riverdale. … Miss Debrodie said Mr. Monroy is not the child's biological father and is an illegal alien. Police could not confirm whether Mr. Monroy was the father or his immigration status." The Times adds, "Miss Debrodie's big break came in October when Prince George's County resident Nicole Baldwin became suspicious of the new child and father, who continued to change his story on the whereabouts of the boy's mother. … She eventually found a picture of the boy on the Web site for the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children."

DC Transit Police Cracking Down On Metro Robberies. The Washington Post (2/2, B3, Sun) reports, "The number of robberies throughout the Metro transit system increased more than 6 percent last year, prompting Metro police to form a special unit to capture criminals, officials said yesterday." The Post continues, "The number of robberies in the Metro system rose to 354 last year -- nearly one a day -- from 332 robberies in 2005, according to Metro crime statistics. Riders reported thefts of 32 iPods and 82 cellphones, accounting for a third of all robberies. … Metro Transit Police set up the robbery unit in early December, a time of year when criminals take advantage of longer periods of darkness. Robberies also tend to go up during the holiday season because people carry more cash and packages, officials said." The Post adds, "In less than two months, the special unit has arrested 21 robbery suspects, compared with six robbery arrests in the same period the previous year, according to Transit Police spokeswoman Linda Foxwell. … Police officials declined to say how many officers are in Metro's robbery unit and where they work, because they do not want to reveal their methods. Although their focus is on robberies, they are also performing their other Metro police functions, officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0126331

"Failure To Appear" Charges Face Opposition In Connecticut. The New York Times (2/2, Cowan) reports from Norwalk, CT, "Some call the 'failure to appear' charge a prosecutor's best friend because it is relatively easy to prove and can swiftly bring a defendant to the bargaining table. Others see the long-accepted but little-discussed practice of punishing late or absentee defendants as a crutch for overworked judges to maintain decorum and keep criminal cases from clogging their courtrooms." The Times continues, "Now such criminal charges are being challenged in Connecticut, where nearly 1 in 10 of the cases not involving motor vehicles that ended in convictions over the past five years included a conviction for failure to appear. Those found guilty of what could be a procedural misstep can face up to five years in prison." The times adds, "Bringing the issue into the open is the case of Ayanna Khadijah, 34, who was convicted of the felony version of failure to appear after she failed to wake up from a nap and arrived 45 minutes late to court one day in August 2003. Her case is extraordinary because she fought back. … It was the only court date Ms. Khadijah missed among 45 sessions over three years defending herself against a set of drug charges that were eventually dismissed, in 2005. Ms. Khadijah, a single mother with a criminal history, received a suspended three-year sentence on the failure-to-appear charge. … She had spent the day before she was late for court at her job as a community organizer and then delivered newspapers from 1 to 8 a.m. Prosecutors argued that she should have known better than to work all night before a court appearance." The Times notes, "Connecticut's appellate court overturned her conviction last fall after concluding that the inadvertent doze was not a willful shirking of responsibility. But the state is appealing to the State Supreme Court for fear the widely used tool could become harder to wield. … At least 30 states treat failure to appear as a crime that stands alone, according to information in American Law Reports, with most tying the severity of the penalty to the seriousness of the underlying charge. … Statistics on how often such cases are filed or lead to convictions are hard to come by, because the Federal Bureau of Investigation lumps the information it collects into a catch-all bin it calls 'other offenses.'"

Kaine Questions Expansion Of Death Penalty In Virginia. The Washington Post (2/2, B5, Shear, 690K) reports Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, "who ran for office pledging to enforce the death penalty despite his personal opposition, said he has strong reservations about efforts by the General Assembly to expand the crimes that are eligible for capital punishment." Speaking to Washington Post reporters and editors, Kaine "questioned the need for new laws that would allow prosecutors to seek the death penalty for those who are accomplices to murder, such as Washington area sniper John Allen Muhammad, and for people who kill judges." Kaine said, "I do not look at the expansion of the death penalty with a favorable eye. … I would not say that the problem in Virginia is that the death penalty is not applied enough." The Post adds Kaine also "discussed two contentious Northern Virginia issues: his decision to build an aboveground Metrorail line through Tysons Corner, and Dominion Virginia Power's plan to erect a high-voltage transmission line across scenic land in the outer suburbs."

CIVIL LAW:

FEC To Examine 527 Group Activities. The Washington Post (2/2, A13, Mosk, 690K) reports the Federal Election Commission "said yesterday that it will police '527' groups, political organizations that largely operated outside the new campaign finance limits during the 2004 presidential election, by looking at how the groups word their appeals for contributions, how they describe themselves, and how they spend their money." If the groups "make clear that they are advocating for or against a specific candidate, the FEC would regulate them." FEC Chairman Robert D. Lenhard said, "We're providing clear guidance. This makes it clear that the existing rules will be enforced." The Post adds the FEC "filed the 44-page explanation of its approach in U.S. District Court yesterday in response to a lawsuit challenging the agency's effectiveness in regulating the independent groups."

DOJ_NMG_0126332

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Suit Claims Pennsylvania Apartments' No-Dog Policy Discriminates Against Blind. The AP (2/2) reports, "The Justice Department filed a lawsuit Thursday against the rental manager and owners of a Lancaster (PA) apartment complex, alleging their rental policies discriminate against the visually impaired." The AP continues, 'The complaint charges that a policy forbidding residents at Barrcrest Manor Apartments to keep dogs violates the federal Fair Housing Act because the landlords were refusing housing to people who use the animals as guides." The AP adds, "Department of Justice officials posing as potential renters conducted the investigation into the complex's policies. … The investigation found the apartments use discriminatory housing practices by 'refusing to make reasonable accommodations in their no-dog policy when such accommodations may be necessary to afford a person with a handicap equal opportunity to use and enjoy a dwelling,' the complaint said." The AP notes, "The suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, seeks to end the policy and asks for compensation for those it affected. … 'The services of guide dogs are essential to individuals with visual impairments,' Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney General for the Civil Rights Division, said in a statement. 'Our fair housing testing program will continue to proactively root out violations of the Fair Housing Act and ensure nondiscriminatory treatment.'"

DOJ Settles Voting Rights Allegations With New Mexico County. The AP (2/2) reports from Grants, NM, "The U.S. Department of Justice has settled voting rights claims against Cibola County (NM). … The department announced Wednesday it had settled allegations that the county violated the Help America Vote Act and the National Voter Registration Act. Those claims had been added to a lawsuit alleging violations of the Voting Rights Act, which originally was filed in 1995, attorney Joe Diaz of Albuquerque, who represented the county, said Thursday." The AP continues, "Justice Department oversight of elections in the county will be extended through 2008 under a consent decree with the county. … The federal agency filed the consent decree Wednesday resolving the lawsuit. It still must be approved by a federal judge. … 'I felt that the county had been complying but the Justice Department felt there were a few problems' that warranted the extension, Diaz said." The AP adds, "American Indians complained that their rights continued to be violated, and county officials agreed to the extension, Diaz said. … Federal law requires counties to hire interpreters and translate ballots and other election material into Indian languages. In the case of Cibola County, officials must provide voter information and assistance in Navajo and Keresan to voters who need it. … The Justice Department alleged the county failed to ensure that valid voter registration applications were processed and added to voter registration lists in a timely manner; that voters' names were not removed from the rolls without cause; and that provisional ballots were offered at elections to voters whose names were not on the voter rolls."

Mississippi Voting Rights Trial To Resume February 15. The AP (2/2) reports from Jackson, MS, "A federal judge has recessed for two weeks the trial of a black Democratic Party official in Noxubee County accused of trying to limit whites' participation in local elections." The AP continues, "Ike Brown, the chairman of the county's Democratic Executive Committee, is accused of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Southern states strictly enforced segregation. It is the first use of the act to allege discrimination against whites. … Noxubee County is a rural area along the Alabama line with a majority black population." The AP adds, "On Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee recessed the trial until Feb. 15, at which time he expects to hear from an elections expert enlisted by the Noxubee County Democrats to counter allegations by a political scientist hired by the U.S. Department of Justice. … Lee, who is hearing the case without a jury, has not indicated when he might rule. … The trial began Jan. 16 in federal court in Jackson." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors want Lee to rule whites' voting rights were violated by Brown and other black Democratic Party officials in the county and to order unlawful practices stopped.

DOJ_NMG_0126333

… The Democrats' expert - Richard Engstrom - has said Noxubee County whites lose elections simply because they're in the minority. … However, Justice Department expert Theodore Arrington said Brown and his 'political machine' have exploited the election process to ensure blacks control the county."

Alabama Appeals DOJ Ruling On County Commissioner's Appointment. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (2/2, Murtaugh) reports, "The state has filed an appeal of the U.S. Department of Justice's refusal to approve the appointment of a Mobile County commissioner, calling the decision 'an affront to the state's sovereignty and federalism itself.'" The Press-Register continues, "In a 32-page letter addressed to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez, Alabama Attorney General Troy King laid out his argument that state law should trump federal regulations when it comes to Gov. Bob Riley's 2005 appointment of Mobile County Commissioner Juan Chastang. … The Justice Department's decision 'invites chaos into state governmental functioning,' the letter stated." The Press-Register adds, "Last month, the Justice Department ruled that the appointment violated the federal Voting Rights Act of 1965, saying it 'appears to diminish the opportunity of minority voters to elect a representative of their choice.' … The reasoning was that Chastang's district is majority black, while the governor is elected by a majority-white statewide populace." The Press-Register notes, "Cecil Gardner, the attorney who filed the federal lawsuit challenging the appointment, said the whole point of the Voting Rights Act is to override certain state decisions when they impact minority voters. … A three-judge federal panel in Montgomery is awaiting the result of the state's appeal before deciding whether to strip Chastang of his office and hold a special election to fill it, as the lawsuit filed by three area Democrats is seeking."

Texas Deputy At Center Of Furor Over Convicted Border Agents. The Washington Times (2/2, Seper) reports, "A Texas deputy sheriff who fired shots at a fleeing vehicle after the driver tried to run him down faces 10 years in prison for injuring one of the passengers, a Mexican national being smuggled illegally into the United States." The Times continues, "The U.S. attorney, who won lengthy prison terms last year for two U.S. Border Patrol agents in the shooting of a drug-smuggling suspect, also prosecuted Edwards County Deputy Sheriff Guillermo F. Hernandez, who is to be sentenced next month. … The deputy's boss, Sheriff Donald G. Letsinger, said his officer -- who had been on the job for a year – 'followed the letter of the law' in defending himself in the April 2005 incident and questioned why the government brought charges. … 'This is a fine young man, and I just don't believe he committed the wrong of which he was accused,' Sheriff Letsinger said. 'I have never had anything hurt me so badly as this prosecution. We've got to make this right.'" The Times notes, "Rep. Ted Poe, Texas Republican, called the prosecution and conviction of Hernandez, known to his friends as 'Gilmer,' 'another example of how the federal government is more concerned about people [who are] illegally invading America than it is about the men who protect America.' … 'Once again, our government is on the wrong side of the border war,' Mr. Poe said." The Times notes, "The deputy's Dec. 1 conviction has enraged his hometown of Rocksprings, Texas, population 1,250, where "Free Gilmer" signs have been posted. The Baptist church is paying the deputy's mortgage and others have come up with costs for the family's truck, propane and water bills. … U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton, appointed in October 2001 by President Bush, said Hernandez fired shots at the vehicle as it sped away 'knowing it was occupied with the nine individuals,' at least seven of whom were illegal aliens -- some of whom later were called to testify for the government. … Hernandez was convicted after a jury trial in U.S. District Court in Del Rio, Texas, 75 miles southwest of Rocksprings -- found guilty of violating 'under the color of law' the civil rights of Maricela Rodriguez-Garcia, a Mexican national."

DC Hairdresser Sued For Sexual Harassment. The Washington Post/AP (2/2, C07) reports, "Andre Chreky, a prominent Washington hairdresser who used to cut first lady Laura Bush's locks, is the target of his second sexual harassment lawsuit in a little more than four months." The AP continues, "An ex-employee said Chreky routinely demanded sexual favors, grabbed and touched her and made humiliating comments about her appearance and her husband's sexual prowess. When she rebuffed him, Chreky retaliated by taking away clients, refusing to accommodate her during her pregnancy and ultimately firing her, the plaintiff, Ronnie Barrett, said in the complaint filed in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia." The AP adds, "Lawyers for Chreky and his salon denied Barrett's allegations. Chreky is fighting similar charges by another former employee, Jennifer Thong, who sued in September. … Barrett, who is seeking $4 million in damages from Chreky and his salon, said in a telephone interview with the Associated Press that she didn't leave earlier because of an agreement forbidding her to work at another salon within a radius of five miles for six months after leaving."

DOJ_NMG_0126334

Florida To Abandon Touch-Screen Voting Machines. The New York Times (2/2, Goodnough, Drew, 1.16M) reports Florida Gov. Charlie Crist "announced plans on Thursday to abandon the touch-screen voting machines that many of Florida's counties installed after the disputed 2000 presidential election. The state will instead adopt a system of casting paper ballots counted by scanning machines in time for the 2008 presidential election." Voting experts "said Florida's move, coupled with new federal voting legislation expected to pass this year, could be the death knell for the paperless electronic touch-screen machines. If as expected the Florida Legislature approves the $32.5 million cost of the change, it would be the nation's biggest repudiation yet of touch-screen voting, which was widely embraced after the 2000 recount as a state-of-the-art means of restoring confidence that every vote would count."

55% Say Military Should Let Gays, Lesbians Serve Openly. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, 2.04M) reports a "new poll from Harris Interactive found that 55% of Americans think gays and lesbians should be allowed to serve openly in the military." By comparison, "19% of the 2,337 Americans polled said gays and lesbians should be allowed to serve 'only if they keep their sexual orientation a secret,' and 18% said they should 'not be allowed to serve in the military at all.'" The survey, "conducted online between Jan. 11 and 18, also measured American attitudes toward the U.S. military's 'Don't Ask, Don't tell' policy, which prohibits the military from asking personnel about their sexual orientation, but allows homosexuality to be a cause for discharge from the military." Forty-six percent "said they oppose the policy, unchanged from a Harris poll in 2000, and 36% said they favor the policy, compared with 34% in the previous poll. However, the policy is supported by far more men (43%) than women (29%)."

ANTITRUST:

US Subpoenas PackerKiss Securities In Bond Probe. Bloomberg (2/2, Cataldo) reports, "PackerKiss Securities Inc., the firm that has handled over $49 billion of investment contracts for local governments, received two subpoenas as part of a U.S. criminal probe of bid rigging in the municipal bond market." Bloomberg continues, "The Delray Beach, Florida-based firm disclosed the subpoenas in December as it applied for investment business from the state of New Jersey related to a $3.6 billion sale of bonds backed by tobacco settlement payments. Treasury officials hired Dallas-based First Southwest Co. after reviewing applications from five firms, and released the applications this week. … 'As a registered broker dealer we are required to maintain all the files and records that the subpoena requested,' said Mary Packer, the company's president, in a telephone interview. 'We fully cooperated in supplying these in the full knowledge they were complete and absolute.'" Bloomberg adds, "PackerKiss is among more than a dozen banks, brokers and insurance companies that were subpoenaed in November as part of the widest antitrust probe of the municipal bond market, where more than 10,000 of states, cities and local government authorities have $2.3 trillion of bonds outstanding. … U.S. prosecutors are trying to determine if firms fixed prices on financial products used by local governments to invest bond money until it is needed to pay for projects. State and local governments sold almost $379 billion of debt last year, according to Thomson Financial."

Microsoft Plans To License Instructions In Bid To Pacify EU. The AP (2/2) reports, "In a bid to pacify rivals and antitrust regulators, Microsoft Corp. said Thursday that it will license for the first time a series of instructions to help competitors make software products that work smoothly with its servers." The AP continues, "The licenses cover three sets of instructions, known as protocols, that influence the way instant messages, e-mails, shared documents and other software applications are handled by Windows-based servers. Although the offer falls short of some rivals' earlier demands, Microsoft says it shows a new willingness to cooperate." The AP adds, "EU regulators fined Microsoft in July for failing to submit the 'complete and accurate' data it said was needed for rival server software to work with Microsoft's ubiquitous Windows desktop operating system. … Microsoft has rewritten a technical manual to try to meet EU requirements, but the European Commission has not yet said whether the company has now obeyed the original 2004 antitrust ruling ordering the company to hand over these protocols. … Microsoft claims its offer to license these three protocols marks a new approach in its dealings with rivals and antitrust regulators. In the past, it has largely given access to such information only after regulators demanded it. This time, Microsoft says it is being proactive."

DOJ_NMG_0126335

United Airlines CEO Sees Mergers As Still Viable. USA Today (2/2, 3B, Adams) reports, "US Airways' failed hostile bid for Delta Air Lines doesn't kill prospects for other airline mergers, United Airlines CEO Glenn Tilton said Thursday." USA continues, "Speaking one day after the US Airways-Delta deal fell apart, Tilton said the circumstances of a future deal between airlines 'would be different if the two companies and the boards agreed.' … A strong supporter of airline consolidation, Tilton didn't address possible merger partners for his own airline, but argued a friendly merger proposal stands a much better chance of success, though politics and government policies are still potential barriers." USA adds, "He noted that U.S. airlines have lost $35 billion and laid off more than 150,000 workers since the Sept. 11 attacks, and have only recently started to become profitable. Consolidation would produce stronger airlines that could sustain profitability, Tilton argues. … His view on the impact of the failed deal contrasts with that of JPMorgan airline analyst Jamie Baker, who told clients on Thursday that prospects for industry consolidation now have 'ground to a halt.' … US Airways, in mid-November, surprised Delta with its bid to buy it out of Chapter 11 bankruptcy. Delta management vigorously resisted the bid, saying its own plan to emerge from Chapter 11 as an independent airline provides creditors a better deal than US Airways $10 billion stock-and-cash offer."

ENVIRONMENT:

Report Expected To Heighten Pressure On Governments To Reduce Emissions. The CBS Evening News (2/1, story 8, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The world's leading scientists will release their highly anticipated study on global warming tomorrow, and the news is not good." CBS (Phillips) added, "The grim report to be issued [in Paris] tomorrow by the world's top climate scientists is expected to go further than ever before in laying the blame for global warming on human activity." Phillips: "In the same way as the US took a long time to accept the realities of global warming and its human causes, the Bush Administration is now stressing a very different response to most countries in how to respond to it." The US "is counting on future science. It's funding a study to see if millions of reflective plates launched into space and positioned between the earth and the sun could reflect enough energy away to limit the warming, a giant space sunscreen that even the man studying it says is a hugely expensive, desperate idea." Pressure on the US to reduce greenhouse gases "will continue to rise, just like the temperature of the planet."

The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A4, Naik, Ball, 2.04M) says the report, to be published today by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, "is expected to increase pressure on governments and companies to reduce fossil-fuel emissions." A summary of the report "is expected to assert that human activity is 'very likely' the cause of a global-warming trend in recent decades. It comes as governments and some of the world's biggest companies are wrestling with a big challenge: how to apportion among companies and consumers the economic pain that is expected from significantly curbing fossil-fuel emissions." The "document doesn't contain prescriptions for action, though its conclusions will inform the debate about how to respond to climate change." EPA Administrator Steve Johnson "hailed the IPCC report, saying, 'Although many of the findings contained in the report are not new, they are a reflection of increased certainty of observed trends and heightened reliability of climate [computer] model predictions. This is very helpful and useful to us.'"

USA Today (2/2, 6A, O'Driscoll, 2.27M) reports, "Numerous scientists who had seen previous drafts or participated in the global project have told USA TODAY and other news agencies in recent days that the report foresees worse heat waves and droughts, more powerful storms, heavier rain and gradually rising sea levels as temperatures rise and polar ice continues to melt." The "White House said it would review the report. 'The president has long said that humans are playing a role in global warming, and he's put forward programs to address it,' White House spokesman Tony Fratto said."

The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Maugh, 850K) reports the panel says warming "has become a runaway train that cannot be stopped. The warming of Earth and increases in sea level

DOJ_NMG_0126336

'would continue for centuries ... even if greenhouse gas concentrations were to be stabilized," according to a 20-page summary of the report that was leaked to wire services.'" The Times adds, "Many scientists had argued during the editing process that the report should say it is a "virtually certain" that human activities are causing global warming. That would indicate a 99% certainty. But the change was strongly resisted by China, among other nations, because of its reliance on fossil fuels to help build its economy."

USA Today Urges US To Confront Global Warming. In an editorial, USA Today (2/2, 8A, 2.27M) writes that today's report "makes the most compelling case yet that global warming is real, man-made and a threat to the planet. It should have the steadily dwindling group of global-warming naysayers melting away faster than the polar ice caps." The "political climate for change appears to be improving, perhaps radically, despite the cost. ... Even President Bush, a longtime skeptic, mentioned global warming in his most recent State of the Union address." States "have started responding out of frustration at the mismatch between federal inaction and the severity of the problem." The US "has always confronted its most serious problems, whether winning wars or taking on environmental threats. There is no reason it can't do so now with global warming."

Cato Scholar Warns Against Wasting Billions In Futile Attempt To Curb Warming. In a USA Today (2/2, 8A, 2.27M) op-ed, reports, Patrick J. Michaels of the Cato Institute writes, "Climatically, Kyoto would do nothing." The "stark reality is that if we really want to alter the warming trajectory of the planet significantly, we have to cut emissions by an extremely large amount, and -- a truth that everyone must know -- we simply do not have the technology to do so. We would fritter away billions in precious investment capital in a futile attempt to curtail warming." The "best policy is to live with some modest climate change now and encourage economic development, which will generate the capital necessary for investment in the more efficient technologies of the future." Instead of "burning our capital now for no environmental gain (did someone say 'ethanol?'), let's encourage economic development so people can invest and profit in our more efficient future."

Judge Mulls Release Of Material From Rocky Flats Grand Jury. The AP (2/2, Sarche) reports from Denver, "A federal judge said Thursday he wants to release as much information as the law allows from a grand jury investigation of alleged environmental crimes at the former Rocky Flats nuclear weapons plant. … But U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch said a federal appeals court that instructed him to consider what could be released 'cast us adrift in uncharted waters.'" The AP continues, "Matsch asked for guidance from attorneys for former grand jurors who want to publicize alleged misconduct by prosecutors and from government attorneys who argue none of the information can be released. … Matsch had ruled in March 2004 that grand jury secrecy rules prevented the release of testimony transcripts and other documents that 18 of the 23 former grand jurors want the public to see. He also had ruled that he didn't have the authority to release material that might not be covered by those rules." The AP adds, "The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last year reversed that ruling and sent the case back to Matsch, instructing him to determine what could be released. … In a hearing Thursday, government attorneys told Matsch they believed the materials cannot be released. Matsch gave them a month to file supporting arguments, saying the Colorado U.S. attorney's office should consult with Justice Department officials in Washington because the outcome of the case could affect how the agency conducts grand jury investigations in the future. … Matsch also said he wanted both sides to determine how best to notify the prosecutors who worked with the grand jury that some of the information could be released. … 'These allegations being made against counsel are very serious, and the allegations being made against the Department of Justice are very serious,' Matsch said."

CDC Issues Guidelines For Battling Flu Pandemics. The Washington Post (2/2, A3, Brown, 690K) reports the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention issued guidelines for battling flu pandemics yesterday afternoon, as noted in yesterday's briefing. The guidelines recommend that states "be prepared to keep children out of school for three months," and businesses "should be prepared to operate with skeleton workforces, children should be prepared to play mostly with their siblings, and parents should be prepared to lose income as they skip work." The 106-page document also outlines "'non-pharmaceutical interventions' against a virus that can sometimes be caught simply by standing near an infected person. The chief strategy is to keep people physically apart as much as possible during the eight-to-10-week-long waves of illness." Moreover, "states and metropolitan areas would decide when to invoke various measures, such as, closing schools and banning concerts and sporting events." But the guidance "did not suggest restricting travel. Its authors believe that if a pandemic's effects can be blunted or spread out over time, the essential functions of the economy may be able to continue largely unchanged." "'We don't expect we would be able to protect everybody,' the CDC's director, Julie L. Gerberding, said at a news conference" in Washington, D.C.

DOJ_NMG_0126337

The AP (2/2, Stobbe) reports that "Federal officials say they don't expect a vaccine will be available" for a pandemic virus "until at least six months into a pandemic" and "on Thursday, Mr. Leavitt granted companies protection from lawsuits for vaccines against the bird flu virus." Under Leavitt's declaration, "all H5N1 vaccines developed through a grant, contract or cooperative agreement would be protected through all production stages from testing to use. The protection would run through February 2010." The Journal notes that "although the U.S. government has enough medicine for more than 22 million people, it's not clear that they will work against whatever virus emerges, and it's doubtful that will be enough if many of America's 300-million residents become ill."

The New York Times (2/2, McNeil, 1.16M) reports that while "[h]ealth officials acknowledged that such [flu pandemic] measures would hugely disrupt public life," they "argued that these measure would buy the time needed to produce vaccines and would save lives because flu viruses attack in waves lasting about two months." Dr. Martin Cetron, director of global migration and quarantine for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, in releasing the guidelines, said, "We have to be prepared for a Category 5 pandemic. It's not easy. The only thing that's harder is facing the consequences. That will be intolerable."

Army Corps Releases Locations Of 122 Substandard Levees. USA Today (2/2, 1A, Eisler, 2.27M) reports on its front page that the Army Corps of Engineers bowed "to demands from news organizations" Thursday and "revealed the locations…of 122 levees nationwide that are so poorly maintained they could fail in a major flood. Some of the substandard levees protect densely populated areas, such as Springfield, Mass., Albuquerque and Sacramento. Many others are in rural areas, where they shield valuable farmland but relatively few people." Maj. Gen. Don Riley, director of civil works for the corps, "said communities have one year to fix the problems." USA Today adds, "Some local officials first learned of the problems this week, after USA TODAY reported Monday that the corps had found 146 levees with problems so severe that floods could overwhelm them. The corps, which inspects about 2,000 levees nationally, refused at that time to list the specific levees."

ABC World News (2/1, story 6, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In most communities, the strength and solidity of…levees are taken for granted. … Today, a new report says 122 levees all around the nation are in danger of failing, and the report says government at all levels has been lax in maintaining the flood walls." ABC (Stark) added, "This list may be the tip of the iceberg. There are other levees also in trouble for structural problems. Local officials are pleading for federal dollars to help."

The New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) reports, "In most cases, the corps built the levees and handed them over to local communities to maintain them. The new assessment inevitably misses many local levees whose owners have not tried to meet federal standards and would not have been counted, General Riley said. There is more work to be done, he said, adding, 'It is a concern.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Drug Kingpin Sentenced To 40 Years. The AP (2/2) reports from Tampa, FL, "A Colombian drug kingpin was sentenced to 40 years in prison Thursday and must forfeit $110 million, authorities said." The AP continues, "Joaquin Mario Valencia-Trujillo, 49, was sentenced in federal court after being convicted in October on trafficking and money laundering charges, the Justice Department said. … Valencia-Trujillo was arrested in Bogota, Colombia, in January 2003 and later extradited to Florida. He was arrested on charges of conspiracy to import cocaine, conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine and conspiracy to engage in money laundering." The AP adds, "During his trial, Valencia-Trujillo was described as the supplier of over 100 tons of cocaine annually to the United States since the early 1990s until his arrest. … 'The Valencia-Trujillo case serves as another example of the cooperation and commitment of the United States and Colombia to the counterdrug effort,' said U.S. Attorney Paul I. Perez. 'The human misery and societal cost for which this defendant is responsible immeasurable. The punishment is well-deserved and long overdue.'"

DOJ_NMG_0126338

"Operation Dawg Pound" Targets Bloods Gang In New Jersey. The New York Times (2/2, Kocieniewski) reports police on Thursday "arrested 20 members of a street gang that is accused of widespread drug dealing and gun violence in Trenton and central New Jersey. Col. Joseph R. Fuentes, the New Jersey State Police superintendent, said the organization, a faction of the Bloods who referred to themselves as 'Money, Sex, Murder,' are considered the state's most violent youth gang and are believed to have been involved in as many as 19 of the 31 homicides in Trenton in 2005."

The AP (2/2) reports, "Five-hundred packets of heroin, a half-kilo of cocaine, nine weapons and $80,000 in cash were seized in the raids. … Numerous federal, state and local police agencies were involved in the raids, known collectively as Operation Dawg Pound. The nickname was taken from the gang's own references to its members and because gang members wore a trademark tattoo of a dog's paw print." Newsday, WINS Radio in New York, and the Carlisle Pennsylvania Sentinel are among the news outlets that used the AP story.

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/2) reports, "Most of those arrested were charged with racketeering and drug trafficking. Two of the leaders of the Monmouth County gang were also charged with conspiracy to commit murder. … County and local police, the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration, and the state police took part in yesterday's action. In addition to the arrests, authorities seized three pounds of cocaine, one-half kilogram of crack cocaine, 500 packets of heroin ready for street sale, $100,000 in cash, and nine weapons, including a loaded Mac-11 submachine pistol."

The Trenton (NJ) Times (2/2) reports, "By the time state Attorney General Stuart Rabner announced the probe in the afternoon, officers had apprehended 15 people and served charges against six gangsters who were already behind bars on other charges. Eleven of the suspects are from Trenton's branch of the gang."

Neptune, New Jersey's Asbury Park Press (2/1) reported state, federal and local law enforcement officials "arrested 17 adults in a new offensive against the Bloods street gang. Operation Dawg Pound targeted the gang's presence in central New Jersey — predominantly in Mercer, Monmouth and Ocean counties. Charges included conspiracy to commit murder, racketeering, distribution of CDS, and transfer of weapons."

The Cherry Hill (NJ) Courier-Post (2/1) reported the raids "were similar to a gang takedown in July in which more than 60 members of the Nine Tre Gangsters were arrested in cities across the state, including four gang leaders who authorities said were directing gang activities from inside state prison."

The Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger (2/2, Hepp) reports authorities yesterday "arrested 17 suspected leaders of a violent street gang that has kept a stranglehold on vast areas of central New Jersey by employing a volatile mixture of guns and drugs. More than 300 federal, state and local law enforcement officers fanned out in the early morning hours to dismantle two chapters of the Sex Money Murder street gang. … [Bobby] Williams…was charged yesterday by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents for selling $3,000 worth of crack cocaine on two separate occasions to an undercover informant."

On its Web site, WPVI-TV, Philadelphia (2/1) reports, "Among those arrested…at locations in Hamilton, Trenton, Bucks, Monmouth and Ocean Counties was 27-year-old Antonio Merritt of Trenton - identified as the leader of Sex Money Murder, which is a sub set of the Bloods street gang. After a gang-shooting spree last Spring that left fifteen wounded in five days, including 7-year-old Tajanique Lee, the Sex Money Murder set was identified as the biggest threat statewide and to the Trenton community."

WABC-TV, New York (2/2) reports on its Web site that state police "say this is a major assault on the 'Bloods' street gang, which have become notorious across the state for drug activity and gun violence."

Federal Officials' Handling Of Afghan "Drug Lord" Case Scrutinized. The New York Times (2/2, Risen) reports that in April 2005, federal law enforcement officials "summoned reporters to a Manhattan news conference to announce the capture of an Afghan drug lord and Taliban ally. While boasting that he was a big catch...the officials left out some puzzling details, including why the Afghan, Haji Bashir Noorzai, had risked arrest by coming to New York. Now, with Mr. Noorzai's case likely to come to trial this year, a fuller story about the American government's dealings with him is emerging. … In fighting the war on terrorism, government officials have often accepted trade-offs in developing relationships with informants with questionable backgrounds who might prove useful. As with Mr. Noorzai, it is often not clear whether the benefits outweigh the costs."

DOJ_NMG_0126339

The Times adds, "Federal prosecutors in New York handling Mr. Noorzai's case refused to comment for this article, as did spokesmen for the Drug Enforcement Administration, Central Intelligence Agency and United States Central Command."

St. Kitts Man Gets 11-Year Sentence In Cocaine-Smuggling Case. The Sun St. Kitts/Nevis (2/1) reported that in about 11 years, Glenroy "Bobo" Matthew "could be released from a U.S. federal prison to be reunited with his family in St. Kitts. Earlier this week, Matthew was sentenced by U.S. District Court Judge K. Michael Moore to spend 135 months behind bars, to be followed by five years of supervised release. The punishment was handed down on Monday, three months after he pleaded guilty to conspiring to import cocaine into the United States." The case "was the result of a joint ICE and DEA investigation of AmeriJet International employees who were using the freight air carrier to smuggle cocaine into Miami from various Carribean Islands. Matthew was the exclusive agent for AmeriJet on the island of St. Kitts."

Georgia Man Faces Attempted Murder Charges Following Drug Investigation In New York. The AP (2/2) reports a drug suspect from Georgia "was charged Thursday with attempting to murder federal agents who were investigating reports of drug activity inside a Buffalo hotel room. A federal indictment alleges that Camara Griffin of Atlanta stuck a loaded pistol into a hallway Jan. 11 at the downtown Comfort Inn and pulled the trigger after three Drug Enforcement Administration agents arrived at a room where hotel staff had reported smelling marijuana and seeing what appeared to be crack cocaine. … The agents closed the hotel room door and after a few minutes talked [Colin] Greenaway and Griffin into surrendering, Assistant U.S. Attorney Timothy Lynch said. Investigators found one ejected .40-caliber round in the room." Georgia's Columbus Ledger-Enquirer and WSTM-TV in Syracuse used the AP story.

Former Maryland Teacher Gets 6-Year Sentence In Meth Case. The Columbia (MD) Flier (2/1) reported a former River Hill High School social studies teacher "was sentenced in January to six and a-half years in federal prison for a scheme to sell $50,000 worth of the drug methamphetamine. On Jan. 19, U.S. District Court Judge Andre Davis sentenced Timothy Hartlove to 78 months in prison followed by three years of supervised release. Hartlove, who taught social studies at River Hill from 2001 to September 2005, was arrested in September 2005 during a joint investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and Maryland State Police."

ATF, FBI Probing Similar Bombs Found In Kansas City, Chicago. The Kansas City Star (2/2, Morris) reports, "Federal agents on Thursday investigated whether similar bombs, each accompanied by a note and found a day apart in Kansas City and Chicago, were connected." The Star continues, "Authorities disarmed an explosive device in a downtown Chicago business Thursday afternoon, said Wanda Shipp, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Postal Inspection Service. … It resembled a pipe bomb found Wednesday morning in a Kansas City investment company's mail facility, she said." The Star adds, "A threatening note accompanied the Kansas City bomb. The device in Illinois also was accompanied by a note, though Shipp would not characterize it as 'threatening.' … The close timing of the discoveries was worrisome. Typically, postal inspectors investigate only a few instances of explosive devices sent through the mail each year, according to the agency's annual reports. One exception was 2004, when inspectors chased down 21 incendiary letters that a Nevada prisoner sent to state officials." The Star notes, "Bomb squads from the Chicago Police Department and agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives defused the bomb, Shipp said. No one was injured. … Postal Inspector Don Obritsch said investigators from his agency, the FBI and ATF were aggressively pursuing leads."

13 In San Diego Charged With Weapons Violations In "Operation Colt .45." The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/2, Soto, 324K) reports, "Eight gang members and five other men who sold weapons to a man posing as an illegal-gun dealer but who was working on behalf of federal authorities were charged with weapons violations Thursday. … They are scheduled to appear Friday in San Diego federal court, and could face prison sentences of up to 10 years. The arrests came as a result of a 9-month undercover operation that focused on buying guns from gang members in San Diego, Spring Valley and Lemon Grove, said Dan Dzwilewski, head of the FBI's San Diego office. 'San Diego gang members routinely buy and sell firearms as a commodity,' he said, noting several of the guns had been stolen in other states." The Union-Tribune notes, "The investigation was called 'Operation Colt .45' and included the FBI, San Diego Sheriff's Department, San Diego Police Department and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives."

DOJ_NMG_0126340

Connecticut Gun Dealer Pleads Guilty To Federal Violation. The Connecticut Post (2/2, Mayko) reports from Bridgeport, KT, "Frank D'Andrea leaned against a wall outside a federal courtroom, nervously tried to manage a smile before saying, 'I'm glad it's over.' … With one word – 'guilty' -- D'Andrea, 62, of Soundview Drive, Shelton, ended his 36-year career as a federally licensed firearms dealer who operated stores in Bridgeport, Stratford and Milford." The Post continues, "Come April 20, D'Andrea faces anywhere from 37 to 46 months in prison and a $10,000 fine when U.S. District Judge Janet C. Hall sentences him for possessing a unregistered explosive device. … The device — a .12 gauge Cobra shotgun with a motorized barrel called a Streetsweeper — was found behind an office during an April 2005 audit conducted at the Stratford store by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosive Devices. … But that charge was only one of 12 in a federal indictment returned last spring against the gun dealer. In December, Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Reynolds vowed to go back before the grand jury and indict D'Andrea on more charges if a plea-bargain deal was not worked out." The Post adds, "Over the years, D'Andrea, a frequent critic of stronger gun laws, was no stranger to the ATF. They cited him in 1998 for record-keeping violations and issued him warning letters for similar problems in 2000 and 2001. … Yet, they also sought his help as a witness in some federal prosecutions. … It wasn't until U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor stepped in with his Project Safe Neighborhoods program that D'Andrea was prosecuted."

ATF Gang Probe Leads To Drug Charges Against Two In Washington. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (2/2, Gutierrez) reports, "Two men, including a suspected gang member, have been indicted as part of a federal investigation that netted 14 pounds of cocaine worth about $100,000, federal officials announced Wednesday." The P-I continues, "Federal prosecutors say that one defendant is a member of the Norteno street gang. The mostly Hispanic gang is rooted in California but has extended its presence and illicit drug dealing into Washington, primarily in the Yakima Valley, U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Sullivan said. … The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' Violent Gang Task Force led the investigation." The P-I adds, "This wasn't one of the larger recent drug busts, but federal officials used the arrests to showcase work of the task force, which includes investigators from Seattle police and the King County Sheriff's Office. … 'Anytime you take that much dope off the street it's going to have significant impact on the distribution level in the city. Maybe short term, but it's still going to have an impact,' said Special Agent Kelvin Crenshaw, who supervises the ATF's Seattle office." The P-I notes, "The defendants were identified as Edward Martinez, 21, of Yakima and Cody Higgenbotham, 20, of South King County. Both men are being held in the Federal Detention Center in SeaTac. They were indicted this week on cocaine distribution charges and are scheduled to be arraigned Feb. 8 in U.S. District Court."

IMMIGRATION:

Judge Rules Louisiana Law Banning Illegal Immigrants From Driving Unconstitutional. The AP (2/2) reports from Gretna, LA, "A state law requiring drivers from other countries to prove they are in the United States legally has been ruled unconstitutional." The AP continues, "In a decision handed down late Wednesday, State District Judge Jo Ellen Grant said the law, passed by state lawmakers as an anti-terrorism measure in 2002, illegally steps on federal immigration law. … The ruling applies only in Jefferson Parish. A similar challenge is pending in neighboring New Orleans." The AP adds, "The judge threw out the state's case against Omar Barrientos, who was stopped by police last March for having an expired license plate. At the time, he was carrying somebody else's Texas identification card, authorities said. … Under the law, any 'alien student' or 'nonresident alien' who drives in Louisiana must carry documents proving they are in the United States legally. Violators face up to a year in jail and a $1,000. … The law also requires state authorities to report violators to the federal Immigration and Naturalization Service." The AP notes, "Grant said the definition of 'alien student' or 'nonresident alien' was different from that contained in federal law. The identification requirement 'exceeds the standard contemplated by federal immigration law,' the judge wrote. … Melissa Crow, an attorney with the National Immigration Law Center who argued against the law, said the legislative history of the law's passage showed its intended purpose was to stop the use of fraudulent driver's licenses. However, most people booked with the offense do not have licenses, she said."

DOJ_NMG_0126341

Texas Immigration Raid Nets 53 Arrests. The AP (2/2) reports, "Federal agents arrested 53 suspected illegal immigrants Wednesday after raiding a trash collection plant, officials said." The AP continues, "U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said those arrested at the Republic Services Inc. plant near Houston face deportation. Many of the immigrants are from El Salvador, Mexico, Honduras and Nicaragua." The AP adds, "Agents detained workers hired through temporary agencies, said Will Flower, a spokesman for the Fort Lauderdale, Fla.-based company. The company has no oversight on how the temporary staffing agencies that provide workers to Republic comply with federal regulations, he said. … The company has yet to learn why some workers were arrested, Flower said." The AP notes, "Wednesday's raid is the latest in a string of immigration arrests in recent months, including nearly 1,300 in meatpacking plants in six states in December, and more than 750 in metropolitan Los Angeles last week."

Martinez Endorses Guest-Worker Measure. The Washington Times (2/2, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida, the Republican National Committee's new general chairman, wants Congress to pass an immigration bill this year that will include a guest-worker program with 'earned citizenship' requirements for illegal aliens." Martinez, "whose election encountered sharp opposition from some RNC members who think his support for giving illegal aliens a path to citizenship is a thinly veiled form of amnesty, said, 'I don't support deporting these people because I don't believe that's a realistic approach.'" In an interview with The Washington Times, he "acknowledged the opposition to his election and his support for the Kennedy-McCain bill that called for a multistep process of earned amnesty for all but the most recent illegals. But he said, 'My views on immigration are not well understood.'" Added Martinez, "I did support Kennedy-McCain. I did vote for that, but I had some amendments to that bill that made it, I think, more conservative. We need border security and strong assimilation. I voted for the 700-mile fence on the border. I'm a strong advocate of these things. … But I don't wake up every morning worrying about the issue. It's an important issue. It needs to be dealt with. But I don't have some agenda here."

End Of Catch And Release Said To Have Placed Strain On Immigrant Detention System. In a front page article, the Washington Post (2/2, A1, Hsu, Moreno, 690K) reports the "futuristic tent city" in Raymondville, Texas, built "to keep pace with Washington's increasing demand for stronger enforcement of immigration laws." It "marks both the success and the limits of the government's new policy of holding captured non-Mexicans until they are sent home." The change "has led to a dramatic decline in border crossings by non-Mexicans, according to the US Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency. But civil liberties and immigration law groups allege that out of sight, the system is bursting at the seams," with detainees "confined 23 hours a day in windowless tents made of a Kevlar-like material, often with insufficient food, clothing, medical care and access to telephones. … Gary Mead, assistant director of ICE detention and removal operations, said the agency is proud of its record, calling Raymondville 'a modern, clean facility' that meets federal standards – 'which we believe are among the highest you'll find anywhere.'"

TAX:

Protective Order Granted In Nebraska Tax Case. The North Platte (NE) Telegraph (2/2, Lindenberger) reports that attorneys representing "Lowell Baisden have been granted a protective order preventing the U.S. Justice Department from using depositions of Burt McKeag, Evan Geilenkirchen and Jane Geilenkirchen, all of North Platte." The Telegraph continues, "Baisden, the California accountant who has been accused of tax fraud, was to appear in U.S. District Court on Feb. 8 for a hearing to determine whether to grant the Justice Department's request for a preliminary injunction. On Tuesday, that hearing was continued to March 2 due to the court's heavy caseload." The Telegraph adds, "The Justice Department claims Baisden has been promoting an illegal tax avoidance scheme to many of his clients. Among his current and former clients are seven North Platte health care practitioners. … Those who were scheduled to appear for depositions last week are all former clients of Baisden's who have hired new accountants to re-file their tax returns and correct the information reported by Baisden." The Telegraph notes, "Prior court documents have stated that McKeag consulted a new accountant in 2003 to prepare an amended return and correct the false information Baisden had reported on his 2002 tax return. … The Geilenkirchens have also re-filed the tax returns prepared by Baisden and filed their own lawsuit against the accountant, seeking damages for the interest and penalties that have been assessed against them by the IRS."

DOJ_NMG_0126342

Judge Rejects Tax Shelter Once Sold By KPMG. The New York Times (2/2, Browning) reports, "A federal judge in Texas has ruled that a widely used aggressive tax shelter was based on fake bank loans and is therefore not legitimate, giving an unexpected boost to federal prosecutors overseeing a widening criminal investigation into tax shelters." The Times continues, "The shelter, known as Blips, plays a central role in the criminal inquiry of Deutsche Bank over questionable tax shelters and in the pending criminal trial in federal court in Manhattan of 16 former employees of the accounting firm KPMG and two outsiders." The Times adds, "The civil ruling on Tuesday by Judge T. John Ward of Federal District Court for the Eastern District of Texas will probably add ammunition to Manhattan prosecutors' arguments that Deutsche Bank acted improperly by providing fake loans for Blips and similar shelters. Judge Ware's is the first major civil ruling on the legitimacy of Blips, or bond-linked issue premium structure. … It is also likely to bolster prosecutors' case against certain KPMG defendants who are also named in the judge's ruling. They are John Larson, Robert Pfaff and David Amir Makov, all former employees of an investment firm called Presidio Advisory Services, now defunct. According to previously disclosed internal Deutsche Bank documents, Blips was created and sold primarily by Deutsche Bank, KPMG and Presidio." The Times notes, "Judge Ward's ruling is also notable in that it absolves of any guilt two wealthy Texas investors who bought Blips. The investors were Harold W. Nix and C. Cary Patterson, two lawyers on a legal team that earned sizable fees for winning a $17 billion tobacco settlement for Texas in 1998. … Mr. Nix and Mr. Patterson sued the Internal Revenue Service after it disallowed their claims for around $25 million each in losses stemming from Blips on their federal tax returns from 2000 through 2002. … Judge Ward ruled that both investors must pay the taxes they owe, but that they were not liable for multimillion-dollar penalties stemming from their use of Blips."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Seek $70 Billion Savings From Medicare, Medicaid. The New York Times (2/2, Pear, 1.16M) reports President Bush will "ask Congress in his budget next week to squeeze more than $70 billion of savings from Medicare and Medicaid over the next five years, administration officials and health care lobbyists said Thursday." The proposals, "part of a White House plan to balance the budget by 2012, set the stage for a battle with Congress over entitlement spending. Even some administration officials say they cannot imagine approval of such large cutbacks in a Congress now controlled by Democrats." Bush is "also expected to propose changes in the Children's Health Insurance Program to sharpen its focus on low-income families. The changes could reduce federal payments to states that cover children with family incomes exceeding twice the poverty level."

Bush To Propose Large Boost In Pell Grants. The Washington Post (2/2, A5, Paley, 690K) reports, "The Bush administration yesterday proposed boosting the nation's main financial aid program for low-income college students by the largest amount in more than three decades, the latest in a flurry of measures this week by Congress and the White House to make higher education more affordable." U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings announced during a speech at North Carolina State University in Raleigh yesterday the proposed increase in the maximum Pell grant by $550 to $4,600. In response, "advocates for students hailed the proposed expansion" but "cautioned that it would be meaningless if offset by cuts to other federal aid programs." Massachusetts Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D) said that "he welcomed the change but criticized Bush and fellow Republicans for failing to increase the Pell grant in recent years."

The New York Times (2/2, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "Ms. Spellings's announcement suggests that the administration will try to emphasize access to education, an issue that Democrats have seized upon as the cost and debt burden of higher education continue to rise. Democrats have already proposed legislation in the Senate that, exceeding the administration's plan, calls for an increase to $5,100."

The Washington Times (2/2, Fagan, 88K) reports the administration is proposing to "increase the grants to $5,400

DOJ_NMG_0126343

over five years, the largest five-year increase ever." The plan is expected to "meet with skepticism from some conservatives who say the government already is pouring an exorbitant amount of money into higher education. But the government has been under pressure to help more because rising college costs are making it increasingly difficult for some to attend college."

The AP (2/2, Pope) reports, "Education advocates warned that they're unsure how the increase would be funded, and caution it could come at the expense of other financial aid programs." Spellings said that it "would be paid for with increased revenues and 'efficiencies' that she declined to specify, saying details would be released with the president's budget announcement Monday." While, Sen. Kennedy said the proposal "shows how a Democratic Congress is changing the nation's priorities," "increasing Pell grants was a key recommendation of Spellings' national Commission on the Future of Higher Education."

Portman Defends Bush Budget Plans. In a New York Times letter to the editor (2/2), Office of Management and Budget director Rob Portman says, "In 'The Budget Illusion' (editorial, Jan. 28), regarding the president's balanced budget proposal, you correctly focus on the need for honest budgeting and consistency. On Monday, we will present a budget that uses realistic assumptions to reduce deficits each year and achieve balance by 2012. The editorial specifically warns against 'pie in the sky' revenue assumptions. I believe that the revenue projections provided by the career professionals at the Treasury Department will be viewed as credible, even cautious."

Labor Department Official's Email Highlights Budget's "Weaknesses." In the Washington Post's "In The Loop" column (2/2, A13), Al Kamen says, "Federal agencies are putting the final touches on the administration's fiscal 2008 budget, due out Monday, checking the numbers and preparing to do battle with the Democrats over priorities and programs." David James, 'an aide to Labor Secretary Elaine Chao, sent an e-mail Wednesday to various Labor and White House officials titled 'DOL Budget Highlights and Low-Lights for . . . Budget Roll-Out.'" One "part of the e-mail highlighted 'Vulnerabilities/Democrat Attacks.' One budget proposal is to 'consolidate and streamline' four training programs, the e-mail said, but 'Democrats portray this as simply a cut on worker training' and oppose it." Another proposal "calls for 'a reduction in the budget' for the Bureau of International Labor Affairs and having 'other federal entities' take over the bureau's 'grant-making function.' 'This will be attacked as neglecting international child labor programs,' James's e-mail said."

"Emergency" Bill Expected To Include Unneeded Spending. USA Today (2/2, Yaukey, 2.27M) reports the Bush Administration next week "is expected to send Congress what could be one of the largest supplemental spending requests in history — $100 billion or more, primarily for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan." The spending bill is "supposed to cover basic costs, including personnel, equipment repairs and replacement, ammunition and other directly related operating expenses not covered by the Pentagon's regular annual budget for fiscal year 2007." But military budget analysts "and tax watchdogs say if the past is any indicator, the Pentagon and the Congress will try to load this off-budget shopping cart with expensive new weapons and pork for the voters that has nothing to do with defense or any of the disaster relief that emergency spending bills sometimes fund as well."

Democrats Put Imprint On 2007 Spending Measure. The Christian Science Monitor (2/2, Chaddock, 59K) reports after "blitzing six top-priority bills through the House in their first 100 legislative hours, Democrats struck a quick deal on unfinished spending bills from the last Congress, and made it look easy." It is the "first test of whether the new majority on Capitol Hill can keep promises to voters to rein in federal budget deficits, yet also fund its party's defining priorities." In a "bid to move quickly, House Democrats precooked a master compromise with the Senate Wednesday that rolls all nine remaining spending bills into one. The deal accepts the White House ceiling of $463.5 billion, avoiding a clash with Mr. Bush. But it carves out some $10 billion for 'unmet needs,' including veterans' healthcare, low-income housing, education, and some 500 research programs." In "Washington terms, $10 billion is not much in a spending cycle that totals more than $2 trillion. But it sends a strong signal, reinforcing what Democrats say will be a key issue in the 2008 election campaign: their commitment to help the middle class." Their "targets for new spending include: $3.6 billion for veterans' healthcare, a $260 increase to the maximum Pell grant for some 5.3 million college students, $3.5 billion for federal highways, $1.4 billion for low-income housing, as well as new funds for low-performing schools, Head Start, special education, the National Institutes of Health, law enforcement, and global HIV/AIDS prevention."

DOJ_NMG_0126344

OMB Deputy Director Suggests There Has Been Too Little Congressional Oversight. The AP (2/2, Ben Feller) reports, "A White House management official said Thursday there is 'very little real accountability' in the federal government, and he welcomed the tougher oversight the Democrats have promised now that they control Congress. 'There cannot be enough accountability in the federal government,' said Clay Johnson, deputy director of the Office and Management and Budget, which supervises executive branch agencies. 'There is very little today. Very little real accountability.'" However, "Johnson challenged Democratic lawmakers to help solve problems -- not just hold hearings about them." He also "said Democrats can expect candor and cooperation."

OMB Wants Agency Employees To Make Federal Programs More Effective. Under the headline, "A Tale Of Mice Illustrates How To Save Money," the Washington Post's (2/2, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "For an example of how federal employees can make a difference," OMB "offered up the story of feeder mice. When the Interior Department began looking for budget savings, the staff at the Chickasaw National Recreation Area took a look at the time and money they spent on raising mice to feed to reptiles and birds of prey at the Oklahoma refuge. They calculated that they could save $15,000 a year by buying mice from vendors, and they now have more money available for their nature trails." Clay Johnson called the "feeder mice 'my favorite example' of how a group of federal employees can be given budget data and asked to sort out spending that is essential and spending that indirectly supports an operation. In the Chickasaw case, raising mice turned out to not be all that important." The OMB "wants to focus on making strides in the effectiveness of federal programs over the next two years, after spending much of the past six years urging agencies to improve internal management techniques and practices." The Post adds, "Federal employees are key to making programs more effective, Johnson said."

Bush Approval Edges Up To 38% In Fox News Poll. Fox News' Special Report (2/1, Hume) reported, "The latest Fox News/Opinion Dynamics Poll finds Americans feeling slightly more favorable about President Bush. His job approval rating rose to 38 percent, that's from 35 percent just two weeks ago. Not great, but better. Congress, however, seems to still be in the doghouse with Americans; 33 percent now approve of the job Congress is doing, about the same as those asked in mid January."

Bush Says Cheney Optimistic, Not Out Of Touch. In the Washington Post's "In The Loop" column (2/2, A13), Al Kamen says, "Vice President Cheney has taken a pounding in the biased liberal media for touting the 'enormous successes' in Iraq. He's been called 'a little crazy,' 'crazy as a loon,' 'a compulsive liar' and 'deranged.'" But President Bush, "who knows Cheney far better than his critics do, says nothing could be further from the truth. Cheney, in fact, is 'a person reflecting a half-glass-full mentality,' which translated into English means he sees the glass half-full, not half-empty." Bush, "making the media rounds in a State of the Union follow-up, also lamented the nastiness of the nation's capital. 'And there is distrust in Washington,' he told NPR's Juan Williams on Monday. 'I am surprised, frankly, at the amount of distrust that exists in this town. And I'm sorry it's the case, and I'll work hard to try to elevate it.'"

Senate Passes Minimum Wage Hike With Business Tax Cuts. The CBS Evening News (2/1, story 2, :20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The country's lowest paid workers may finally be get a raise. The Senate voted today to increase the Federal minimum wage for the first time in a decade. The jump from the current $5.15 an hour to $7.25 would be phased in over two years. The House has also voted for a wage hike, but the Senate bill includes some controversial tax provisions and it may take months to work out a compromise." The NBC Nightly News (2/1, story 5, :30, Williams, 9.87M) noted the Senate "linked the wage hike to tax cuts for small businesses. … The two houses have to agree on a final version before anything can be sent to the President."

USA Today (2/2, 5A, 2.27M) reports the Senate tally was 94-3, and says Majority Leader Harry Reid "raised the possibility that the Senate negotiators may agree to demands from Democrats in the House of Representatives that the tax breaks be stripped from the bill that eventually gets sent to…Bush." The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A4, Lueck, 2.04M) also notes Reid "questioned whether 'we need all these business pieces of sugar' in the legislation. Rep. Richard Durbin (D., Ill.), the assistant majority leader, said a minimum-wage increase could emerge from a House-Senate conference without the tax breaks. 'If we go through the process and go through a conference and the message comes back, "You can have the minimum wage stripped down or not at all," then we'll face another vote,' Mr. Durbin said. 'We need Republicans to pass it. If they continue to oppose it, then it will not pass.'"

DOJ_NMG_0126345

The New York Times (2/2, Zernike, 1.16M), however, reports that although Reid "said in a meeting with reporters early Thursday that he thought the Senate might approve a clean bill if the House sent it back for another try," his office "later said that he did not believe the vote count had changed and that he expected that the differences could be worked out in negotiations."

The AP (2/2, Kuhnhenn) says "the wage hike has both real and symbolic consequences. It would be one of the first major legislative successes of the new Democratic-controlled Congress." Now "the measure presents a challenge to Democrats who must navigate between the demands of labor and other interest groups and the realities of the Senate, where Republicans hold 49 of 100 votes. House and Senate Democrats now must try to negotiate a way out of the potential standoff." House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "has said she supports some tax provisions in the House package, but said she would prefer them in a separate, House-initiated tax bill." In a statement, President Bush "encouraged House Democrats to accept the Senate version of the bill. 'The Senate has taken a step toward helping maintain a strong and dynamic labor market and promoting continued economic growth,' Bush said." But "AFL-CIO President John Sweeney vowed to 'turn up the volume' to pass a bill without tax breaks." The three senators voting against the bill were Republicans "Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, Jon Kyl of Arizona and Jim DeMint of South Carolina."

The Washington Post (2/2, D1, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "As approved by the Senate, the bill would extend several business tax deductions and credits, including one that allows small businesses to accelerate deductions for new purchases." It "would extend for five years a tax credit for employers who hire welfare recipients and 'high-risk youth' and expand the provision to include disabled military veterans. To cover the costs of those provisions, the bill would close loopholes used by corporations that do business overseas and increase penalties for tax evasion. It would also place new restrictions on one of the most popular perquisites in corporate America by forbidding executives from deferring more than $1 million in pay every year and placing the money in tax-deferred accounts. Anyone who exceeded the allowable amount would be forced to pay taxes on all income deferred since Dec. 31, 2006, plus a 20 percent penalty." McClatchy (2/2, Talev) notes Sen. Ted Kennedy, "the liberal icon who's long championed a minimum-wage increase, said the GOP tax package is one of the 'least offensive' possible because it includes incentives for hiring minorities and disadvantaged Americans."

The Washington Times (2/2, Miller, 88K) reports "Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, has demanded a "clean" minimum-wage bill identical to the House version. … Ways and Means Committee spokesman Matthew Beck said Republicans were 'holding hostage' the wage increase."

Minimum Wage Hike Seen As Not Enough To Help Poor. In a Washington Post op-ed (2/2, A15), former Clinton adviser Thomas Z. Freedman says the US should "raise the minimum wage while committing our country to a bigger bargain: If you work full time, then you and your family will live above the poverty line. This goal is not only morally right but one our country can afford." On its own, "the minimum wage is an imperfect means for ensuring no full-time worker is poor. First, it almost certainly will not be raised enough." It would "take a wage of $10 an hour for a worker to earn $20,000 a year, about the poverty threshold for a family of four. Second, there are reasonable arguments that a $10 minimum wage would harm many small businesses. Finally, increases in the minimum wage are not indexed for inflation -- and may never be." A "better approach would be to increase the wage and simultaneously expand the earned-income tax credit (EITC)."

Bush Says Healthful Diet Is Individual, Not Government Responsibility. The Washington Post (2/2, A5, Abramowitz, 690K) reports "President Bush yesterday added his voice to the growing debate over childhood obesity, as he met at the White House with representatives of some of the companies considered responsible for aggravating the problem and urged them to stress the importance of healthful eating and physical fitness in their marketing campaigns." However, "[a]s described by those present, the meeting was cordial" but "the president signaled no intent to pursue more aggressive policies favored by some consumer groups, such as, banning the marketing of junk food to children or requiring more detailed nutritional labeling." Bush told the "executives that it is an individual's responsibility to maintain a healthful diet, not the government's."

DOJ_NMG_0126346

USA Today/AP (2/2) also covers the Bush meeting, noting that "more than 10-million school-age children in the US -- about 18% -- are now considered overweight. The percentage of overweight children tripled among adolescents during the past 25 years, and nearly doubled for children ages 6 to 12." The New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) also carries the AP story.

Democrats Rescue Bush Global Health Package. The New York Times (2/2, Dugger, 1.16M) reports, "At a time of intensifying conflict between President Bush and Democrats in Congress over the Iraq war, the Democratic-led House acted this week to rescue another of Mr. Bush's international priorities: the global fight against AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis, diseases that kill millions of Africans each year. That Democrats stepped in to champion Mr. Bush's signature global health undertakings suggests the deepening of political support for foreign aid programs, especially those that quickly demonstrate they can save hundreds of thousands of lives. It also bucks a historical pattern of declining support for foreign assistance when control of Congress and the White House is divided between Democrats and Republicans."

Bush Administration To Give Vaccine Companies Immunity From Avian Flu Suits. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A12, Zhang, 2.04M) reports, "The Bush administration triggered a provision of a 2005 law that gives companies protection from product-liability lawsuits for vaccines or drugs they produce in connection with the avian-flu strain. The law, enacted 13 months ago, gives the Secretary of Health and Human Services the power to grant immunity to vaccine makers in the event of a risk to public health." HHS invoked the clause last week in a directive that cited "a credible risk that an avian influenza virus spreads and evolves into a strain capable of causing a pandemic of human influenza."

FDA Reform Proposals Contain "Bitter Pills" For Pharmaceutical Companies. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Mathews, 2.04M) reports, that "big reforms" Congress may pass for the FDA "could produce some bitter pills for the pharmaceutical industry: potentially, tougher safety rules and provisions to reduce the cost of medicines." The Journal continues, "Yesterday, Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Sen. Michael Enzi of Wyoming, the chairman and ranking Republican of the health committee, respectively, introduced legislation that would give the FDA new authority to impose safety requirements on medicines once they go on the market, including restrictions on consumer advertising." The Journal adds, "Proposals to beef up regulation have stalled before, often due to skepticism from Republican allies of the industry. This year is likely to be different. Democrats aren't reluctant to give expanded authority to federal regulators and see the drug industry as a tempting target because of its tenuous popularity with consumers and its traditional ties to Republicans."

Congress Moves Quickly On Children's Health Insurance Program. The AP (2/2, Freking) reports that while Congress probably will take its time in considering President Bush's plan for expanding health insurance coverage," it is "moving more quickly to renew" the State Children's Health Insurance Program, "a program that now provides coverage to 6 million people, mostly children," and expires Sept. 30. The AP continues, "When Congress approved the program in 1997, it provided $40 billion over 10 years. States use the money, along with their own dollars, to subsidize health coverage for families with incomes too high to qualify for Medicaid but too low to afford insurance through the private sector."

Senate Democrats Urge Stricter FCC Rule Enforcement. The New York Times (2/2, Labaton, 1.16M) reports, "Signaling tougher oversight, Democrats who recently gained control of the Senate urged the head of the Federal Communications Commission on Thursday to take a more aggressive approach to the industries he oversees." In his first appearance before the Senate Commerce Committee under Democratic leadership, Kevin J. Martin, the FCC chairman, "and the other commissioners faced sharp criticism from some senior senators on the handling of the recent acquisition of BellSouth by AT&T." Lawmakers also "questioned the commission's practice of renewing broadcast licenses of radio and television stations with virtually no review." The Times adds "the aggressive questioning by the panel's senior Democrats -- including its chairman, Daniel K. Inouye of Hawaii; John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia; Byron L. Dorgan of North Dakota; and Barbara Boxer of California -- suggested that the senators would be applying significant pressure on the policy-making apparatus of the commission."

DOJ_NMG_0126347

The Washington Post (2/2, D2, Babington, 690K) reports "several Democrats on the Senate Commerce Committee warned the agency not to try to relax limits on the number of media outlets one company can own, as the FCC did in 2003 only to have a federal court stay the action. Recent FCC policies on media ownership," said Dorgan, have been "a spectacular failure." Dorgan "railed against rules that allow one entity to own eight radio stations in a large city and against proposals to allow one owner to have three TV stations in a city."

USA Today (2/2, Davidson, 2.27M) notes Martin "faced tough questions from a Senate panel Thursday over his comments that he would not enforce a key condition the FCC imposed before approving of the AT&T-BellSouth merger." Inouye the chairman "did not intend to 'stand by the deal' and that he was obliged to withhold his vote and negotiate further if he had concerns about any of the conditions." The Washington Times/Cox News Service (2/2) runs a similar story.

Frank To Push For Data Privacy Laws. The Washington Post (2/2, D3, Krebs, 690K) reports, "Data privacy is likely to be among the hottest technology issues to face Congress this year, in part due to interest" from House Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank, who says "he plans to craft a bill that would exempt companies from disclosing data breaches, provided they secure the data with encryption software or other technology that would render it virtually unreadable if it fell into the wrong hands. Frank also said he wants retailers to be held more accountable for data breaches. … While some major corporations -- most recently Microsoft -- have expressed support for some kind of federal consumer privacy law to govern how companies can use, combine and trade consumer data, the effort to produce baseline privacy protections for consumers may set off contentious policy debates, said Fred von Lohmann, a senior staff attorney with the Electronic Frontier Foundation."

Two More Lawmakers Criticize Baca, But Don't Resign From Hispanic Caucus. The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Simon, 850K) reports, "The Congressional Hispanic Caucus was thrown into turmoil Thursday after Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Santa Ana) resigned her membership amid accusations that its chairman, Rep. Joe Baca (D-Rialto), had been demeaning to women. Two of the remaining five women in the 21-member caucus expressed concerns about how the group treated them, but did not resign." Rep. Hilda L. Solis "complained about the 'lack of respect afforded to women members of the Hispanic Caucus.'" And Rep. Linda T. Sanchez "stood by her sister and fellow congresswoman, saying: 'I am waiting to see whether the Hispanic Caucus leadership will make good on its promise to be more fair and inclusive of Latina members.'" On Wednesday, Loretta Sanchez "told the Politico, a new Capitol Hill newspaper, that Baca had called her a 'whore.'" Baca "denied the charges Thursday, saying, 'These accusations are categorically untrue.'" This morning, The Politico (2/2) notes that in a statement, Baca said Sanchez "has decided to resign from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus…and has chosen to air baseless statements."

The AP (2/2, Werner) reports, "Baca was supported by only one of six women in the 21-member caucus when he was elected chairman in November." Solis, Loretta Sanchez and her sister, Linda, and Rep. Nydia Velazquez "subsequently disputed the election procedure and asked for a new secret-ballot vote. All caucus members are Democrats." The AP adds, "Other concerns include Baca's decision to use money from the caucus' political action committee to fund his sons' unsuccessful campaigns for state office in California last year. That led Solis, the Sanchez sisters and three other lawmakers to sever ties with the fundraising groups."

NYTimes Calls For More Protection For Federal Judges. The New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "One of the more refreshing changes in Congress's mind-set growing out of the November election is that the House is no longer led by Republicans who demonize judges for sport. This change to more judge-friendly leadership should, at long last, lead to the House's joining the Senate in passing a much-needed bill to protect federal judges from physical attack."

OTHER NEWS:

Bush, Democrats Painting Dramatically Different Economic Pictures. The AP (2/2, Raum) reports, "The booming economy that President Bush paints is a far cry from the worrisome one increasingly portrayed by Democratic presidential candidates and party leaders. To them, there are worker insecurities, stagnant wage growth and soaring costs for health care and college. The vision of rival economies already is a main issue for the 2008 presidential and congressional races. Economists say both sides are right -- and wrong. It just depends on what numbers you summon." The AP adds, "Bolstering Bush's outlook was a new Commerce Department report showing that the economy gained speed in the final three months of 2006. The economy grew at an annual rate of 3.5 percent, much faster than the 2 percent increase of the previous three months. Stocks soared after that report and after the Federal Reserve's decision to leave interest rates steady. But hold on." Presidential candidates John Edwards and Barack Obama have argued the country is seeing an increasing "rich-poor" divide. Obama has "cited 'skyrocketing health care bills,' lost pensions and struggles to pay for college." Also, "the cutback in building has led to thousands of layoffs in the construction industry, Democrats note."

DOJ_NMG_0126348

Strength of Job Market Led Fed To Decide Against Rates Cuts. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, C1, Hilsenrath, 2.04M) reports, "Lots of investors expected interest-rate cuts early this year. But one part of the economy refused to cooperate: the job market. Economic output seemed to slow in mid-2006, but the job market remained healthy. Government surveys of businesses showed jobs grew at a respectable clip of around 150,000 a month. Surveys of households showed they grew even faster." The unemployment rate "fell to 4.5% in December from 4.9% in December 2005. And the performance was all the more remarkable because the labor force grew faster than it had in six years, meaning more to employ." In a story titled "Fed's Inflation Dilemma," the Wall Street Journal (2/2, A2, lp, 2.04M) also examines the debate inside the Fed about "an explicit target for inflation," in which some prefer "an implicit, or 'soft' target." The debate "reflects Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke's belief that the central bank needs to develop a clearer, more systematic way of communicating its intentions to the public, to lessen the chance of any market-jolting surprises. Currently, the Fed's…doesn't specify what rate or range of inflation it thinks would fulfill that goal."

Americans Have A Negative Savings Rate. ABC World News (2/1, story 4, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was a revealing and some might say alarming report about what Americans are doing with their paychecks. They now have a negative savings rate. They spent 1% more last year than they earned. That represents the lowest personal savings rate since the great depression. Betsy Stark joins us now. It sounds frightening when you say Americans are spending more than they earn." The CBS Evening News (2/1, lead story, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) said, "There is no way around it, we Americans are addicted, addicted to spending. And we're spending more than we're earning."

Dow Soars To New Record. NBC Nightly News (2/1, story 6, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York today, another record close for blue chip stocks. The Dow gained just under 52 points [to close at 12,673.68] on this day to finish at a new record of 12, 673 at the close. NASDAQ was up more than 4 points [to close at 2,468.38] on the day." The Washington Post/AP (2/2, D5) notes the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "rose 7.70, or 0.54 percent, to 1445.94." The Wall Street Journal (2/2, C1, McKay, 2.04M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock numbers.

Manufacturing Activity Down In January. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A2, Conkey, 2.04M) reports, "Dogged by excess inventory, the nation's manufacturers cut back production in January, suggesting the sector will continue to weigh on economic growth a while longer." The Institute for Supply Management "said yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity fell to 49.3 last month from 51.4 in December. Figures below 50 indicate a contraction; for the past four months the index has averaged 50.5. The recent readings have pointed to a stagnating manufacturing sector that continues to be held back by weakness in the housing and automobile industries." The slowdown "follows a four-year growth spurt in the manufacturing sector." The Financial Times (2/2, Callan), taking a more negative view, says "the US manufacturing sector contracted unexpectedly this month as factory activity fell to its slowest pace in nearly three years, according to a fresh survey. … The poor performance underlined economists' fears that the sector could be sliding into recession."

GOP Fundraising Slow Since Election Defeat. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column this morning, "Fund raising for Bush's party slows after elections, complicating efforts to retire House Republicans' $14.4 million debt. Senate Republican committee -- criticized within the party for lackluster campaign -- has $1.3 million debt. Republican National Committee ends 2006 with $3.1 million cash, compared with Democrats' $3.7 million."

DOJ_NMG_0126349

Sharpton Grills Biden Over Remarks On Obama. The AP (2/2, Fouhy) reports, "Civil rights activist Al Sharpton on Thursday took Sen. Joe Biden to task for calling Democratic rival Sen. Barack Obama 'articulate' and 'clean,' questioning how the description reflects on other blacks." Biden "spent his first day as an official presidential candidate Wednesday explaining his statement that Obama is 'the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean.' Speaking "by telephone on Sharpton's radio show,'" Biden "told Sharpton he regretted the comments and said he hadn't meant to disparage other blacks who had run for president in the past, including Sharpton," and the Rev. Jesse Jackson. However, "Sharpton told Biden: 'A lot of people took it from you that because [Obama] is Harvard-trained, that people don't see someone as good and clean unless they are less connected to the struggle of the African-American community.' Sharpton also compared the gaffe to former Virginia Sen. George Allen's use of a racial slur against an Indian-American man last summer -- a controversy that was widely believed to have cost Allen re-election. 'George Allen got 'macaca' -- this might be a step past that,' Sharpton warned. Biden responded by lavishing praise on Sharpton, saying he and Jackson were the most articulate people in the country."

Of Remarks On Obama, Biden Says He "Was Complementing A Colleague." On MSNBC's Hardball (2/1, Matthews), host Chris Matthews asked Sen. Joe Biden about his remark that Sen. Barack Obama is "the first mainstream African-American who's articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy." Biden said, "I wasn't making a historical statement. I was trying to complement a colleague. I was complementing a colleague." Biden added, "There's not a single politician in either party who wouldn't like to be positioned where he is at this point. That was the point I was making when I said he's clean -- what I meant to say was fresh, that he was new, he's exciting."

Robinson Sees Racial Overtones In Use Of "Articulate" To Describe Obama, Other Blacks. In his column in the Washington Post (2/2, A15, 690K) Eugene Robinson weighs in on the controversy surrounding Biden's comments, writing, "For my part, I never made it past 'articulate,' a word that's like fingernails on a blackboard to my ear. As it happens, President Bush used that same word Wednesday to describe Obama. 'He's an attractive guy. He's articulate,' Bush told Fox News. Will wonders never cease? Here we have a man who graduated from Columbia University, who was president of the Harvard Law Review, who serves in the U.S. Senate and is the author of two best-selling books, who's a leading contender for the Democratic presidential nomination, and what do you know, he turns out to be articulate. Stop the presses." Robinson adds, "Articulate is really a shorthand way of describing a black person who isn't too black -- or, rather, who comports with white America's notion of how a black person should come across. Whatever the intention, expressing one's astonishment that such individuals exist is no compliment. Just come out and say it: Gee, he doesn't sound black at all."

On MSNBC's Hardball (2/1, Matthews), Eugene Robinson said he thought Sen. Biden meant "not articulate in being eloquent, but articulate -- what do white people mean when they call black people articulate? This is a -- this is a -- this is something I have always wanted to know. It seems to me that it means: Kind of like us. Talks kind of like us. Gives off the right kind of social cues of -- of being one of us. It's used for Barack Obama. It's used for Condi Rice. It's not used for Jesse Jackson. It's not used for Al Sharpton, even though they are both eloquent speakers."

Morris Criticizes Biden's Comments. On Fox's "The O'Reilly Factor" (2/1, O'Reilly), Dick Morris said, "Every political grave has to have a tombstone with an epitaph on it and this would be his. Actually his second epitaph. There was one in '88. I think that gaffes like this only are important if people believe that, despite the denials, it reveals a window into the politician's real thinking. … At a certain level, Biden was reflecting the establishment opinion of white politicians on Capitol Hill, which I do not share, which is to disparage the African-American members, to say that there's a lot of corruption, that there's a lot of cronyism, and to -- to say that they really -- there really hasn't been a clean, articulate, bright black to emerge on the national stage. I think it's wrong."

Obama's Multicultural Background A Sticking Point For Some African-Americans. The New York Times (2/2, Swarns, 1.16M) reports, "He is hailed by his supporters as the hope of an increasingly multicultural nation, a political phenomenon who can wow white voters while carrying the aspirations of African-Americans all the way to the White House. So why are some black voters so uneasy about Senator Barack Obama? The black author and essayist Debra J. Dickerson recently declared that 'Obama isn't black' in an American racial context. Some polls suggest that Mr. Obama trails" New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "in the battle for African-American support." Obama "is the American-born son of a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas." And "many pollsters and analysts believe Mr. Obama's life story of growing up in Hawaii and Indonesia with his mother and his maternal grandparents and of his struggle to define his own racial identity will resonate with voters across ethnic and color lines." But "Obama's melting pot background…remains profoundly unsettling for some blacks who argue that he is distant from the struggles and cultural identities of most black Americans. The black columnist Stanley Crouch has said, 'When black Americans refer to Obama as 'one of us,' I do not know what they are talking about." And Dickerson said, "His father was African. His mother was a white woman. He grew up with white grandparents. … He married black. He acts black. But there's a lot of distance between black Africans and African-Americans."

DOJ_NMG_0126350

Clinton Asking Top Donors To Raise At Least $1 Million. The New York Times (2/2, Healy, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports that New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "is establishing record-setting goals for presidential campaign fund-raising, her advisers say, asking donors to raise at least $1 million for the honor of being in her top echelon of supporters. That million-dollar benchmark is 10 times the amount that President Bush's 'Pioneers' were expected to raise in his 2000 race; at that time, the Pioneers' $100,000 goal was considered sizable. Clinton advisers said the new fund-raising levels, laid out in meetings of finance team members this week, would help achieve their goal of raising $75 million in 2007. At least $15 million is expected from New York, Mrs. Clinton's home base, the advisers said." the Times notes, "Several Clinton fund-raisers said in interviews that they expected dozens of donors to reach the tier of $500,000 -- in part because of the star power at their disposal. The campaign has lined up surrogates for Mrs. Clinton at Democratic fund-raisers around the country; among them are former President Bill Clinton and a senior campaign adviser, Ann Lewis. 'It will be almost impossible for any other candidate to raise the money that the Clintons can raise,' said John Catsimatidis, a New York fund-raiser for Mrs. Clinton."

Morris Says Clinton Would Raise Taxes, Reintroduce Healthcare Plan. On Fox's "The Big Story Will John Gibson" (2/1, Gibson), Dick Morris said, "I think that" Rudy Giuliani "is the only Republican candidate that could really defeat" Hillary Clinton. Morris continued, "The first three things that I think Hillary will do as president are raise taxes, and by that I mean repeal the income tax cuts and the Bush package, certainly for the top and maybe for the middle bracket. It's going to go back up to 39 or 40 percent that her husband put it at. I think she repeals the capital gains tax cut. I think that she cancels the attempts to take down the estate tax. And she will have a Democratic majority with her that will make it possible for her to pass it. Secondly, I think she changes welfare reform so she makes things like job training and going to school and answering a matchbook ad for a truck driver school acceptable alternatives to employment to get welfare benefits, ruining the program. And thirdly, I think she reintroduces her health care plan that she has never repudiated. But this time it passes because the Fortune 500 companies will get behind it because they want to get rid of the health care burden."

Simon Says Edwards Emphasizing Sacrifice To Demonstrate Authenticity. On MSNBC's "Tucker" (2/1), Roger Simon of The Politico said, "John Edwards is stressing sacrifice as his way of showing he is authentic. He's not doing the political expedient thing. He's not promising not to raise taxes. He is promising, in fact, that gasoline is going to cost more under his presidency, we're going to have to pay more for universal healthcare under his presidency, and that Americans are going to have to sacrifice to eradicate poverty in America in our lifetimes. That's all very tough stuff. And people, when you interview them in crowds after a speech, they all say, I want to be asked to sacrifice for my country. And they always mention John F. Kennedy. And I think he is going for that constituency."

McCain, Giuliani No-Shows At Some Conservative Events. The Politico (2/2, Martin) reports, "A speech given by former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney before a National Review-sponsored conference last week may have been panned as unfocused, but in the eyes of those who attended, he at least had one thing going for him: He showed up. Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, both of whom face serious skepticism from many conservatives, skipped the National Review event, and neither plans to attend a gathering of the Republican Study Committee, a group of conservative House members, this weekend in Baltimore." Meanwhile, "Romney, who is aggressively seeking the favor of conservative leaders, is on the schedule to address the RSC on Friday. In March, he is scheduled to speak at the Club for Growth's winter conference in Florida and to appear before the annual Conservative Political Action Conference in Washington. David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union and one of the chief organizers of CPAC, said his group hadn't heard back yet from either McCain or Giuliani about whether they'll be at the three-day meeting, which starts March 1. 'I frankly don't get it,' Keene shrugged in an interview Wednesday. 'On the one hand,' he said, McCain has been 'trying to court the right, but on the other, he seems to be dissing them.'"

DOJ_NMG_0126351

Giuliani Tops McCain In Fox News Poll. Fox News' Special Report (2/1, Hume) reported that in the 2008 presidential campaign, the latest Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll shows that "among Republicans, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani holds a commanding lead, with 34 percent, followed by Senator John McCain at 22, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich with 15. Among Democrats, Hillary Rodham Clinton draws 43 percent. Senator Barack Obama trails her with only 15 percent. And former Senator John Edwards gets support from 12 percent of those whom we asked. The rest, you can see, well back."

Pawlenty Praises McCain. The Politico (2/2, patch) reports that Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty (R) "said Thursday that his fellow partisans must regroup after a bruising 2006 election cycle and decide between ideological purity and electability in the 2008 contest -- a not-so-veiled plea for conservatives to take a fresh look at Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz. 'The marketplace just told Republicans something,'" Pawlenty said, adding, "It told them that we are choosing for now to select the products and services of your opponent.'" Speaking "with reporters at the Washington offices of lobbying firm Clark & Weinstock, Pawlenty," who is serving as Minnesota co-chair of McCain's presidential exploratory panel, "took pains to avoid negative comments about fellow Republicans and focus the conversations on what he views as McCain's pluses. 'I believe he's in a league of his own,' he said. … Pawlenty acknowledged that there are concerns among conservatives about whether McCain's record is 'sufficiently conservative.' Pawlenty's comeback: 'If you hold any of these candidates to a purity litmus test, with the possible exception of [Kansas Sen.] Sam Brownback, we'll have nobody left,' Pawlenty said."

California Primary Change Could Prove Detrimental To McCain. The Washington Times (2/2, Hallow, 88K) reports, "Arizona Sen. John McCain's presidential aspirations stand to suffer a stunning setback if California Republicans carry out a plan to move part of their nomination process up from June to Feb. 5 next year. 'If the California Republican Party approves this idea, it may benefit candidates other than Senator John McCain,'" said Orange County state Assemblyman Chuck DeVore. The plan "backed by Mr. DeVore, an influential conservative activist, calls for the 1,600 members of the state Republican Central Committee to select at least 53 of their 165 delegates to the 2008 Republican National Convention at the California party's regularly scheduled February convention in Sacramento. An alternative plan being negotiated by Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Democrat-controlled state Assembly would move the 2008 presidential primary election up from its traditional June date -- where it has in recent years had no effect on the selection of the party's presidential nominee -- to Feb. 5." The Times notes that "many Republican leaders in the state -- who would vote in the February convention under Mr. DeVore's plan -- oppose Mr. McCain. 'The activists on the state central committee here have still not forgiven him for the McCain-Feingold assault on the First Amendment nor do they appear comfortable with his incoherent philosophical agenda,' Mr. DeVore said."

'08 Hopeful Hunter Targeting Social Conservatives. USA Today (2/2, Welch, 2.27M) reports that CA52 Rep. Duncan Hunter (R) "sees his opening in the race for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination as the conservative's conservative." Hunter, "who chaired the House Armed Services Committee for the last four" years, "made his presidential candidacy official last month, basing it on three principles: •A hard line on illegal immigration. •Cracking down on countries, mainly China, that he says are killing American manufacturing with unfair trade policies. •Unwavering support for a strong military and for the war in Iraq, including President Bush's addition of more than 20,000 U.S. troops. 'Over the next five to 10 years, clearly national security is going to be a major focus for our country,' Hunter says after being asked why he is running. 'I've concentrated on that function of government for the last 26 years in the House of Representatives.' … 'He's very much a long shot,' says Jack Pitney, professor of government at Claremont McKenna College in California and former head of research for the Republican National Committee. 'He sees a niche for a social conservative with a strong defense background,' he says. 'He's putting a steel beam on the beach and hoping lightning will strike.'"

DOJ_NMG_0126352

Gore Nominated For Nobel Peace Prize. The Los Angeles Times/AP (2/2) reports former Vice President Al Gore "was nominated for the 2007 Nobel Peace Prize for his wide-reaching efforts to draw the world's attention to the dangers of global warming, a Norwegian lawmaker said Thursday." Conservative Member of Parliament Boerge Brende said, "A prerequisite for winning the Nobel Peace Prize is making a difference, and Al Gore has made a difference." Brende said "he joined political opponent Heidi Soerensen of the Socialist Left Party to nominate Gore as well as Canadian Inuit activist Sheila Watt-Cloutier before the nomination deadline expired Thursday."

Oil Price Stability Said To Be Key To Energy Security. In a New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) op-ed, Ronald E. Minsk, who was a special assistant for economic policy to President Bill Clinton, writes, "As Congress and President Bush face off over energy policy, we should reaffirm a few basic principles. A very important one is that our most critical goal in enhancing our energy security is to maintain a stable price for oil." Minsk adds, "In the short term, technology like plug-in hybrid cars could help with volatility, because it allows consumers to choose day to day whether to power their cars with oil or with the sources their utilities use. In the long term, however, if we cannot find a way to increase production and inoculate ourselves from oil-supply interruptions, we are either going to have to develop cars that need no oil, or learn to live with the risks of the global market." Minsk concludes, "There are many paths to take as we seek to improve our energy security, but all should be based on one principle: real security can come only through finding a way to keep prices stable."

Lindsey Criticizes Move To Ease Union Representation. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/2, A19), Lawrence B. Lindsey says, "Why is the new Congress in such a hurry to take away workers' right to vote? It seems extraordinary, but the so-called 'Employee Free Choice Act' is right there near the top of the Democrats' agenda. This legislation replaces government-sponsored secret ballot elections for union representation with a public card-signing system." But "sometimes the interests of workers and unions coincide, sometimes they do not. The chief complaint by the bill's sponsors is that unions only win secret-ballot elections half of the time. Apparently workers, after they think things over and when neither the union nor the company knows how they vote, often decide they are better-off without the union. The solution of the Employee Free Choice Act is to do away with such elections. It is hard to see how that 'empowers' workers. And it is hard not to conclude that this bill has little to do with employee choice or maximizing employee leverage, and everything to do with empowering union bosses and organizers."

Teaching Said To Be Among Better Paid Professions. Jay P. Greene and Marcus A. Winters of the Manhattan Institute write in the Wall Street Journal (2/2, A19, 2.04M) that public school teachers are "better paid" than architects, economists "and many other professionals" with an hourly wage of $34.06 which is "36% more than the hourly wage of the average white-collar worker and 11% more than the average professional specialty or technical worker." Increased pay for teachers accounts "for the bulk of public school spending increases over the last four decades." Yet "higher teacher pay seems to have no effect on raising student achievement." Instead, "the way we pay teachers is more important" because "providing bonuses to teachers who improve the performance of their students does raise academic proficiency."

NYTimes Calls For Bipartisan Trade Consensus. The New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The newest Democratic members of Congress have arrived in Washington with an important message from the voters: American workers are feeling economically insecure, and globalization and trade are heightening their fears. The White House and the new Congress still have a chance to create a bipartisan consensus on trade. They should seize it, for the good of the American economy, and for the good of the world's poorest nations, which need freer trade to pull themselves out of poverty." Now that the Democrats "control Congress, they can champion both free trade and the rights of American workers. They should push to improve the social safety net, especially access to health insurance. And they should promote increased retraining and wage assistance for displaced workers."

DOJ_NMG_0126353

WSJournal Urges Utah To Adopt School Voucher Plan. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A18, 2.04M) writes in an editorial, "Another brick could soon fall from the Berlin Wall that surrounds America's failing public schools, as Utah's legislature considers what would be the first universally available statewide voucher program in America. The voucher bill passed out of committee earlier this week and is backed by Governor Jon Huntsman." The program "would offer students who attend private K-12 schools from $500 to $3,000 in tuition reimbursement based on family income." And "the biggest winners under the plan would be the state's growing Hispanic population, who haven't done well in general in Utah public schools." The projected "$9 million cost of the program is about 0.5% of total school spending." So "let's hope Utah lawmakers stare down the opposition and give this statewide experiment a try."

Rice To Seek Support For Renewed Mideast Peace Push. The Washington Post (2/2, A11, Kessler, 690K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will launch "a new effort to forge a Palestinian state by seeking an endorsement today from a rare Washington meeting" of the Quartet, which "has played a largely backstage role in the long-stalled peace process." However, Germany, which currently holds the rotating presidency of the EU, "has pressed to revive the role of the international group -- and US officials decided that an endorsement would help bolster Rice's planned return to the region this month" to host a meeting between Israeli and Palestinian leaders. European officials say that Rice's decision to hold the meeting in Washington "signals the administration's determination to make progress with just two years left in President Bush's term." Behind the scenes, the Post says there are "tensions in the Quartet group over the administration's determination to maintain an economic embargo on the Palestinian government led by Hamas." The Russians, in particular, "have pressed for an end to the embargo," while the Europeans last year "won approval for a temporary -- now largely permanent -- aid program that directly benefits the Palestinian people, bypassing Hamas institutions." The aid ban, however, "has allowed Iran to gain a greater role in Palestinian affairs as it provides huge amounts of smuggled cash to Hamas," the Post writes.

Ban Wants Progress "On The Ground," Not Just Statements From Meeting. AFP (2/2) reports UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon wants the international Quartet for Middle East peace meeting Friday "to strive for progress on the ground rather than merely making statements," his spokeswoman said. Spokeswoman Michele Montas told reporters Thursday, Ban "hopes that the Quartet will seriously engage with the key issues that have a direct impact on the situation on the ground, going beyond mere statements," noting that he is "fully aware that within the region and beyond, many are looking at the Quartet to be more energetic in its efforts than it has been at times to break the current impasse in the peace process."

Palestinian Ceasefire Breaks Down Amid Growing Violence. The New York Times (2/2, A8, Myre, 1.16M) reports the "fragile truce" between Palestinian factions in Gaza "broke down" Thursday "when Hamas members fired on a convoy from the rival Fatah group, touching off an intense gun battle that killed six people and wounded at least 50." The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Ellingwood, 850K) reports Hamas believed the ambushed convoy was "carrying arms from Egypt destined for" Fatah, however, Egyptian officials in Gaza and a spokesman for the presidential guard of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas…denied the trucks were carrying arms."

Street Protests Pose Challenge To Lebanese Army. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A12, Simpson, 2.04M) reports, "For almost six months, Lebanese Army soldiers have helped control one of the world's most volatile flashpoints, patrolling near Lebanon's 49-mile border with Israel. Now, its troops are shouldering an even more urgent, and in many ways more difficult, task: standing between fellow citizens from rival groups on the same Beirut streets." This new job is "severely testing what may be the last Lebanese institution that still holds public confidence, and perhaps the only one keeping the deeply fractured society intact. Yet without a quick settlement to the political crisis," current and former army leaders warn, "street violence like last week's could spiral beyond the military's ability to contain it."

US Considers Re-Establishing Relations With Somalia. The Washington Times (2/2, Kralev, 88K) reports the State Department said Thursday it is "considering re-establishing a diplomatic presence in Somalia for the first time since US troops withdrew from the African country in 1994." However, officials cautioned that "even if the department determines that the political and security conditions on the ground have improved sufficiently, it will not reopen the US Embassy," but will "most likely set up a small presence post." The Times notes that during a trip to the region last month, Jendayi Frazer, assistant secretary of state for African affairs, pledged $40 million in financial assistance and said the United States was trying to "mobilize international support to help build the governance capacity" of the transitional authorities and to "move forward with the deployment of an African stabilization force."

DOJ_NMG_0126354

Sectarian Violence Rising In Pakistan. The Christian Science Monitor (2/2, Montero, 59K) reports a recent rash of attacks in Pakistan against its Shiite minority "has heightened concerns that Iraq's conflict may be feeding sectarian violence here. Whether the conflict in Iraq is capable of igniting Pakistan's simmering sectarian tensions raises questions about a growing global sectarian war." The answer is important, analysts say, "because Pakistan's 30 million Shiites -- numbering more than Iraq's -- could become a flash point if sectarian violence spreads. … Many disagree, however, saying that what happens in Iraq will hardly convulse the community in Pakistan, more concerned as it is with its own troubles."

US Expresses Hopes For Progress On Deal With Pyongyang. The AP (2/2) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Thursday "he hopes six nations meeting in China next week will be able to take the first concrete steps toward eventual dismantling of the communist nation's nuclear weapons." His comments "could mean that North Korea might begin the process of denuclearization while receiving economic benefits from other countries participating in the talks," which would be "a significant breakthrough for a bargaining process that has achieved little since it began in August 2003."

Pyongyang Looks To Giant Rabbits To Curb Famine. The Washington Post (2/2, A10, Whitlock, 690K) reports that officials in Pyongyang have approached a German rabbit breeder known for producing some of the words largest animals as "a possible solution to their nation's endemic food shortage." But "how, exactly, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea intends to parlay the small herd of German Flopsies into hunger relief for its 23 million citizens is unclear." An official at the North Korean Embassy in Berlin "confirmed that the Asian nation coveted the German bunnies for their gigantism. But he refused to answer any other questions about the breeding program."

Debate Over Gibraltar Delays Ban On Luxury Goods To North Korea. The Financial Times (2/2, Parker, Mulligan) reports Kim Jong-il "may be dispensing Hennessy cognac and Cartier watches to his cronies for a little while longer, thanks to a 300-year-old territorial dispute between the UK and Spain. The precise status of Gibraltar, a hunk of British-owned rock at the mouth of the Mediterranean, has caused a new row between London and Madrid that is delaying a European Union ban on luxury goods sales to Pyongyang."

US Suspends Space Ventures With China. On its front page, the Washington Times (2/2, A1, Gertz, 88K) reports the Bush administration has "suspended plans to develop space ventures with China, including joint exploration of the moon, in reaction to Beijing's Jan. 11 test of an anti-satellite weapon that left orbiting debris threatening US and foreign satellites." NASA spokesman Jason Sharp "said the weapon test undermined an agreement" reached between President Bush and Chinese President Hu Jintao during an April summit," and that "China's development and testing of such weapons is inconsistent with the constructive relationship that our presidents have outlined, including on civil space cooperation." Bush administration officials said the suspension is "meant to signal US displeasure" with the test, "as well as Beijing's failure to provide an explanation for its space arms program."

Kyl Says US "Seems To Lack The Will To Implement" Space Defense. The Washington Times (2/2, Gertz, Scarborough, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, that "the fallout from China's Jan. 11 anti-satellite (ASAT) weapons test that killed a Chinese weather satellite using a kinetic missile warhead" bring to light the issue of whether the US has the "will to implement" space defense of US satellites, according to Senator Jon Kyl, a Arizona Republican and veteran of the Senate intelligence committee.

UN Hopes China's HU Will Push For Resolution On Darfur During Visit. The AP (2/2, De Montesquiou) reports he United Nations hopes Chinese President Hu Jintao "will push for a solution to the Darfur crisis during his landmark visit to Sudan on Friday. But Khartoum expects its staunchest diplomatic ally to stick to boosting commercial ties, particularly those assuring its access to Sudan's oil." In what is seen as "an unusual foray into the field of human rights," Chinese officials have "called on Sudan to cooperate with the United Nations in finding a solution in Darfur."

DOJ_NMG_0126355

Under the headline "Pressure On China As President Heads To Sudan," AFP (2/2, Saeed) says "international pressure" is on China, because "no other country has more clout on the Khartoum government than China, which absorbs 60 percent of Sudan's total oil output and has repeatedly used its UN Security Council veto power to block further sanctions on the regime."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/2, Baldauf, 59K), meanwhile, reports from Khartoum that if Hu "announces more investment and development projects, as promised at Beijing's summit of 43 African heads of state this past November, then China will cement its position as the continent's new business partner of choice. If he buckles to pressure from Western governments, and makes future aid dependent on Sudan's actions to halt the brutal civil war in Darfur, then African leaders will see that even China's aid comes with strings attached. Whatever happens, Hu's visit to Sudan will be historic."

Some In Africa Resent China's Growing Influence. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A1, Trofimov, 2.04M) reports from Chambishi, Zambia that "Hu Jintao embarked on an upbeat tour of Africa this week, doling out aid and lauding China's growing economic and political ties with the continent." But "there is little love for China in this ramshackle township, which had to be dropped from the agenda of President Hu's weekend visit to Zambia because of likely unrest." Chambishi "was supposed to be a showcase of Sino-African friendship. China's state metals conglomerate, China Non-Ferrous Metal Mining (Group) Co., bought the mothballed copper mine here in 1998, bringing plenty of jobs and investments. Initial gratitude, however, quickly turned into seething discontent, as the new Chinese owners banned union activity and cut corners on safety. … Similar feelings of resentment about China's unfolding scramble for influence in Africa are beginning to bubble up across the continent."

China's New Rules On Foreign Investment Spark Concern. The Washington Post (2/2, D1, Cha, 690K) reports, "Since the mid-1990s, China has aggressively courted foreign investment," but "in recent months, however, the Chinese government, saying it needs to protect homegrown companies from unfair competition, has thrown a multitude of new regulations at foreign firms seeking to do business in China." While some believe the new restrictions "may be only temporary measures to control growth, others worry that there's a larger political issue: that economic nationalism or even protectionism is rising." As a result, "several US firms, which complain that the new rules are too restrictive and overly complex, to reassess their plans in China."

Russian TV Aids Putin In Anointing Successor. On its front page, the Washington Post (2/2, A1, Finn, 690K) reports, "[T]wo favorites of President Vladimir Putin play prominent supporting roles on a television game show called 'Happy Bus.' ... Dmitri Medvedev and Sergei Ivanov hand out awards and urge young people in general to live healthy lives. Ostensibly, the two men have perfectly straightforward reasons for appearing on the show: Each week, one team of contestants is sponsored by Gazprom, the state-controlled energy giant chaired by Medvedev." The "opposing team is sponsored by the New Generation Foundation, headed by Ivanov, who is also defense minister." But the program "is widely viewed here as proof of the Kremlin's ability to commandeer the airwaves...to aid Putin in anointing a successor. By most accounts, the president has narrowed his choice to Medvedev or Ivanov, and over the last year each man's image, particularly Medvedev's, has been rigorously burnished." The Post adds, "Whoever turns out to be Putin's nominee will dominate television and almost certainly ride unimpeded through the presidential elections in early 2008, analysts said."

Putin Defends Energy Policies Toward Neighbors. The Financial Times (2/2, Buckley) reports, "Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, on Thursday hit back at accusations that the country was using energy as a weapon, saying critics were deliberately distorting its policy of moving to market prices for oil and gas supplies to former Soviet neighbours." Putin said, "We must not subsidise the economies of other countries in large amounts, comparable with their budgets. No one else does that. Why do they demand that we should do it?" He "added that new pricing and tariff arrangements agreed with transit countries such as Belarus and Ukraine were aimed 'precisely at ensuring the interests of key consumers' in western Europe, despite temporary disruptions to supplies last month and in January 2006."

Police Interview Blair About Cash-For-Honors Scandal. The New York Times (2/2, Cowell,

DOJ_NMG_0126356

1.16M) reports, "After a news blackout lasting six days, the British police acknowledged Thursday that officers interviewed Prime Minister Tony Blair a second time last Friday over allegations that high honors had been traded for campaign contributions." Blair "is said by British political analysts to be the first prime minister to be interviewed by the police while still in office." The Times adds, "The prime minister's office said in a statement on Thursday that Mr. Blair had been 'briefly interviewed by the police as a witness."

The Washington Post (2/2, A12, Sullivan, 690K) reports, "Police interviewed Blair for about 45 minutes last Friday but asked Blair's office 'for operational reasons' to keep the meeting secret until Thursday, police and Blair's office said in statements. Police said Blair was 'interviewed as a witness, not as a suspect and cooperated fully' in an inquiry in which the prime minister's top fundraiser and a top adviser have been arrested on suspicion of hampering the investigation into the widening scandal." The Post adds, "Blair…announced last year that he will step down before his party's annual conference in September. But as the scandal widens, political opponents are increasingly calling for Blair to resign sooner."

Gutierrez Says US Willing To Help Cuba Transition. The AP (2/2, Carl) reports Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez Thursday said Washington "is willing to help Cuba make the transition to a more open, democratic society." Speaking to reporters during a one-day visit to Mexico, Gutierrez said the US supports a "peaceful transition to democracy." Gutierrez said the United States "does not plan to meddle in Cuban politics, but wants to see the country make the transition to democracy." Gutierrez did not elaborate, "but last September he suggested that Cubans could work with the Organization of American States and other groups to hold a referendum on whether they want to live in democracy."

European Commission Critical Of US Farm Proposals. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Von Reppert-Bismarck, 2.04M) reports, "The European Commission expressed disappointment at a US plan to overhaul subsidies to its farmers, saying 'more ambitious cuts' are required to relaunch a stalled round of global trade talks. The White House's proposal to Congress on how to overhaul the US Farm Bill will make 'extremely modest' cuts to loan-deficiency payments and keep payments to dairy and sugar farmers 'virtually untouched,' said EU farm spokesman Michael Mann." Mann added, "The U.S. will need to propose more ambitious cuts and disciplines. … We had hoped the administration's proposal for the new farm bill would signal this more clearly."

The Wall Street Journal (2/2, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column this morning that the Administration "faces skeptics at home and abroad about farm-subsidy cuts." In addition to EC criticism, the Journal says "the White House plan squeezes 2008 Republican presidential candidates seeking Iowa support."

WPost Urges Bush Not To "Go Wobbly" On Kosovo. The Washington Post (2/2, A14, 690K) editorializes, "Today UN envoy Martti Ahtisaari is due to travel to the Balkans to kick off what should be the final resolution of Serbia's conflict with the province of Kosovo. … All along it's been obvious what the permanent solution must be: the recognition of Kosovo as an independent nation, with protections for its Serb minority. The question has been whether that outcome can be arranged without a diplomatic or even military blowup -- between Kosovo and a Serbia still infected by belligerent nationalism, or between the West and an increasingly troublesome Russia." The Bush Administration "is cautiously optimistic that the transition can be pulled off in the next several months. But it will take some deft Western diplomacy and, in the end, probably some American toughness." US "firmness might be needed. The Bush administration has avoided responding to multiple Russian provocations in recent months, the most recent being Moscow's sale of antiaircraft missiles to Iran." If Russian President Vladimir Putin "decides to make trouble over Kosovo, the United States will either have to push back or abandon allies it has supported against aggression: the Kosovo Albanians, or Georgia's liberal democratic government. The administration ought to make clear now that it will not go wobbly."

NYTimes Urges Ulster's Paisley To Support Peace Process. The New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) editorializes, "Northern Ireland has lost thousands of lives, billions of dollars in economic opportunity and decades of democratic self-rule to what its people euphemistically call 'the troubles.' One man now has it in his power to help this British-ruled province finally put this lamentable era behind it and move on to a brighter future -- or to stand in the way. That man is the Rev. Ian Paisley, the fiery Protestant preacher, now 80 years old, who leads the province's largest party, the Democratic Unionists. Mr. Paisley, though, has yet to rise to the moment and acknowledge that the times have changed and his former foes have changed with them. … This is Mr. Paisley's last chance to leave a constructive, forward-looking legacy. If he continues to live in the past, the promise of self-rule will be postponed indefinitely. And one man will be to blame."

DOJ_NMG_0126357

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"U.N. Says There's No Stopping Global Warming."
"Milena's Mentor Stays On The Case."
"Costly L.A. River Plan Contains A Raft Of New Ideas."
"Marines Battle Their Past In An Iraqi city."
"Senators Castigate General On Iraq strategy."

USA Today:

"Sites Of Risky Levees Listed."
"Drastic Plans Unveiled To Fight Pandemic."
"Milestone Resonates Beyond NFL."

New York Times:

"Florida Shifting To Voting System With Paper Trail."
"An Afghan's Path From Ally Of US. To drug Suspect."
"General Parries Senate Attacks On Iraq Record."
"So Far, Obama Can't Take Black Vote For Granted."
"Democracy Rules, And Pop Culture Depends On It."
"Dark Days Follow Hard-Hitting Career In N.F.L."
"Late for Court: Connecticut Case Draws Scrutiny."

Washington Post:

"Border Policy's Success Strains Resources."
"Iraq at Risk Of Further Strife, Intelligence Report Warns."
"Va. Transportation Deal Withers In Senate Panel."
"Two Men Acquitted Of Conspiracy To Fund Hamas Activities in Israel."
"Russian TV Shines Warmly On A Likely Successor To Putin."
"Fleeing One Bomb, Iraqi Shoppers Die In Blast Of Another."

Washington Times:

"New RNC Chief Backs Bill With Guest-Worker Plan."
"Casey Refutes Iraq Pessimism."
"U.S. Halts China Space Ventures."
"Katrina Vehicles Flood This Area."
"Abducted Boy, Mom Reunited."

Detroit Free Press:

"Governor To Push Free Tuition."
"Michiganders Doubt President."
"Historic Low: Ford 4th With U.S. Buyers."
"'The Room Was So Full Of…Forgiveness' For Abraham."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Medicare Cuts Reach Deep Into Hospitals."
"Nation Bemused As Network Appeases Boston Over Stunt."
"Apology Asked For Sterilizations State Required."
"Jury Told To Keep At It In Clinton Secret Case."
"Bill Will Allow Consumers To Order Wine Shipped Directly From Maker."

Houston Chronicle:

"Minimum-Wage Hikes Clears One Hurdle, Faces Another."
"Report: Global Warning To Last For Centuries."
"Casey Says Demand For Troops Excessive."
"Democrats Rip State Agency For Hiring D.C. Lobbyist."
"Giuliani Mines For Texas Gold."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Senate Resolution-Iraq; Senate Resolution-Analysis; Gen. Casey-Senate Hearings; Americans Saving Less; Economic News; Army Corps Report The Levees; Terror Scare Boston-Aftermath; Italian Spat; Schools In Cambodia.
CBS: Negative Savings Rate; Senate-Minimum Wage; Exxon Profits; Iraq Violence; Casey-Surge; Iraq-Security Crackdown; Syria-Anti-US Propaganda; Climate Change Report; Southeast-Winter Weather; Katrina Victims-Depression; UK Terror Suspects; Boston Terror Scare; Democrats-Work Week; Super Bowl Ads.
NBC: Gen. Casey-Hearings; Senate Resolution-Iraq Surge; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Terror Scare Boston-Aftermath; Minimum Wage Increase; Stock Market; Exxon Profits; Binge Eating; Winter Weather-Colorado Cattle; Richard Kelly Obit; National Prayer Breakfast; Italian Spat.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: UN Global Warming Report; Super Bowl-Security Preparations; Senate-Minimum Wage; Savings Rates For Americans Down; PA-Strike At Harley-Davidson Plant.
CBS: UN Global Warming Report; Army Corps Of Engineers-Levees; Report Of US Chopper Going Down North Of Baghdad; Senate-Iraq Resolution; Senate-Minimum Wage Bill; Presidential Candidates To Attend Democratic National

DOJ_NMG_0126358

Committee Meeting; Exxon Oil-Record Profits; Ford Sales Down, Toyota Sales Up.

NPR: Tony Snow-Iraq Surge Plan; Casey-Confirmation Hearing; Mississippi River-Barge Accident; EU Calling For Worldwide Moratorium On Death Penalty; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Philippines-Truck Explosion; World Intellectual Property Organization-Counterfeiting Costs; Groundhog Day Forecast.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Photo opportunity with the Carolina Hurricanes. East Room.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Participates in a roundtable discussion with cardiologists, survivors and partners. Bryant Park Hotel, New York; attends the Heart Truth 2007 Fashio Show. Bryant Park, New York.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: CONSUMER ASSEMBLY _ The Consumer Federation of America holds its Consumer Assembly Conference. Highlights: 10:15 a.m. FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras. 11:30 a.m. Michael Jacobson, Executive Director, Center for Science in the Public Interest. Location: Washington Plaza Hotel, 10 Thomas Circle.

PANDEMIC FLU _ Influenza experts hold a two-day meeting to assess the current level of US preparedness for a possible bird flu pandemic. Highlights: 8 a.m. Session on influenza planning, with CDC Director Julie Gerberding, others. 12:05 p.m. Luncheon speaker - Rajeev Venkayya speaks on national preparedness for pandemic influenza. Location: Marriott-Crystal Gateway, 1700 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington.

TAX SYMPOSIUM _ The Tax Council Policy Institute holds its Eighth Annual Tax Council Policy Institute Symposium, ``Understanding the Global Tax Arena: Risk & Regulation." Location: Ritz Carlton Hotel, 1150 22nd St. NW.

US-CHINA _ The US-China Economic and Security Review Commission holds a public hearing on ``The US-China Relationship: Economics and Security in Perspective." The hearing will examine US-China relations from multiple perspectives to assess this bilateral relationship since the granting of permanent normalized trade relations to China, and the challenges facing the relationship in 2007. It will consider the economic, security, and diplomatic impacts of Chinas accession to the World Trade Organization, and seek to identify trends in US-China relations and opportunities for greater bilateral cooperation and dialogue. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. - 12 p.m. The hearing continues with an examination of the US-China military and security relationship and the prospects for US-China political cooperation and diplomacy. The Commission will hear testimony from Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs Thomas Christensen, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Treasury for International Affairs, Asia, Robert Dohner, as well as scholars and policy experts. Location: Room 562, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

WORKING FAMILIES-SECURITY _ The National Academy of Social Insurance holds a conference on how policymakers can ease insecurity for working families and strengthen economic security for all Americans. Highlights: 10 a.m. Session on the 9/11 Victim Compensation Fund, with Kenneth Feinberg, Special Master. 1:15 p.m. Luncheon speaker - former CMS Administrator Mark McClellan. Location: National Press Club.

DEMOCRATIC MEETING _ Winter meeting of the Democratic National Committee. Highlights: 9 a.m. General Session, with General Session. Speakers in order of appearance: Senate Majority Leader Senator Harry Reid; DNC Chairman Howard Dean; Senator Christopher Dodd; Senator Barack Obama; General Wesley Clark; Senator John Edwards; Representative Dennis Kucinich; Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. 6:30 p.m. Executive Committee meeting with Governor Janet Napolitano of Arizona; Mayor Adrian Fenty of Washington, D.C; Mayor Shirley Franklin of Atlanta, Ga.; DNC Vice Chair & ASDC President Mark Brewer. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

PENTAGON-IRAQ BRIEFING _ 9 a.m. The Pentagon holds its regular briefing on Iraq. Location: DOD Studio, 2E781, Pentagon.

PRESTON-SMALL BUSINESS _ 9:30 a.m. SBA Administrator Preston discusses the Disaster Assistance Program and Reform Agenda along with economic growth and issues affecting Americas small businesses. Location: National Press Club.

PENTAGON ROUNDTABLE _ 9:55 a.m. Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates and Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff

DOJ_NMG_0126359

Gen. Peter Pace will conduct an on the record media roundtable. Location: DOD Briefing Room, Pentagon 2E579.

ECONOMIC BRIEFING _ 10 a.m. Treasury Assistant Secretary Phillip Swagel holds a briefing for economic media. Location: Room 4121, main Treasury.

SWAGEL-EMPLOYMENT _ 10 a.m. Treasury Department Assistant Secretary for Economic Policy Phillip Swagel hold an economic media briefing to discuss January 2007 employment numbers and the state of the US economy. Location: Treasury Department.

US-CLIMATE CHANGE _ 10 a.m. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) Administrator Stephen L. Johnson joins U.S. Secretary of Energy Samuel W. Bodman, and National Oceanic and National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) Administrator Vice Admiral Conrad Lautenbacher for a media availability to discuss the U.S. contribution to the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) Working Group 1 report and U.S. investments to advance climate science and clean energy technology research. Location: U.S. Department of Energy, 1000 Independence Ave. SW, Small Auditorium GJ-015.

HEALTH CARE _ 11:45 a.m. The Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association hold a briefing on BCBSA's 2007 federal legislative priorities and to give an overview of state legislative healthcare and insurance issues. Location: 12th floor, 1310 G St. NW.

AMERICA-FUTURE _ 12 p.m. Sen. Charles Schumer and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich discuss America's Future, sponsored by the National Press Club. Location: National Press Club.

CLIMATE CHANGE _ 12 p.m. The University Corporation for Atmospheric Research holds a telephone briefing on the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, with U.S. scientists who helped write the report (released today in Paris). Notes: Callin number: 877-804-1919; verbal passcode: NCAR.

HEALTH INSURANCE-DEDUCTIONS _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute holds a briefing to discuss the possibility of giving a standard income tax deducation for health insurance costs, with Council of Economic Advisers member Katherine Baicker, Leonard Burman of the Urban-Brookings Tax Policy Center, and Michael Cannon of the institute. Location: Room B-338, Rayburn.

MARINE CORPS _ 12 p.m. The US Marine Corps will hold a background briefing for reporters on the proposed increase in the end strength of the Marine Corps Location: Pentagon briefing studio, room 2E781.

IRAQ-EUROPE _ 12:15 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a discussion, ``Integration vs. Confrontation: Or Why Europe Likes the Iraq Study Group Report More than the White House," with Michael Backfisch of Handelsblatt and Steve Clemens of the foundation. Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

OBAMA _ 1 p.m. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., speaks at ``Yes We Can!," a rally organized by Students for Barack Obama, a national student group committed to supporting Obama. Location: Johnson Hall, George Mason University, Fairfax. Va.

GOVERNORS _ 2 p.m. The Center for American Progress holds a discussion with governors Janet Napolitano of Arizona and Kathleen Sebelius of Kansas. Location: 10th floor, 1333 H St. NW.

GUATEMALA _ 2 p.m. The Alliance to End Hunger and InterAction hold an information session about Guatemala's efforts to meet the First Millennium Development Goal, with Andris Botran, Secretary of Food Security and Nutrition for the Government of Guatemala, and chair of the Guatemalan Alliance Against Hunger. Location: Suite 500, 50 G St. NW.

IRAQ _ 2 p.m. The Wilson International Center for Scholars holds a discussion on new politics in Iraq with David Satterfield, the State Department's senior adviser and coordinator for Iraq. Location: 6th floor Flom Auditorium, Reagan Trade Center.

SAUDI ARABIA _ 2 p.m. Georgetown University holds a screening of the film ``Abdulaziz and a panel discussion on King Abdulaziz of the building of the modern Saudi Arabia, with Saudi Amb. Prince Turki Al-Faisal, others. Location: Bunn Intercultural Center Auditorium, on campus.

GOP LEADERSHIP _ 3:15 p.m. Members of the Senate Republican leadership will be available following the Senate Republican Conference Retreat to discuss the days activities and outline their legislative priorities for the 110th Congress. Participants: Senators Mitch McConnell, Trent Lott, Jon Kyl, John Cornyn, and Kay Bailey Hutchison. What: Media Availability with Senator Mitch McConnell, Senator Trent Lott, Senator Jon Kyl, Senator John Cornyn, and Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison. Location: Library of Congress, Thomas Jefferson Building, exhibit area between the Great Hall and Members Room.

IMMIGRANT RIGHTS _ 4 p.m. The DC Committee for Immigrants' Rights holds a news conference to discuss the

DOJ_NMG_0126360

Virginia General Assembly actions regarding illegal immigrants. Location: In front of ICE offices, 425 Eye St. NW.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

4th Circuit Panel Questions Administration's Detainee Policy..... 3
Federal Jury Acquits Two In Hamas Funding Trial..... 3
DOJ Officials Brief Senators On Arar Case..... 4
Chinese Official Issues Rebuke Of Bush's "Unilateral" War On Terror 5
Guantanamo Detainees Complain About Saddam Execution Poster..... 5
CIA Agents Sought By Germany Tracked Due To Stay In Resort Island..... 5
British Terror Suspects Brought To Court..... 5
European Bank Told To Stop Sharing Data With US Antiterror Investigators..... 5
LATimes Calls For End To Renditions..... 6

Homeland Response:

NID Nominee Says He Would Resist Attempts To Politicize Intelligence..... 6
Judge Explains Dismissal Of Anthrax Defamation Lawsuit..... 6
Changes To Armed-Pilot Program Intended To Boost Participation 6
Survey Finds Poorest Gulf Coast Residents Still Struggling To Recover From Katrina..... 6

War News:

Senate Debate To Pit McCain Versus Warner Resolutions..... 7
Casey Says Bush's "Surge" Calls For More Soldiers Than Needed To Pacify Baghdad..... 10
Suicide Attack Kills 45 At Baghdad Market..... 11
Administration Delays Release Of Evidence Backing Claims On Iran 12
Afghan Parliament Urges Amnesty For Citizens From Past Wars14
Pentagon Reorganizes Non-Fatal Casualty Statistics On Web Page..... 14

DOJ:

DOJ Concedes Prosecutorial Misconduct In MA Mob Slaying Case..... 14
Massachusetts Federal Prosecutor Heading To Main Justice 15

Corporate Scandals:

Senate Report Finds SEC Mishandled Pequot Probe..... 15
Investors Sue Dell Alleging Improper Accounting..... 16
DOJ Probes Siemens For Possible Bribery..... 16
AOL Case Heads To Jury After Three Months Of Trial..... 16
LATimes Criticizes Bid To Crack Down On CEO Pay..... 16

Criminal Law:

FBI Agent Testifies At Libby Trial, Casting Doubt On Libby's Veracity 17
Crackdown On Online Gambling Freezes Funds..... 18
Jury Convicts New York Drug Kingpin Of Rivals' Murder Plot..... 18
Judge Revokes Bail Of Former UN Official Charged With Bribery18
Coke Trial Jury Deadlocked, But Judge Says To Continue Deliberations 19
FBI, New Jersey AG Investigating Nonprofit's Land Deal 19
South Florida Genovese Capo Pleads Guilty To RICO Charges 19
Phoenix FBI Agents Arrest Priest Wanted For Assault In Nevada19
Indiana Man Pleads Guilty To Katrina Relief Fraud..... 19
Massachusetts Man Sentenced To Four Years In Prison For Defrauding Cisco 20
Judge Revokes Bail Of Alleged Pennsylvania Child Pornographer..... 20
Report Warns Of Increasing Deaths, Imprisonment Of Reporters20
Inmate Who Escaped With Official's Wife Is Sentenced 20
Mother Reunited With Abducted Boy..... 21
DC Transit Police Cracking Down On Metro Robberies..... 21
"Failure To Appear" Charges Face Opposition In Connecticut.... 21
Kaine Questions Expansion Of Death Penalty In Virginia 21

Civil Law:

FEC To Examine 527 Group Activities 22

Civil Rights:

DOJ Suit Claims Pennsylvania Apartments' No-Dog Policy Discriminates Against Blind 22
DOJ Settles Voting Rights Allegations With New Mexico County22
Mississippi Voting Rights Trial To Resume February 15..... 22
Alabama Appeals DOJ Ruling On County Commissioner's Appointment..... 23
Texas Deputy At Center Of Furor Over Convicted Border Agents23
DC Hairdresser Sued For Sexual Harassment..... 23
Florida To Abandon Touch-Screen Voting Machines..... 24
55% Say Military Should Let Gays, Lesbians Serve Openly..... 24

Antitrust:

US Subpoenas PackerKiss Securities In Bond Probe..... 24
Microsoft Plans To License Instructions In Bid To Pacify EU..... 24

United Airlines CEO Sees Mergers As Still Viable 24

Environment:

Report Expected To Heighten Pressure On Governments To Reduce Emissions 25
Judge Mulls Release Of Material From Rocky Flats Grand Jury 26
CDC Issues Guidelines For Battling Flu Pandemics 26
Army Corps Releases Locations Of 122 Substandard Levees ... 26

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Drug Kingpin Sentenced To 40 Years..... 27
"Operation Dawg Pound" Targets Bloods Gang In New Jersey.. 27
Federal Officials' Handling Of Afghan "Drug Lord" Case Scrutinized 28
St. Kitts Man Gets 11-Year Sentence In Cocaine-Smuggling Case..... 28
Georgia Man Faces Attempted Murder Charges Following Drug Investigation In New York 28
Former Maryland Teacher Gets 6-Year Sentence In Meth Case 28
ATF, FBI Probing Similar Bombs Found In Kansas City, Chicago28
13 In San Diego Charged With Weapons Violations In "Operation Colt .45." 29
Connecticut Gun Dealer Pleads Guilty To Federal Violation..... 29
ATF Gang Probe Leads To Drug Charges Against Two In Washington 29

Immigration:

Judge Rules Louisiana Law Banning Illegal Immigrants From Driving Unconstitutional 29
Texas Immigration Raid Nets 53 Arrests 30
Martinez Endorses Guest-Worker Measure 30

Tax:

Protective Order Granted In Nebraska Tax Case..... 30
Judge Rejects Tax Shelter Once Sold By KPMG..... 31

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Seek $70 Billion Savings From Medicare, Medicaid..... 31
Bush To Propose Large Boost In Pell Grants..... 31
Portman Defends Bush Budget Plans 32
"Emergency" Bill Expected To Include Unneeded Spending..... 32
Democrats Put Imprint On 2007 Spending Measure..... 32
OMB Deputy Director Suggests There Has Been Too Little Congressional Oversight 32
Bush Approval Edges Up To 38% In Fox News Poll..... 33
Bush Says Cheney Optimistic, Not Out Of Touch..... 33
Senate Passes Minimum Wage Hike With Business Tax Cuts... 33
Bush Says Healthful Diet Is Individual, Not Government Responsibility..... 34
Democrats Rescue Bush Global Health Package..... 34
Bush Administration To Give Vaccine Companies Immunity From Avian Flu Suits 34
FDA Reform Proposals Contain "Bitter Pills" For Pharmaceutical Companies..... 35
Congress Moves Quickly On Children's Health Insurance Program 35
Senate Democrats Urge Stricter FCC Rule Enforcement 35
Frank To Push For Data Privacy Laws..... 35
Two More Lawmakers Criticize Baca, But Don't Resign From Hispanic Caucus..... 35
NYTimes Calls For More Protection For Federal Judges..... 36

Other News:

Bush, Democrats Painting Dramatically Different Economic Pictures 36
GOP Fundraising Slow Since Election Defeat..... 37
Sharpton Grills Biden Over Remarks On Obama..... 37
Obama's Multicultural Background A Sticking Point For Some African-Americans 38
Clinton Asking Top Donors To Raise At Least $1 Million..... 38
Simon Says Edwards Emphasizing Sacrifice To Demonstrate Authenticity 38
McCain, Giuliani No-Shows At Some Conservative Events..... 38
'08 Hopeful Hunter Targeting Social Conservatives..... 39
Gore Nominated For Nobel Peace Prize 39
Oil Price Stability Said To Be Key To Energy Security..... 40
Lindsey Criticizes Move To Ease Union Representation..... 40
Teaching Said To Be Among Better Paid Professions..... 40
NYTimes Calls For Bipartisan Trade Consensus 40
WSJournal Urges Utah To Adopt School Voucher Plan 40
Rice To Seek Support For Renewed Mideast Peace Push..... 40
Street Protests Pose Challenge To Lebanese Army..... 41
US Considers Re-Establishing Relations With Somalia..... 41
Sectarian Violence Rising In Pakistan 41
US Expresses Hopes For Progress On Deal With Pyongyang... 41
US Suspends Space Ventures With China 42
UN Hopes China's HU Will Push For Resolution On Darfur During Visit..... 42
China's New Rules On Foreign Investment Spark Concern 42
Russian TV Aids Putin In Anointing Successor 43
Police Interview Blair About Cash-For-Honors Scandal..... 43
Gutierrez Says US Willing To Help Cuba Transition 43
European Commission Critical Of US Farm Proposals..... 43
WPost Urges Bush Not To "Go Wobbly" On Kosovo 43
NYTimes Urges Ulster's Paisley To Support Peace Process 44

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 44

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 45

DOJ_NMG_0126363

TERRORISM NEWS:

4th Circuit Panel Questions Administration's Detainee Policy. The New York Times (2/2, Liptak) reports, "In a series of probing and sometimes testy exchanges with a government lawyer, two of three judges on a federal appeals court panel here indicated Thursday that they might not be prepared to accept the Bush administration's claim that it has the unilateral power to detain people it calls enemy combatants." The Times continues, "The case was brought by Ali al-Marri, a citizen of Qatar who is the only person on the American mainland being held as an enemy combatant, at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C. Mr. Marri, a legal resident whom the government calls a sleeper agent for Al Qaeda, was arrested in Peoria, Ill., on Dec. 12, 2001, where he was living with his family and studying computer science at Bradley University. … 'What would prevent you from plucking up anyone and saying, "You are an enemy combatant?"' Judge Roger L. Gregory of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit asked the administration's lawyer, David B. Salmons. … Mr. Salmons said the executive branch was entitled to make that judgment in wartime without interference from the courts. 'A citizen, no less than an alien, can be an enemy combatant,' he added." The Times adds, "Mr. Marri's appeal had been expected mostly to concern the impact of a new law, the Military Commissions Act, which says the courts have no jurisdiction to hear challenges from any noncitizen 'who has been determined by the United States to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant.' … But questions from Judge Gregory and Judge Diana Gribbon Motz suggested that the court might be willing to reach the more fundamental question of when and how such enemy-combatant determinations should be made."

The Washington Post (2/2, A6, Horwitz) reports, "Attorneys for Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, held for 3 1/2 years in the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., have contested the president's authority to indefinitely detain a lawful resident of the United States without charges. … If the government is right, said lawyer Jonathan Hafetz, 'they can pick up any immigrant in this country, lock them in a military jail and hold the keys to the courthouse. If this case stands, the United States could effectively disappear people.'" The Post reports that "administration lawyers contended that the Marri case is unique and does not represent a threat to immigrants with no ties to terrorist organizations." The Post adds, "Judge Diana Gribbon Motz questioned under what circumstances the president can order someone on U.S. soil to be detained as an enemy combatant. Under the traditional laws of war, she said, combatants are captured on a battlefield and connected to a nation or state at war with the United States. … Motz said that she is concerned about giving the government broad authority 'to pluck up anyone from the streets of the United States' and added: 'We don't want other nations to do that to our people.' … But Judge Roger L. Gregory suggested that Congress knew it was dealing with an 'amorphous enemy' when it passed the Military Commissions Act last year, creating a tribunal system for accused combatants such as Marri to challenge their status."

The Financial Times (2/2, Sevastopulo, Virginia) reports, "Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a Qatari citizen studying computer science in the US, was arrested in Illinois in late 2001 in connection with the investigation into the September 11 attacks. He was slated for a criminal trial in 2003 on charges including credit card fraud. … Just weeks before the trial, however, President George W. Bush classified Mr Marri as an unlawful 'enemy combatant' in the 'war on terror'. He was removed from the criminal justice system and transferred to a prison in South Carolina, where he has remained without direct access to his family. The administration has designated hundreds of detainees at Guantánamo Bay as 'enemy combatants'. … But lawyers for Mr Marri argued in a federal appeals court in Virginia on Thursday that Mr Bush did not have the authority to declare legal US residents as enemy combatants. 'The president cannot militarise the case of a man in Peoria [Illinois] with the stroke of a pen,' said Jonathan Hafetz, a New York University lawyer representing Mr Marri." The Times notes, "Critics say Congress intended the president to have the authority to classify only prisoners captured on the battlefield, not legal US residents or US citizens, as enemy combatants. … In court on Thursday, the Justice Department argued the battlefield in the 'war on terror' included the US. That view seemed to receive support from one judge on the three-member panel but another appeared to question the administration's argument, saying while Congress could have given Mr Bush the ability to declare legal residents and citizens as 'enemy combatants', it was unclear it had done so."

Federal Jury Acquits Two In Hamas Funding Trial. The Washington Post (2/2, A1, Eggen) reports, "A federal jury in Chicago acquitted two men yesterday of charges that they were part of a long-running conspiracy to finance Hamas activities in Israel -- marking the latest defeat for the Justice Department in cases involving support for radical Palestinian groups." The Post continues, "Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former Howard University professor who lives in Springfield, and Muhammad Salah, 53, a former grocer from suburban Chicago, were found not guilty of racketeering conspiracy. The charge was the most serious allegation against them and could have drawn life sentences for each. … But the two men were found guilty of lesser charges: Ashqar was convicted of obstruction of justice and criminal contempt for refusing to testify in front of a grand jury, while Salah was convicted of obstruction for providing false answers in a civil lawsuit." The Post adds, "The case provides the latest example of the serious difficulties faced by the Justice Department in its attempts to prosecute supporters of radical Palestinian organizations. In the Chicago case, prosecutors faced the additional challenge of trying to punish activities that occurred before Hamas was declared a terrorist organization by the U.S. government in 1995."

DOJ_NMG_0126364

The Chicago Tribune (2/2, Bush, Coen) reports, "Salah and Ashqar, a business professor living outside Washington, D.C., were found not guilty of the racketeering charges that could have resulted in life prison terms. The men were convicted of lesser charges including obstruction of justice, and their lawyers promised to fight to keep them out of prison altogether when they are sentenced in June." The Tribune continues, "The case was among the first to level allegations that America was being used as a fundraising base for a government-designated terrorist organization, but it was built largely on evidence that was more than a decade old. Some of that evidence was gathered in Israel—including what the defense contended was Salah's coerced confession—and involved conduct that occurred in the early 1990s, before the U.S. had given Hamas the terror designation. … Former U.S. Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft had announced the charges against Salah and Ashqar in a 2004 news conference in Chicago that heralded a significant shift in the Justice Department's approach to allegations about domestic support for foreign militant groups. … But Salah's lawyers said their win shows the government was overreaching. … 'It's a huge victory—what's left is a relatively minor charge,' said Salah's lawyer, Michael Deutsch. 'I think the jury rejected this idea that you can criminalize this kind of organizing activity under RICO [Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act] in the U.S.,' he said. 'It's a stretch.'" The Tribune notes, "Leaders of the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI in Chicago disagreed, and said the outcome of the Salah trial would do nothing to dissuade them from using the same tools again to fight terrorist organizations with branches or operatives here. … 'This case is not going to prevent us from aggressively pursuing terrorism and terrorism financing cases,' said Gary Shapiro, first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago"

The New York Times (2/2, Sander) reports that "after a three-month trial and 14 days of deliberations, a jury of seven women and five men rejected the core of the government's case and acquitted Mr. Salah and Dr. Ashqar of the most serious charge brought under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, that the two men used United States bank accounts to funnel money to Hamas's military leaders and were therefore responsible for the group's violent tactics against Israel." The Times continues, "Defense lawyers said the verdict was a blow to what they called the United States government's decision to litigate the dispute between Israel and the Palestinians in American courtrooms. … 'The government has tried to turn the Israeli-Palestinian conflict into something criminal,' said William Moffitt, who is Dr. Ashqar's lawyer. 'Maybe the government will get it in their heads that the conflict won't be settled in the criminal courts of the United States.'" The Times notes, "Prosecutors said they accepted the jury's decision, but also stood by the evidence they presented at trial. … 'This was about an organization that has publicly claimed credit over and over and over again for terrorist acts,' said Gary S. Shapiro, the first assistant United States attorney in Chicago, 'not just acts against the Israeli military, but acts against civilians where Americans and foreign nationals were killed.'"

The AP (2/2, Robinson) reports, "Salah, 53, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a one-time assistant business professor at Howard University in Washington, had been accused of laundering money for Hamas terrorists fighting to topple the Israeli government. … Defense attorneys portrayed the men as freedom fighters, comparing them to Nelson Mandela, Malcolm X and the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr." The AP adds, "Salah and Ashqar, who lives in Springfield, Virginia, have always denied being members of Hamas. But they have made no secret of their dislike of the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza."

DOJ Officials Brief Senators On Arar Case. The Canadian Press (2/2) reports, "Two U.S. senators who have been briefed on the Maher Arar case say they have a lot more questions. … But Democrat Patrick Leahy and Republican Arlen Specter clammed up about what they were told by Justice Department officials today during a meeting that lasted an hour and 40 minutes. … They say the information is classified but wanted to assure people that the file was receiving a lot of congressional oversight." The CP continues, "The two senators say they want to know more about why Arar was sent to Syria and why the United States won't take him off its security watch list when he's been completely exonerated in Canada. … Leahy also wants the Government Accountability Office to look into Arar's case. The office is already conducting a study of how people make it onto the U.S. no-fly list." The CP adds, "Leahy angrily demanded answers from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a public hearing last month, saying the case was a black mark on the United States."

CNN The Situation Room (2/1, 4:29 p.m.) broadcasted, "It was one of the most heated confrontations we've seen in the US Senate in quite a while. It was when the Senate judiciary committee Patrick Leahy went after the Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. The whole debate focuses on a man named Arar," who "was held by the United States and deported to Syria on the suspicion he had terrorist tiles." After he was released he said "he was held and tortured for ten months," and Senator Leahy "was angry why that happened." Today, Leahy got a "briefing today from the attorney general," but the "only problem he couldn't say much about it, claiming it was all classified." Leahy said, "The conclusion I reached from the briefing today is that we've only begun to ask the questions and we have more questions that have to be asked." Just recently, the US "told Canada that the man remains under a US Watch List. However, Justice "will not talk about this."

DOJ_NMG_0126365

Chinese Official Issues Rebuke Of Bush's "Unilateral" War On Terror. The New York Times (2/2, A6, Kahn, 1.16M) reports a senior Chinese government official issued "a rare public rebuke" of President Bush Thursday, "accusing him of waging a 'unilateral' battle against terrorists that had worsened global tensions." Ye Xiaowen, director of China's State Bureau of Religious Affairs, said in a front-page article in the overseas edition of The People's Daily that Bush's "past references to a 'crusade' and to 'Islamic fascism' were verbal gaffes that revealed his effort to turn the fight against terrorism into a religious war." Partly as a result, he said, the United States "had lost support for the war in Iraq and had frittered away the good will Americans gained after the 9/11 attacks." Ye wrote that Bush had "effectively 'hijacked' one religion, Christianity, to engage in a battle against another one, Islam."

Guantanamo Detainees Complain About Saddam Execution Poster. The New York Times (2/2, Rohde, 1.16M) reports that "military officials have removed a poster of Saddam Hussein from the American detention center in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, after complaints from a detainee that it was intended to intimidate the prisoners there." The poster was described by a detainee to his lawyers as a "7-by-3-foot poster, in a small recreation area for prisoners" that "featured images of Mr. Hussein being sentenced to death and a heading in Arabic that stated, 'Because Saddam chose not to cooperate and not to tell the truth, because he thought by lying he would get released, for that reason he was executed.'" In response, Cmdr. Robert Durand, "chief military spokesman in Guantánamo…said the lawyers' description of the statement on the poster was inaccurate, but he declined to give its exact wording" saying "the intent of this poster was to show that the Iraqi people are making progress and have delivered justice." Detainees also were provided news articles describing Hussein's execution and the "accidental decapitation of a Hussein co-defendant in a subsequent hanging" which their lawyers have described as "psychological warfare and for mental torture and intimidation."

CIA Agents Sought By Germany Tracked Due To Stay In Resort Island. The Washington Post (2/2, A11, Whitlock, 690K) reports from Berlin, "If not for the pit stops on a Mediterranean resort island, where they relaxed in four-star hotels and went to the spa for a massage, the CIA operatives who now face arrest on kidnapping charges in Germany would have remained safely in the shadows, according to German prosecutors." German "investigators said they received detailed records of the intelligence agents' stopovers on the Spanish island of Palma de Mallorca from Spanish police last year. The documents, which included the operatives' passport numbers, hotel bills and aviation records, enabled prosecutors to identify a CIA abduction crew that allegedly kidnapped Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen, in a bungled counterterrorism operation in early 2004. … It's not the first time that CIA officers have left a long trail of clues during an undercover counterterrorism operation in Europe. Italian prosecutors charged 25 CIA operatives and a U.S. Air Force officer with kidnapping a radical cleric in Milan in 2003 after investigators traced their cellphone logs and frequent-flier records. They also found that the operatives had racked up more than $150,000 in expenses while in Italy, including long stays at $500-a-night hotels."

British Terror Suspects Brought To Court. The CBS Evening News (2/1, story 11, :20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Security was very tight today in Britain as nine terror suspects were brought to court," arriving "in a convoy of police vehicles. The nine, believed to be of Pakistani descent, are suspected of plotting to kidnap and behead a Muslim British soldier and then show it on the Internet."

Suspects' Neighbors Skeptical Of Charges. The New York Times (2/2, Perlez, 1.16M) reports many residents in the area of Birmingham, England, where the arrests were made, "said Thursday that they were unconvinced" of the accusations against the suspects. By most neighborhood accounts, "for example, one suspect, Amjad Mahmood, is a father of two in his late 20s who has worked tirelessly to keep his father's grocery business going and who has shown no discernible interest in Islamic affairs." Because of this and because of "recent instances of the British police arresting suspects and then releasing them for lack of evidence linking them to terrorism, people here said they were not convinced of the accusations against Mr. Mahmood and the other eight suspects. The public and startling nature of the arrests in predawn raids made them angry and dismayed, they said."

European Bank Told To Stop Sharing Data With US Antiterror Investigators. The New York Times/AFP (2/2) reports the European Data Protection Supervisor told the European Central Bank Thursday that it "must take action by April to stop the transfer of personal information from Swift, the bank-data consortium, to American authorities for use in antiterrorism investigations." The agency "told the bank to come up with measures 'to make its payment operations fully compliant with data-protection legislation,' urging it to 'take appropriate measures as soon as possible.'" AFP adds that Swift "has come under scrutiny for taking part in an American program that allows analysts from the Central Intelligence Agency and other agencies to search for possible terrorist financing activity among the confidential financial transactions that Swift oversees."

DOJ_NMG_0126366

LATimes Calls For End To Renditions. The Los Angeles Times (2/2, 850K) says in an editorial, "There are plenty of legal and moral reasons why the CIA shouldn't be snatching terrorism suspects off the streets of Europe and shipping them to unsavory countries to be tortured. But there is a simple, practical reason why the Bush administration should forthrightly repudiate its disastrous rendition policy: The United States cannot prevent terrorist attacks without help from its European allies, and they will be less inclined to cooperate when confronted with a policy they rightly believe to be beyond the pale." The Administration "needs to gain cooperation with local authorities before snatching suspects, ban the outsourcing of torture and keep its word to allied governments about the treatment of detainees. We damage the cause of fighting terrorism together when we don't respect European laws. There can be no more disappearances, no more renditions and no more Masris."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

NID Nominee Says He Would Resist Attempts To Politicize Intelligence. USA Today (2/2, Willing, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush's pick for director of national intelligence told senators Thursday that he'll blow the whistle on the president or any other official who tries to skew intelligence reports for political purposes. 'There have been a number of occasions in my career when I had to not be popular but to speak truth to power,' J. Michael McConnell told the Senate Intelligence Committee at a hearing on his nomination. 'I've lived it, I've learned it, I believe it and I can only tell you that's what I'll do,' he said." McConnell's comments "came as committee Democrats, including Ron Wyden of Oregon and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, repeated now-familiar charges that the Bush administration had "cherry picked" intelligence about threats posed by Iraq in 2003. If confirmed, McConnell said, he would inform committee members if that occurs."

Judge Explains Dismissal Of Anthrax Defamation Lawsuit. The New York Times (2/2, Labaton, 1.16M) reports, "A federal judge who dismissed a defamation lawsuit against The New York Times acted after concluding that the scientist who brought the case, a bioterrorism expert investigated over deadly anthrax mailings in 2001, was a public official and could not show that the newspaper had knowingly published false information. In an opinion released Thursday," US District Judge Claude M. Hilton "laid out the reasons for his order last month dismissing a long-running case brought by Steven J. Hatfill," but defense lawyer Mark A. Grannis "said Judge Hilton's opinion was unsurprising and was not the last word in the case."

The Washington Post (2/2, A8, Jerry, Lengel, 690K) reports, "Columnist Nicholas D. Kristof did not act with malice and did not believe his columns about…Hatfill were false," Hilton said. "Although the columns identified Hatfill as a 'likely culprit' in the deadly anthrax-spore mailings, Kristof 'made efforts to avoid implicating his guilt,' Hilton wrote. 'Mr. Kristof reminded readers to assume plaintiff's innocence, and highlighted the fact that plaintiff was viewed by his family and friends as a patriot who could not have perpetrated the crime in question.'"

Changes To Armed-Pilot Program Intended To Boost Participation. The Washington Times (2/2, Hudson, 88K) reports, "Homeland Security officials are making changes to the armed-pilot program to encourage more of the nation's 90,000 captains and co-captains to participate. Armed pilots will be issued badges to identify themselves, they will be allowed to carry their weapons on flights they are not piloting, and US officials will seek to expand the program for overseas flights." Conan Bruce, spokesman for the Federal Air Marshal Service, which now operates the armed-pilot program, said that a proposal to phase out air marshals in favor of the armed pilots in order to cut costs "is 'absolutely not' under consideration. … However, such a suggestion is coming from Capitol Hill, said one source familiar with the proposal. 'It is being advocated they use resources that are already in place, and that's the pilots, and use air marshals on targeted, high-risk and threat flights rather than scattered throughout the system like they are now,' the source said."

Survey Finds Poorest Gulf Coast Residents Still Struggling To Recover From Katrina. The New York Times (2/2, Dewan, 1.16M) reports a new study by the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University and the Children's Health Fund has found that many of "the poorest families" displaced by Hurricane Katrina "still suffer from a significant loss of income, a higher-than-normal rate of chronic diseases like hypertension and an exponential rise in mental health problems among children. The study, conducted in the Gulf Coast region of Mississippi a year after the storm," consisted of "face-to-face interviews with families living in private trailer parks, in Federal Emergency Management Agency trailer parks, or on their own property, usually in trailers provided by FEMA. The FEMA park residents, who are often isolated by lack of transportation, were the poorest and least financially stable, and the most likely to view their environment as dangerous. 'For all practical purposes, these FEMA trailer parks are in fact internal refugee camps,' Dr. Redlener said."

DOJ_NMG_0126367

The CBS Evening News (2/1, story 10, 2:55, Keteyian, 7.66M) reported that the study's "most startling finding" was that "as many as 10,000 displaced children across the Gulf are now suffering from clinically diagnosed depression, a 400% increase from before the storm." Redlener was shown saying, "The loss of hope is a very powerful factor here." Gil Jamieson, the deputy director for Gulf Coast recovery for FEMA was shown saying, "We have families living with children. We're doing all that we can do to move those people into a permanent housing alternative as quickly as we can." Keteyian: "All you can do?" Jamieson: "We are." Keteyian: "That's not what I'm hearing in the camps and trailer parks. You know there's a great deal of anger." Jamieson: "Sure." Keteyian: "A great deal of hopelessness in those sites right now." Jamieson: "There is, indeed, and I think you need to look at that against the context of what we have accomplished." Keteyian: "FEMA has found emergency housing for more than 80% of those displaced by the hurricane, but that's little comfort to the residents still stuck in this trailer camp, ironically named Renaissance Village. FEMA recently signed a new four-year contract with the company that provides security here."

WSJournal Says Insurers Being Made "Scapegoats For Acts Of God." The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A18, 2.04M) editorializes, "Hurricane Katrina was ugly enough, but leave it to Gulf state politicians to guarantee that even a mild future hurricane may cause more human hardship. They're busy rewriting private insurance contracts in such a way that will raise property and casualty rates for everyone, especially if you live near the coast." The Journal states that the "populist opportunism" of Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood, who "has bludgeoned insurer State Farm into a gigantic settlement over hundreds of dubious claims," is also seen in "Florida, where legislators have passed a 'reform' that forces insurers to lower their premiums and allows the state-run insurer to co-opt the local market." The Journal continues, "More Americans are choosing to live in places at risk for natural calamity, only to seek a bailout from politicians when the worst happens. This trend is bad enough. But politicians compound the problem when they make insurers the scapegoats for acts of God."

WPost Says Coast Guard Guilty Of Poor Contract Management. The Washington Post (2/2, A14, 690K) editorializes, "Though some of it is overblown," recent criticism of the Coast Guard's Deepwater modernization program "is deserved. The Coast Guard is guilty of one of the classic errors that other federal agencies within and without the Department of Homeland Security make all the time: poor contract management, an alarmingly -- and unnecessarily -- large source of government waste." Coast Guard chief Adm. Thad W. Allen's statements in front of "an irate House oversight panel," where he "took responsibility for the performance of his contract managers and detailed needed reforms to the service's contracting process" were "a start." The Post says, "After a year's time, the Coast Guard's retooling must be back on course or more drastic measures will be warranted."

WAR NEWS:

Senate Debate To Pit McCain Versus Warner Resolutions. The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Levey, Gaouette, 850K) reports, "The shape of the Senate debate over President Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq came into clearer focus Thursday as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz) and two other senators introduced a resolution to support the buildup. After weeks of back-and-forth negotiations over resolutions, it appears likely the Senate debate over the 4-year-old war will pit McCain's resolution of 'full support' against one introduced by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) that 'disagrees' with the president's proposal." But "how that debate is likely to turn out became even murkier Thursday as lawmakers continued to mull the details of the two lengthy resolutions." The Times adds, "Thursday afternoon, Sens. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) and George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who have criticized the troop buildup but have not endorsed any critical resolution, uncharacteristically rushed past reporters and into the Senate chamber." Meanwhile, "McCain and other senators escalated their attacks on the Warner measure and its supporters."

The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A4, Rogers, 2.04M) says Bush's "Senate allies want a vote next week calling on the Baghdad government to 'make visible concrete progress' toward 11 political, military and economic benchmarks." The McCain resolution "is designed to slow the momentum behind a tougher Iraq measure crafted by Sen. John Warner (R., Va.), the former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee." Sen. Joseph Lieberman, "the Connecticut independent who usually caucuses with Democrats, is among the sponsors, but the support comes overwhelmingly from Republicans" led by McCain. The Journal notes "a handful of liberal Democrats, notably Sens. Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, announced their opposition to the Warner language yesterday as too weak in its opposition to the administration's policy." And GOP Sen. Judd Gregg, "an ally of the White House, had surprised many this week when he said he was 'considering' supporting the Warner language." Yesterday, he said "he had decided not to vote for the measure."

DOJ_NMG_0126368

The New York Times (2/2, Hulse, 1.16M) says the "shifting allegiances -- and the intense procedural gamesmanship preceding votes next week on Iraq policy -- left it uncertain whether Mr. Warner's compromise could attract the 60 votes needed to overcome procedural obstacles. Given the party divide in the Senate, it appeared that about a dozen Republicans would have to break from the president to allow the debate to move forward; he had only six Republicans firmly on board."

McClatchy (2/2, Talev, Schoof) notes "some key Republicans said they hadn't made up their minds, and Senate Republican Whip Trent Lott of Mississippi said he thought he could rally enough opponents to sustain a filibuster. 'I'm always working,' he said." Majority Leader Harry Reid "left open the possibility Thursday that he might bring in South Dakota Sen. Tim Johnson, who's recuperating from brain surgery, if Democrats need his vote to move the resolution forward. 'We'll have to see. He's doing very well,' Reid said in a brief interview with McClatchy Newspapers." But "Johnson's chief of staff said later that while the senator is making good progress, he physically wouldn't be able to return to the Senate to cast a vote by next week. While Reid stressed that there was no firm plan to try to get Johnson to the Senate to vote, the fact that he was willing to consider it demonstrates how fluid the parliamentary situation remains."

The Washington Post (2/2, A4, Weisman, Murray, 690K) says "Democratic defections would probably not prevent the legislation from passing the Senate, provided that the measure gets to a final vote over a threatened filibuster by Republicans." But "defections would deprive Democratic leaders of a strong united vote against Bush's decision to boost troop levels in Iraq by 21,500." The Post adds, "Democratic leaders noted that the compromise puts them in a far stronger position to defeat a Republican-led filibuster against the resolution."

The Washington Times (2/2, Hurt, 88K) headlines its report "Majority In Senate Support 'Stay The Course' Resolution," and says "a bipartisan majority in the Senate yesterday united behind a firm 'stay the course' resolution on the war in Iraq, despite searing public criticism from both sides in Congress over President Bush's handling of the war." The resolution "is critical of the war's execution and condemns any effort by Mr. Bush to send reinforcements to the region. In the measure, the Senate also promises not to cut off funding for the increasingly unpopular war. … Although backers say they are deeply dissatisfied with the execution of the war, the resolution says that the United States 'should continue vigorous operations' in parts of Iraq and that early withdrawal 'would present a threat to regional and world peace.'"

The network newscasts largely ignored the McCain resolution. Instead, they focused on Warner's, and suggested it is gathering strong bipartisan backing. NBC Nightly News (2/1, story 2, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported on "an unusual joining of forces on Capitol Hill over the war. Senators in both parties seem to have agreed on a single one of those resolutions opposing the President's troop buildup." NBC (Reid) added, "A big development in the Senate today. A compromise between two groups of senators opposed to sending more troops to Iraq. One group is led by Democrat Joe Biden and Republican Chuck Hagel. The other by Republican John Warner who felt the Biden-Hagel resolution was too harsh. Today the two groups joined forces for the most part adopting Warner's language. Now on the eve of a major showdown, the Senate breaks down into three major factions. First, nearly all Democrats and at least half a dozen Republicans plan to vote for a nonbinding resolution opposing the President's troop buildup. The second faction, most Senate Republicans, who intend to support the President's plan. And third, a small number of liberal Democrats who say they won't vote for any nonbinding resolution."

ABC World News (2/1, lead story, 3:15, Tapper, 8.78M) reported passage of a Senate resolution "with a bipartisan majority…would be a harsh political blow to the President. But the worst thing for the White House is the man putting together the compromise legislation" is Warner, "a leading Republican." The resolution "has a good chance of winning a bipartisan majority. … To win Republicans, the bill now states that funding for troops in the field should not be cut. But that provision may cause defections by the Democrats' liberal wing, who are frustrated that a non-binding resolution does not actually do anything. And want to use the power of the purse to force the President to change course." Also on ABC World News (2/1, story 2, 1:30, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said, "This would be the first time the Senate would be on record opposing the President's policy. That has great moral and political force. It also puts the Senate and Congress one step closer to using their constitutional power to restrict funding for the war effort if the situation doesn't improve on the ground in Baghdad. There would be no more intermediate steps."

The Senate debate was extensively covered by local TV. Like the network reports, local broadcasts also focused on the Warner measure. Some examples: ABC affiliate WSET-TV (2/2, 11:22 pm) in Roanoke said "there seems to be little doubt that the Senate will pass a resolution opposing the measure. The questions are how tough the language will be and how many Republicans will go along. … A new compromise resolution, designed to win over more Republicans, gained momentum Thursday and will most likely be voted on early next week. … The Bush Administration has resigned itself to the fact that there will be a vote voicing opposition to the President's policy." Almost identical stories ran on many other ABC affiliates, including KFBB-TV Great Falls, MT (2/1, 10:13 pm), WJET-TV Erie (2/1, 5:18 pm), KXXV-TV Waco (2/2, 5:05 pm), and KABC-TV Los Angeles (2/1, 5:02 pm).

DOJ_NMG_0126369

WFXW-TV Terre Haute (2/2, 10:02 pm) reported, "The Senate may be on the verge of a final agreement to oppose the President's surge plan, and the resolution getting support has been brought to the table by a Republican, Virginia Senator John Warner. It appears to satisfy some Republicans who were concerned that a strongly worded resolution could send the wrong message to the troops," but it also "meets the demands of many Democrats who had sponsored their own resolutions to stop the troop surge."

KTVU-TV San Francisco (2/1, 5:15 pm) reported, "A bipartisan, nonbinding resolution offered by Democrat Carl Levin and Republican John Warner gained attention as it brought together important elements of earlier proposals. Key to some Republicans, it makes clear that funding for our troops will not be cut, and for Democrats, a strong call not to build up troop levels. But the White House says it's not a true solution."

On CNN's The Situation Room (2/1, Blitzer), DNC Chairman Howard Dean said, "The Democrats, in fact, are not split. And the resolution is not watered down. They changed a few words. I think this is a very smart move on the part of Harry Reid. If we can get significant numbers of Republicans to repudiate the Republican president's policy, which is about to happen, then I think that's very, very positive."

CNN's The Situation Room (2/1, Blitzer) interviewed Sen. Levin, who said, "There's a broad consensus against sending the 21,000 additional troops in the country and among Democrats. And if we can get 60 votes -- if we can get 60 votes to defeat a Republican filibuster against the Warner resolution, which I've co-sponsored, which says that we disagree with the President's plan to increase forces by 21,000, it would be a very dramatic statement of senatorial disagreement with the president and would be an important first step, we believe, in turning this ship around and forcing a change of course."

On MSNBC's Hardball (2/1, Matthews), Rep. Jack Murtha, who has just returned from a trip to Iraq with Speaker Nancy Pelosi, said, "One of the things we found in Iraq confirming the things we've been saying, we can't win it militarily. We don't think so. In our opinion, there's got to be some negotiations between the Shias and the Sunnis. And that doesn't look like it's going to happen. As a matter of fact, I told the Prime Minister of Iraq I wasn't about to recommend funding $5 billion for their equipment if they weren't more cooperative and if they didn't do some negotiations because I think that may help. I don't think it's going to win the war, but I think it will certainly help." Murtha said the Administration "understand[s] that the appropriation process -- we're building a case to actually divert some money from the surge to the resupplying and resetting our equipment."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (2/1), Morton Kondracke of Roll Call said, "Senator [Christopher] Dodd is exactly right. This is a resolution says we disagree with what the President wants to do, we want to oppose the status quo, and we're not going to do anything about it. We do not want them to increase the number of troops, we're not going to call for withdrawal of any troops. We're not going to cut off funds. So, it really is the status quo. And everybody acknowledges that the status quo is not working. So, I do not know what they think they're going to get done here, but it is a way of demonstrating dissatisfaction with the president, and that's the political impetus behind it."

Bush To Discuss Iraq With GOP Senators Today. USA Today (2/2, Kiely, 2.27M) reports, "As the Senate prepares to debate his plan to increase troop levels in Iraq…Bush will be trying to sell it Friday to an unexpectedly skeptical audience: senators from his party. Republican senators are scheduled to wrap up a day-long strategy session with a visit to the White House, where Bush will host a meeting and a reception." USA Today adds, "It could be an awkward visit: Some of the president's guests are leading an effort to put the Senate on record opposing Bush's plan to commit an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. Perhaps not coincidentally, many of the mutinous senators are up for re-election in 2008. At least seven of the 20 Republican senators due to face the voters next year already are on record expressing misgivings about the president's planned troop increase. Among them are Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., chief sponsors of the critical resolution that the Senate will begin debating Monday. Another Republican supporter of the Warner resolution, Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota -- one of the most vulnerable Republicans after winning with just 50% of the vote in 2002 -- expressed exasperation with Bush's policies in Iraq at a hearing earlier this week."

Making Case On Senate Vote, Snow Notes Bin Laden's Words About Lack Of US Resolve. CNN's The Situation Room (2/1, Blitzer) reported White House press secretary Tony Snow "is sending a harsh word of warning to those senators about putting their opposition to the president's new Iraq strategy on the record. He even invoked the name of America's most wanted terrorist." Snow was shown saying, "Osama bin Laden thought that a lack of American resolve was a key reason he could inspire people to come after us after September 11th. I am not accusing members of the Senate of inviting carnage on the United States of America. I'm simply saying you think about what impact it may have."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (2/1), Juan Williams of National Public Radio said, "At moment, the White House is involved in a very aggressive campaign to try to hold the line. They say to people, give us time, don't hurt the president, don't hurt the troops. That's the way they're posturing it. But, I mean, they're going against a tidal wave of public sentiment."

DOJ_NMG_0126370

"Surge" Could Involve 48,000 US Troops, Cost Nearly Triple Bush's Price Tag. CQ (2/2, Oliveri) reports, "Democratic leaders questioned whether President Bush fully disclosed the size and cost of his plan to send additional troops to Iraq, citing a report that said it could require more than double the number of soldiers." The report by the Congressional Budget Office "found that Bush's decision to deploy 21,500 extra combat troops in Iraq actually could require a total increase of as many as 48,000 troops when support units are counted, and cost as much as $27 billion over 12 months. That cost is also far higher than the figure administration officials previously discussed." McClatchy (2/2, Rosen) says the surge "could cost as much as $10 billion this year, nearly triple the initial $3.2 billion price tag that Bush aides placed on the surge," according to the CBO. If "the additional troops remain in Iraq for more than a year, the CBO said, the cost could rise as high as $29 billion."

NIE Estimate Sees Strong Chance Of Further Deterioration, With Little US Control Of Outcome. The Washington Post (2/2, A1, Deyoung, Pincus, 690K) reports, "A long-awaited National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, presented to…Bush by the intelligence community yesterday, outlines an increasingly perilous situation in which the United States has little control and there is a strong possibility of further deterioration, according to sources familiar with the document." The NIE "comes to no conclusion and holds out prospects of improvement. But it couches glimmers of optimism in deep uncertainty about whether the Iraqi leaders will be able to transcend sectarian interests and fight against extremists, establish effective national institutions and end rampant corruption." The document "emphasizes that although al-Qaeda activities in Iraq remain a problem, they have been surpassed by Iraqi-on-Iraqi violence as the primary source of conflict and the most immediate threat to US goals. Iran, which the administration has charged with supplying and directing Iraqi extremists, is mentioned but is not a focus."

"Element Of Principle" In Feingold's Move To Cut Off Funding Praised. In a Wall Street Journal column (2/2), Kimberly A. Strassel writes, "The Senate is teeming with courageous souls these days, most of them Republicans who have taken that brave step of following the opinion polls and abandoning their president in a time of war. Meanwhile, one of the few senators showing some backbone in the Iraq debate is being shunned as the skunk at the war critics' party." Sen. Russ Feingold "held a hearing this week on Congress's constitutional power to shut off funds for the Iraq war, and followed it up a day later with legislation that would do just that. The Wisconsin pacifist might not understand the importance of winning in Iraq -- or the cost of losing -- but at least there's an element of principle to his actions. He's opposed the war from the start and his proposal to cut off money after six months would certainly end it. It also happens to be Congress's one legitimate means of stopping a war. … For a month the Senate has been trying to wrestle control of Iraq from the president, but undercover, and in a way that that avoids accountability. Sen. Feingold shone a light under that rock this week, and now the hard questions begin."

Casey Says Bush's "Surge" Calls For More Soldiers Than Needed To Pacify Baghdad. The AP (2/2, Espo) reports, "The outgoing top US general in Iraq diplomatically aired his differences with the commander in chief on Thursday, telling lawmakers that President Bush has ordered thousands more troops into Iraq than needed to tamp down violence in Baghdad." Casey "quickly added he understood how his recently confirmed successor, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, could want the full complement of 21,500 additional troops that Bush has ordered to Iraq. Casey said they could 'either reinforce success, maintain momentum or put more forces in a place where the plans are not working.'" USA Today (2/2, Brook, 2.27M) reports White House spokesman Tony Snow "said the president has talked to Casey, and 'Gen. Casey supports the plan.'" In fact, McClatchy (2/2, Schoof) says "Casey didn't criticize Bush's plan. He said that the three brigades it adds above his recommendation would give the new commander more flexibility."

The Washington Times (2/2, Scarborough, 88K) also says Casey "broke with his superiors, including…Bush, by telling a Senate committee he does not agree with their dire assessments that the Iraq war is failing. 'I do not agree that we have a failed policy,'" he said.

Much of the coverage of Casey's testimony focuses on the strongly worded criticism he faced from senators, particularly Republican John McCain. ABC World News (2/1, story 3, 1:25, Gibson, 8.78M) said Casey "did not get much support on Capitol Hill today. Testifying before senators, he found himself under attack. Unusual to find a commanding general subjected to such criticism." McCain: "General I don't question your honorable service. I question seriously the judgment that was employed in your execution of your responsibilities in Iraq. And we have paid a very, very heavy price in American blood and treasure because of what is now agreed to by literally everyone as a failed policy." Casey: "Senator, I do not agree that we have a failed policy. I believe the President's new strategy will enhance the policy that we have." Sen. Lindsey Graham: "In what percentage of the country would it be impossible for an American to walk down the street without being afraid of being shot at or killed?" Casey: "Probably about half, actually, Senator." Graham: "Here we are, two and a half years later. Half the country, no American can walk down the street." Casey "was on Capitol Hill because he's been nominated to be Army chief of staff. Despite the clashes and criticism General Casey is expected to be confirmed by a wide margin." The Washington Post (2/2, A4, Ricks, 690K) says that "summarizing the day's proceedings, Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) , chairman of the Armed Services Committee, told reporters after the hearing that he thought the majority of its members would vote to confirm Casey."

DOJ_NMG_0126371

NBC Nightly News (2/1, lead story, 3:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported Casey "was grilled by members of the Senate. It was verbal combat and it got heated." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "This was an unprecedented public reprimand of a senior US military official over the war in Iraq." And the CBS Evening News (2/1, story 5, 2:25, Martin, 7.66M) noted that "if he is confirmed, Casey will be responsible for providing all those extra troops he didn't want to send to Iraq."

Focusing on McCain's criticism, the Washington Post (2/2, A13, 690K) reports that though the senator "has been a firm supporter of the Iraq war and of…Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Baghdad in the coming months," yesterday "he expressed stark concerns about the war." Said McCain, "Things have gotten markedly and progressively worse, and the situation in Iraq can now best be described as dire and deteriorating. I regret that our window of opportunity to reverse momentum may be closing."

The New York Times (2/2, Cloud, 1.16M) refers to "withering criticism from some Senate Republicans," and says the exchanges "underscored the anger that dominates much Congressional sentiment on Iraq as well as the tensions between the White House and the military over Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq." The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Barnes, 850K) reports Casey was "was berated by leading Senate critics," and describes the general as "an unenthusiastic supporter of the new strategy."

Suicide Attack Kills 45 At Baghdad Market. The CBS Evening News (2/1, story 4, :15, Couric, 7.66M) reported that in Iraq yesterday, "45 people were killed…when suicide bombers attacked a market 60 miles south of Baghdad. And in the capital, six Iraqis were killed and a dozen others hurt when a car bomb went off near a busy shopping area." NBC Nightly News (2/1, story 3, :25, Williams, 9.87M) reported "one Iraqi official says 1,990 civilians were killed in the month of January alone."

USA Today/AP (2/2, 6A) reports that in the market, two blasts "hurled the bodies of victims through the air and set fire to wooden stalls where vendors sold fruits and vegetables. Some shoppers fled, screaming in panic, while others stopped to help rescuers carry away the wounded." The Washington Post (2/2, A1, Londono, Sarhan, 690K) says the first explosion "sent a throng of shoppers at the covered market rushing toward another exit. There, a second attacker detonated his bomb, laced with nails and shards of metal, killing far more people than the first, Capt. Muthana Ahmed said."

The New York Times (2/2, Glanz, 1.16M) reports "the explosions were the latest incidents in a wash of violence that has swept over a belt of Shiite-controlled Iraq starting about 30 miles south of Baghdad and stretching about 70 miles farther south. … The reasons for the violence are unclear, although American and Iraqi officials cite increasing rivalries between armed Shiite groups, possible meddling by neighboring countries like Iran, and sectarian hatreds between Sunni and Shiite Arabs. A mixture of the two groups populates the northern part of the belt, while the southern part is overwhelmingly Shiite."

Baghdad Sees First Signs Of Security Crackdown. The AP (2/2, Hurst) reports, "US Army engineers have torn down houses and surrounded the newly cleared space with razor wire atop concrete blast walls for neighborhood bases, the first outward signs of the coming Baghdad security crackdown." American and Iraqi commanders "are pulling together a force that numbers -- on paper at least -- about 90,000 troops for what many see as a last-chance drive to curb the debilitating violence that has turned Baghdad into a battleground and killed -- according to the United Nations -- more than 34,000 civilians last year alone. … Of the 90,000-troop force now assembling for a new try at calming the capital, more than half were to be Iraqi soldiers and police, a large majority of whom are Shiite Muslims. It remains an open question whether those forces will be any more inclined this time to battle heavily armed fellow Shiite militiamen or Sunni insurgents, including al-Qaida in Iraq and its suicide bombers."

The CBS Evening News (2/1, story 6, :15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Iraq's government is gearing up for that upcoming security crackdown. Today it closed a key border crossing with Iran and also suspended flights to and from Syria."

American Troops Strive To Provide Positive Image To Iraqis Amid "Chaos Of War." The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Perry, 850K) reports that "a new batch of troops is trying to win the hearts and minds of the public" in Iraq. Marines face a challenge due to recent transgressions of a few soldiers as well as occasions when "insurgents flooded into Haditha, massacring police officers and other townspeople who had cooperated with the Americans." Along with "dozens of deaths…suspicion and hostility and made the Marine mission here exceedingly difficult and dangerous." Rumors and tales of mistakes about Marines in the region are "tragic but understandable in the chaos of war," according to one Haditha resident.

DOJ_NMG_0126372

Krauthammer Says US "Midwifed" Iraq's "Freedom," But Iraqis "Chose Civil War." In the Washington Post (2/2, A15, 690K), Charles Krauthammer writes, "Iraqis were given their freedom, and yet many have chosen civil war. Among all these religious prejudices, ancient wounds, social resentments and tribal antagonisms, who gets the blame for the rivers of blood? You can always count on some to find the blame in America. 'We did not give them a republic,' insists Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria. 'We gave them a civil war.'" Adds Krauthammer, "Of all the accounts of the current situation, this is by far the most stupid. And the most pernicious. Did Britain 'give' India the Hindu-Muslim war of 1947-48 that killed a million souls and ethnically cleansed 12 million more? The Jewish-Arab wars in Palestine? The tribal wars of post-colonial Uganda? We gave them a civil war? Why? Because we failed to prevent it? Do the police in America have on their hands the blood of the 16,000 murders they failed to prevent last year?" The argument "infantilizes Arabs. It demonizes Americans. It willfully overlooks the plainest of facts: Iraq is their country. We midwifed their freedom. They chose civil war."

Administration Delays Release Of Evidence Backing Claims On Iran. The New York Times (2/2, A13, Sanger, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports President Bush's national security advisers "have ordered a delay in publication of evidence intended to support Washington's contention that Iran supplies lethal technology and other aid to militias in Iraq," senior administration officials said Thursday. The decision was described by officials "who were struggling to explain why American officials in Baghdad have twice canceled plans to present the evidence, delays that have raised questions about the quality of the intelligence." Some administration officials said there was "a continuing debate about how well the information proved the Bush administration's case." One official who has reviewed elements of the briefing "said the decision to delay it -- made by [Secretary] Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and [NSA] Stephen J. Hadley -- was also motivated by concern about potentially disclosing the sources of the intelligence, and by a debate over what might be the most politically opportune moment to press the case that Iran is the source of some of the most deadly attacks on American and Iraqi forces."

US Says It Won't Block Iran's Moves To Establish Banks In Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A8, Solomon, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports senior Bush administration officials said the US "won't block Iran's efforts to establish financial institutions in Iraq, a decision that sets up a delicate balance in US efforts to limit Iranian influence there." US approval of Iran's "economic engagement with Iraq is complicated by allegations by some White House and Pentagon officials that Tehran is training and arming Shiite militias and may be directly targeting American soldiers inside Iraq." US officials had "initially reacted coolly" to the Iranian plans, but in interviews yesterday, senior Bush administration officials 'said the US accepted the Iranian economic moves and would make no effort to block them."

Iraq Fears Being Caught In Middle Of US-Iran Tensions. The Chicago Tribune (2/2, Sly, 617K) reports, "Alarmed by rising tensions between the United States and Iran, Iraqi government officials fear their country is in danger of being dragged into the middle of a new conflict between its two main allies." The Bush administration's increased rhetoric towards Iran "has fueled concerns in Baghdad that Iraq will become the battleground in a showdown between Iran and the US," Iraqi officials say. Iraqi government spokesman, Ali al- Dabbagh, told a news conference Thursday in Baghdad, "We want to maintain good relations with our neighbors, especially Iran. We have long borders with them, we have local interests with [them] and we would like to have this relationship not in the shadow of the others." Iraq "also wants to maintain good relations with the US," he added, "stressing that Iraq does not condone attacks against US forces in Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Richter, Roug, 850K) reports that "the Iraqi government Thursday invited Iran and Syria to Baghdad for talks next month on regional security, amid growing tension and accusations by the Bush administration of foreign meddling in Iraqi affairs." Although the US has yet to receive and invite from the Iraqi government, "the meeting is intended to 'promote support for the government of Iraq on security and other issues,' said Samir Shakir Mahmoud Sumaidy, the Iraqi ambassador to the United States." According to Sumaidy, this summit is "part of a series of regional gatherings sponsored by Iraq's fledgling government that have not included nations from outside the region. It is tentatively scheduled to start March 10." This summit "comes at a time when U.S. officials have accused Iran of meddling in Iraq" and "the Bush administration…has complained that Syria is allowing foreign fighters to cross into Iraq."

Brzezinski Warns Iraq War Will Lead To Other Conflicts. The AP (2/2, Schweid) reports former national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski warned Thursday the Iraq war was likely to lead to "a head-on conflict" with Iran and other parts of the Muslim world. Appearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Brzezinski said, "If the United States continues to be bogged down in a protracted bloody involvement in Iraq, and I emphasize what I am about to say, the final destination on this downhill track is likely to be a head-on conflict with Iran and with much of the world of Islam at large."

Military Source Says Israel Preparing To Attack Iran's Nuclear Sites. The Washington Times (2/2, Gertz, Scarborough, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, that "a military source tells us the talk among Israeli military officials is how and when to counter Iran's nuclear weapons program, most likely in a pre-emptive attack on Iranian nuclear facilities." Sources say "the Israelis know that any attack will require overflying U.S.-dominated Iraq, but one solution would be to set up a secret base in another area between Iran and Israel to refuel Israel's bombers" explaining their recent purchase "U.S. precision-guided joint direct attack munitions, or JDAM, kits for their bombs and special bunker-buster explosives that could be used to destroy underground Iranian nuclear facilities." While "the Bush administration is hardening its position on Iran" it "is holding Israel in check from attacking" although this has not stopped Israel from acting unilaterally with its military before.

DOJ_NMG_0126373

Ahmadinejad Calls UN Sanctions Ineffective. The New York Times (2/2, A10, Fathi, 1.16M) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "said Thursday that his nation was becoming a superpower and that the United Nations sanctions would not deter it from pursuing its nuclear program." Speaking to reporters, he said Iran is "rapidly becoming a superpower," and its "strength does not come from military weapons or an economic capability." Ahmadinejad's comments come "as some conservatives in Iran joined moderates to warn that his dismissiveness toward sanctions by the [UNSC] over Iran's nuclear program could have dangerous consequences."

The AP (2/2, Dareini) reports Ahmadinejad also "suggested Tehran would announce next week that it is beginning to install a new assembly of 3,000 centrifuges in an underground portion of its uranium enrichment facility at Natanz." The installation would be "a major jump in Iran's uranium enrichment program, though it could take months to" complete. Meanwhile, AFP (2/2, Adler) quotes a Vienna-based diplomat as saying Iran has already begun installing centrifuges at the Natanz site.

Russia Calls For Delay In Imposing Sanctions. The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/2, A8) reports Russia Thursday "signaled that it backs a 'time-out' proposed by the head of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency that calls for holding off on imposing U.N. sanctions if Tehran suspends uranium enrichment." The Foreign Ministry said in a statement, "We believe the initiative put forward by the IAEA head...suggesting that Iran suspend uranium enrichment in exchange for the U.N. Security Council's reciprocal step regarding resolution 1737 deserves close attention."

Russia May Seek Gas Accord With Tehran. The New York Times (2/2, A10, Myers, 1.16M) reports, "Even as the United States intensifies its efforts to isolate Iran, President Vladimir V. Putin said Thursday that Russia would consider OPEC-like cooperation with Tehran on sales of natural gas." He "stopped short of endorsing price fixing, however, saying he was concerned only with ensuring stable supplies for consuming nations." At the same time Putin also reiterated Russia's opposition to Iran acquiring nuclear weapons, but his remarks "underscored a widening rift with the United States and its allies over how to force Tehran to comply with United Nations Security Council resolutions."

On its front page, the Wall Street Journal (2/2, A1, Gold, White, 2.04M) notes that "while there are several reasons why a gas cartel isn't likely to work as well as OPEC has managed the oil markets, the talk has alarmed big gas consumers, particularly in Europe, which gets a quarter of its gas from Russia. A cartel would be less menacing economically in the short-term to the US, which still gets most of its gas within North America." The Journal also writes that the "prospect of Russia and Iran working together to influence markets can't be comforting for Western countries. While Russia doesn't have the same pariah status as Iran, Moscow has under Mr. Putin faced increasing criticism for using its vast energy riches as a diplomatic lever."

Chirac Again Seeks To Clarify Remarks On Iran. The New York Times (2/2, Bennhold, 1.16M) reports French President Jacques Chirac, "seeking to limit the diplomatic reaction over his remarks on Iran's nuclear ambitions, reaffirmed Thursday that France remained committed to preventing Iran from becoming a nuclear power." The statement was issued "within hours" of the publication of an interview in which Chirac "said that if Iran had one or two nuclear weapons, it would not pose a serious danger because the launching of such a weapon would lead to the immediate destruction of Tehran." The president's office denounced the publication of his comments as a "shameful campaign" and accused American news media outlets of "using any excuse to engage in France-bashing."

The Washington Times/AP (2/2, Keaten) questions whether the comments reflect that Chirac "at age 74 and in the waning months of his second and likely last term" is "losing his political touch" or "even his mental vigor?"

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/2, A18, 2.04M) writes, "They're certainly going to miss [Chirac] in Tehran" after his term ends later this year. The Journal notes that Chirac" won't make public his political intentions before March, but in one recent poll only 2% of the French want him on the ballot again. Privately, Chirac aides believe that only a foreign policy crisis -- say, over Iran -- could revive his political career. His remarks this week make it more likely that Iran will become a crisis, but at least we can hope he won't be around to make it any worse."

Regime Change Urged In Iran. Author Amir Taheri writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/2, A19, 2.04M) that the question in Tehran "these days" is "Will they hit or not?" The question is "wreaking havoc on Iran's fragile economy by fomenting an atmosphere of uncertainty even before the sanctions imposed by the U.N. Security Council start to bite." In addition, the Khomeinist leadership is "divided over the reality of the threat, and over ways of dealing with it." While

DOJ_NMG_0126374

President Ahmadinejad "claims that the US is in no position to do much damage," the "bulk of the Khomeinist leadership, including the 'Supreme Guide' Ali Khamenei, however, take the threat seriously and are preparing public opinion for a climb-down by the Islamic Republic." Taheri warns the international community about being "duped by a tactical retreat in Tehran or a temporary modification of the regime's behavior." Instead, he says, "what is needed is a change in the nature of the regime."

Friedman Urges Oil Conservation To Undermine Iranian Regime. In his New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) column, Thomas L. Friedman writes that "getting addicted to selling oil can make your country really stupid, and if the price of oil suddenly drops, it can make your people really revolutionary. That's the real story of the rise and fall of the Soviet Union -- it overdosed on oil -- and it could end up being the real story of Iran, if we're smart." The "sharp rise in oil prices in the 1970s deluded the Kremlin into overextending subsidies at home and invading Afghanistan abroad -- and then the collapse in prices in the '80s helped bring down the overextended empire." Iran has been spending billions on subsidies "to buy off interest groups. ... So if oil prices fall sharply again, Iran's regime will have to take away many benefits from many Iranians, as the Soviets had to do. For a regime already unpopular with many of its people, that could cause all kinds of problems and give rise to an Ayatollah Gorbachev. We know how that ends." The "best tool we have for curbing Iran's influence is not containment or engagement, but getting the price of oil down in the long term with conservation and an alternative-energy strategy. Let's exploit Iran's oil addiction by ending ours."

Afghan Parliament Urges Amnesty For Citizens From Past Wars. The New York Times (2/2, Gall, 1.16M) reports that "Afghanistan's lower house of Parliament has approved a nonbinding resolution urging the government to grant immunity to all Afghans involved in the wars of the last 25 years." This resolution "brought protests on Thursday from human rights advocates and the United Nations…who had been working with the government on a plan to address the many abuses over the last three decades." Afghan lawmakers remain firm and support the resolution "in the interest of peace and stability" which "was approved just days after President Hamid Karzai began work on the government's reconciliation plan," including proposed "talks with Taliban leaders as Afghanistan braced for a spring offensive by insurgents linked to the Taliban."

US Military Makes Arms And Equipment Donation To Afghan Army. The AP (2/2, Faiez) reports that "the United States presented hundreds of armored vehicles and trucks and thousands of weapons to the Afghan army Thursday as Afghanistan braces for renewed fighting with Taliban-led insurgents. The donation included "800 military vehicles and more than 12,000 weapons is part of a critical effort to build an Afghan army able to defend the country on its own and eventually allow U.S. and NATO-led forces to pull back" after the more modern technology enables the Afghan National Army to evolve into "a well equipped, well-trained, well-led, self-sustaining army," according to U.S. Maj. Gen. Robert Durbin at the donation ceremony at a military base in Kabul. During the ceremony, Afghan President Karzai "thanked the U.S. officials and said that such donations and further training would enable Afghans 'to stand on our own feet.'

Rising Drug Trade Linked To Terrorism In Afghanistan. The New York Times (2/2, Risen, 1.16M) reports in detail the US deal with known Afghani drug lord and Taliban ally Haji Bashir Noorzai. After years of deals with Mr. Noorzai in an attempt to collect counter-terrorism knowledge all of the negotiations went sour resulting in his recent arrest in New York. "In Afghanistan, finding terrorists has always trumped chasing drug traffickers," according to Bobby Charles, "the former top counternarcotics official at the State Department." Illustrating the complex issues involved "in fighting the war on terrorism," when "government officials have often accepted trade-offs in developing relationships with informants with questionable backgrounds who might prove useful" although "it is often not clear whether the benefits outweigh the costs."

Pentagon Reorganizes Non-Fatal Casualty Statistics On Web Page. The New York Times (2/2, Grady, 1.16M) reports that "statistics on a Pentagon Web site have been reorganized in a way that lowers the published totals of American nonfatal casualties in Iraq and Afghanistan." According to Dr. Michael Kilpatrick, the deputy director of force health protection and readiness at the Defense Department, "the previous method of tallying casualties was misleading and might have made injuries and combat wounds seem worse and more numerous than they really were." The change was motivated when "public perceptions of the wounded increased last month after Linda Bilmes, a Harvard professor, published an opinion article in The Los Angeles Times mentioning 50,508 'nonmortal woundings' in Iraq and Afghanistan." That number was a miscalculated mistake "from a Web page posted by public affairs employees at the Department of Veterans Affairs" who combined "combat and noncombat injuries as well as illnesses and labeling them all 'woundings' instead of casualties." Now both web sites have been changed.

DOJ:

DOJ Concedes Prosecutorial Misconduct In MA Mob Slaying Case. The Boston Globe (2/2, Murphy)

DOJ_NMG_0126375

reports, "An internal Justice Department investigation concluded that a federal prosecutor in Boston 'engaged in professional misconduct and exercised poor judgment' while prosecuting a federal racketeering case against the hierarchy of the New England Mafia during the early 1990s, according to a letter filed in federal court yesterday." The Globe continues, "In response to a critical letter from the judge who presided over the high-profile case, a Justice Department official wrote back that 'disciplinary action' had been taken against Assistant US Attorney Jeffrey Auerhahn because of his misconduct in prosecuting Mafia capo Vincent Ferrara and mob associate Pasquale Barone. … Chief US District Judge Mark L. Wolf had found three years ago that Auerhahn had withheld evidence in a 1985 gangland slaying. … Yet the internal probe remains shrouded in secrecy as federal authorities, citing employee privacy rights, refused yesterday to detail their findings or disclose what disciplinary action had been taken against Auerhahn, a longtime prosecutor who currently handles counterterrorism cases." The Globe notes, "In a Jan. 23 letter to Wolf , Associate Deputy Attorney General David Margolis wrote that the Justice Department was 'preparing a more detailed response' to an earlier letter from Wolf. … Samantha Martin , a spokeswoman for US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan, citing Department of Justice regulations protecting employees' privacy, said, 'We are prohibited from commenting on any internal personnel matters beyond what is available in the public record.' … Boston lawyer Bernard Grossberg , who represented Barone in the criminal case, said that the government has an obligation to reveal what punishment it meted out to Auerhahn, so that the public can assess whether it was appropriate."

Massachusetts Federal Prosecutor Heading To Main Justice. The Worcester (MA) Telegram & Gazette (2/2, Hammel) reports, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Paul G. Casey will spend the next year in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy in Washington, DC." The T&G continues, "Mr. Casey, 41, has been a prosecutor in the Worcester branch of the U.S. attorney's office since 2002. At the conclusion of his stint at Justice Department headquarters it is expected that he will return to the Worcester office, where he has specialized in prosecuting violent gang members." The T&G adds, "The Office of Legal Policy manages development of a variety of civil and criminal policy initiatives for the attorney general, creation of Justice Department regulations, and the department's role in the confirmation of the president's judicial nominees. Mr. Casey is scheduled to begin his duty Feb. 12 as a senior counsel in Office of Legal Policy. … The U.S. attorney intends to announce a replacement for Mr. Casey, who holds one of two full-time assistant U.S. attorney slots in the Worcester branch. In addition to David H. Hennessy and Mr. Casey, other assistant U.S. attorneys regularly prosecute cases in U.S. District Court here. … Mr. Casey said of his new assignment, 'I'm honored that they asked me.'" The T&G notes, "Son of a Swampscott police officer, Mr. Casey said, 'I like to prosecute violent guys. I think there's a federal interest in keeping the community safe. … In part because of the employment of his father, who died in the early 1990s, he said, 'I've always loved working with police departments.' … That has kept Mr. Casey in the forefront of President Bush's policy, which U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan has vigorously promoted, of expanding the number of criminal cases in federal court, cases that years ago would have been prosecuted in the state courts, where penalties are less severe."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Senate Report Finds SEC Mishandled Pequot Probe. The New York Times (2/2, Bogdanich) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission mishandled its inquiry into suspect trades by a prominent hedge fund, then may have tried to cover up those mistakes after its chief investigator on the case complained, according to an interim Senate report released yesterday." The Times continues, "The report, released by the former chairmen of the Senate Judiciary and Finance Committees, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, also asked the S.E.C. or the Justice Department to consider investigating whether false testimony was given to S.E.C. officials who examined the hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management. … The report did not cite examples of what testimony might have been false." The Times adds, "The two Senate committees began looking into the case in July after the investigator, a commission lawyer named Gary J. Aguirre, said he was fired for complaining that the Pequot investigation had been derailed because of political considerations. … Though the S.E.C.'s handling of the Pequot matter came under fire at Senate hearings last year, yesterday's report provides the strongest condemnation yet of how that investigation was run. … 'At best, the picture shows extraordinarily lax enforcement by the S.E.C.,' Senate investigators concluded. 'At worse, the picture is colored with overtones of a possible cover-up.' … The report strongly suggests that Mr. Aguirre was fired in retaliation for his criticism. At the same time, Senate investigators said they were 'deeply troubled' by the failure of the S.E.C.'s inspector general, Walter J. Stachnik, to investigate Mr. Aguirre's accusations properly. … The S.E.C. should also consider reopening its Pequot investigation, the report states, though it takes no position on whether the fund or anyone connected to it engaged in any wrongdoing. … The S.E.C. closed its inquiry without charging anyone in connection with the Pequot inquiry."

DOJ_NMG_0126376

Investors Sue Dell Alleging Improper Accounting. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A14, Clark, Lawton, Wilke) reports, "Dell Inc., reeling from business problems that led to Wednesday's departure of Chief Executive Kevin Rollins, was accused in an investor lawsuit of improper accounting in its longtime partnership with chip maker Intel Corp." the Journal continues, "The suit, which seeks class-action status on behalf of Dell shareholders, alleges that Dell's profits were inflated by hundreds of millions of dollars in quarterly rebates from Intel that Dell failed to properly account for and disclose. At times, the suit asserts, Dell was receiving as much as $1 billion a year in what the plaintiffs characterize as 'secret and likely illegal' kickbacks by Intel to ensure that Dell use no other chip supplier." The Journal adds, "In a 251-page complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Austin, Texas, the plaintiffs also allege that Dell investors were misled about serious accounting, quality and customer-service problems -- even as Dell executives sold billions of dollars in Dell shares. It accuses Intel of participating in a scheme to defraud Dell investors. … Dell declined to comment on the suit, which was prepared by the law firm of class-action specialist William Lerach. Intel, which has defended the legality of its marketing practices in response to an antitrust suit filed by rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc., flatly denied the allegations, and said it would 'move quickly' to defend itself. … The suit was filed late Wednesday, about the time Dell announced Chairman Michael Dell would resume the CEO position1 in place of Mr. Rollins."

DOJ Probes Siemens For Possible Bribery. The Financial Times (2/2, Milne) reports, "Siemens' problems escalated on Thursday night as Europe's largest engineering group revealed it is under investigation by the US Department of Justice and facing an informal inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission over its €420m bribery scandal." The Times continues, "The DoJ is investigating possible criminal breaches of US law by Siemens while the SEC's enforcement division is conducting an informal inquiry, Siemens said on Thursday night in its first-quarter report." The Times adds, "The probes are a further embarrassing blow to the German group's embattled management, who had sought contact with US authorities soon after the scandal broke to try to contain its impact. … Prosecutors in Munich – alongside several other European counterparts in Italy, Liechtenstein and Greece – are leading the investigation, which has ensnarled several former high-ranking executives and led to allegations against some current top managers." The Times notes, "Siemens, which listed in the US in 2001, said it was co-operating with the DoJ and SEC and had hired an independent law firm, Debevoise, to conduct an independent inquiry into the allegations. The results of the ongoing investigation were available to US authorities, Siemens said. … The nature of the DoJ investigation was unclear on Thursday night but it can, in some circumstances, merely open a file because of a probe abroad by prosecutors. Equally it could be conducting its own enquiries as to whether the company has violated the US's Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, which bars paying bribes in overseas operations."

AOL Case Heads To Jury After Three Months Of Trial. The Washington Post (2/2, D1, Johnson) reports, "An Alexandria jury concluded its first day of deliberations yesterday without reaching a verdict on two former AOL executives accused of conspiring to help a business partner create phony revenue as the Internet boom turned bust in early 2001." The Post continues, "The six-man, six-woman jury began discussing more than three months' worth of evidence yesterday morning after a marathon session of closing arguments that ended hours after the federal courthouse had closed for business Wednesday." The Post adds, "Prosecutors got the last word in one of the longest-running criminal proceedings in the history of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, known as the 'rocket docket' for its speedy and efficient proceedings. Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles F. Connolly urged the jury shortly after 8:30 p.m. Wednesday not to follow defense lawyers' invitation to 'look away from the facts' but instead to remember 'a lesson we all learned from the time we were children: Simply tell the truth.' … Kent D. Wakeford, former vice president of AOL's Business Affairs unit, and John P. Tuli, a former official with AOL's Netbusiness unit, have been charged with helping Las Vegas software maker PurchasePro meet revenue targets in March and April 2001 by lying to auditors and backdating contracts. At the time, both companies were struggling to meet analyst expectations and ultimately resorted to fraud to preserve the illusion of success, prosecutors said. … 'These guys would rather cheat than fail,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Adam Reeves told the jury Tuesday." The Post notes, "U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr., however, has repeatedly pared the scope of the case and the number of criminal charges. Most recently he agreed to cut multiple wire fraud counts against Tuli, Wakeford and former PurchasePro employee Christopher J. Benyo."

LATimes Criticizes Bid To Crack Down On CEO Pay. The Los Angeles Times (2/2, 850K) says in an editorial, "In 1993, outrage over sky-high salaries for corporate chieftains led the Democratically controlled Congress to declare that, unlike other business expenses, salaries above $1 million couldn't be deducted from corporate taxes. The move worked so poorly that the Senate's newly restored Democratic majority is back for an encore." The Clinton-era "rules not only failed to stop executive pay from rising, they promoted a slew of accounting maneuvers — such as stock options and supplemental retirement plans — that made it even harder to discern exactly how much was being paid out. Now the Senate Finance Committee is attempting to crack down on one of those techniques." The "issue here is not the gaudiness of executive salaries but whether the federal government should use the tax code to fight what is essentially a moralistic (and losing) battle. Publicly traded companies will pay what the market bears for top executive talent. Shareholders who object can always sell their stock."

DOJ_NMG_0126377

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Agent Testifies At Libby Trial, Casting Doubt On Libby's Veracity. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/2, Apuzzo) reports, "In a case that hinges on credibility, FBI agent Deborah Bond is making it clear from the witness stand just how believable she finds former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby to be: not very. … Libby told the FBI that he learned about Plame from Vice President Dick Cheney, then forgot about it and was surprised to hear it again from a reporter weeks later. 'He said that?' defense attorney Theodore Wells asked. 'That's what he claimed,' Bond replied. 'He said it,' Wells persisted, prompting an objection that led U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to step in. … Bond didn't flinch: 'He told us that, yes,' she said."

Fox News' Special Report (2/1, Herridge) reported Bond "testified that…Libby told agents that Dick Cheney was his source. … However, according to the prosecution, Libby told the grand jury that he first heard the Plame information from journalist Tim Russert…a full month after Libby said he talked to the Vice President. The question is whether Libby lied or his memory failed him." MSNBC's Hardball (2/1, Shuster) noted that Bond's testimony "was dramatic, and it was all about Vice President Cheney. … This is a huge deal politically, as far as the vice president is concerned. It's also very big deal legally, as far as Scooter Libby is contend, because it's yet another nail in the coffin for prosecutors to show that Scooter Libby had motive to lie about his statements about where he learned information about Valerie Wilson."

Under the headline "Libby Left Out Some Facts In Interviews, FBI Agent Says," the Washington Post (2/2, A8, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "Coming on the seventh day of testimony in Libby's perjury trial, Bond's description of the FBI's two interviews with Libby in his White House office gave jurors their first account of what the prosecution alleges were lies that Cheney's former top aide told investigators to obscure his role in spreading classified information." The Post adds, "During cross-examination, defense attorney Theodore V. Wells Jr. pressed Bond to acknowledge that Libby had said during his first FBI interview that he was very concerned that his memory was bad and that he needed to review his notes to jog it. Wells also questioned the thoroughness of the agent's notes about Libby's account of a third conversation with Miller, on July 12."

Under the headline "F.B.I. Agent Says Libby Denied Being Leak Source," the New York Times (2/2, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "In an intriguing but unexplored exchange with a prosecutor, Peter Zeidenberg, Ms. Bond also said that Mr. Libby had acknowledged in one of the interviews that he might have talked to Mr. Cheney aboard Air Force Two about whether to tell the press about Ms. Wilson as part of the effort to rebut Mr. Wilson's criticisms. The prosecution will resume its case Monday by playing audiotapes of Mr. Libby's testimony before the grand jury in March 2004 to show a similar conflict when he denied discussing Ms. Wilson with reporters."

Jurors See Video Of McClellan Saying Libby "Had Nothing To Do" With Leak. USA Today (2/2, Willing, 2.27M) reports, "Federal Judge Reggie Walton agreed Thursday morning to let prosecutors show video clips of a White House spokesman telling reporters in 2003 that former vice presidential aide Lewis 'Scooter' Libby 'had nothing to do' with leaking information about the wife of a Bush administration critic. … After McClellan spoke, Libby 'couldn't walk back from his story' without risking being fired," Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald argued. "The video clips were "highly prejudicial" to Libby, defense attorney Theodore Wells told Walton," and "Walton agreed to edit questions from the videos in which reporters pressed McClellan on his claims that Libby and two other officials — Karl Rove and Elliot Abrams — 'had nothing to do with the situation.'"

In its story focusing on FBI Special Agent Deborah Bond's testimony yesterday, the Washington Post (2/2, A8, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) notes that before allowing jurors to see the video excerpts, Walton "expressed doubts about defense arguments that Libby was made a scapegoat by the White House in 2003 as the furor over the CIA leak grew. With the jury out of the courtroom…Walton said that argument was undercut by evidence that…McClellan, at Cheney's direction, publicly denied that fall that Libby had any role in leaking information about Plame." Under the headline "Video Undercuts Libby's Defense," the Los Angeles Times (2/2, Schmitt, 850K) also reports that the McClellan video "dealt a blow" to Libby's "contention that he was made a scapegoat to protect White House political strategist Karl Rove." The Times also briefly notes Bond's testimony about Libby's conversation with Cheney about Plame.

Ignatius Says Cheney, Libby Attempted "Cover-Up." In a Washington Post (2/2, 690K) column titled "A Failed Cover-Up," David Ignatius writes, "Why was the White House so nervous in the summer of 2003 about the CIA's reporting on alleged Iraqi attempts to buy uranium from Niger to build a nuclear bomb?" The Libby "trial record suggests a simple answer: The White House was worried that the CIA would reveal that it had been pressured in 2002 and early 2003 to support administration claims about Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, and that in the Niger case, the CIA had tried hard to resist this pressure. The machinations of Cheney, Libby and others were an attempt to weave an alternative narrative that blamed the CIA." After reviewing "the documentary evidence" from the trial, Ignatius concludes, "Let me say it again: This trial is about a cover-up that failed."

DOJ_NMG_0126378

Crackdown On Online Gambling Freezes Funds. USA Today (2/2, Swartz) reports, "The federal crackdown on online gambling has tied up the funds of thousands of U.S. patrons of two of the largest services." USA continues, "The crackdown on BetOnSports, which no longer takes sports wagers from the USA, and Neteller — an Internet payment service popular among gamblers — is intended to put a dent in the $10.6 billion industry. … And it has: Following federal charges against executives from both companies, dozens of the more than 2,300 websites that service online gambling have stopped taking U.S. wagers." USA adds, "Still, the actions against BetOnSports and Neteller have left the online accounts of their U.S. customers frozen until legal issues are resolved. … 'The truth is that the money is in limbo and the companies are not required to refund any money until a successful prosecution or settlement takes place,' says Michael Tew, principal of gaming consultant CapitalHQ. 'This could take years.' Funds from other gambling sites are not tied up, Tew and others say." USA notes, "Most U.S. customers of BetOnSports have been waiting to cash out money in their accounts since July, when a federal grand jury issued a 22-count indictment charging CEO David Carruthers with racketeering, conspiracy and fraud. BetOnSports handled $1.77 billion in bets during its 2005 fiscal year, with more than 90% of wagers from the USA. … Neteller founders Stephen Lawrence and John Lefebvre were arrested in January on a charge of conspiracy to transfer funds with the intent to promote illegal gambling. … Though money-transfer companies such as Neteller do business with financial institutions and merchants, many also allow gambling companies to transfer money collected from U.S. gamblers to bank accounts outside the USA. Neteller last month closed its U.S. Internet gambling services, erasing about two-thirds of its business."

Jury Convicts New York Drug Kingpin Of Rivals' Murder Plot. The AP (2/2, Hays) reports, "A notorious crack kingpin with ties to the hip-hop industry was convicted Thursday in a federal death penalty case for paying $50,000 to have two rivals gunned down in 2001." The AP continues, "A jury deliberated five days before finding Kenneth 'Supreme' McGriff guilty of murder conspiracy and drug dealing. McGriff, who was acquitted on lesser drugs and weapons charges, looked back and smiled at his supporters when the verdict was issued." The AP adds, "In the 1980s, McGriff founded the Supreme Team, a notoriously lucrative and ruthless drug crew that became legendary on the same Queens borough streets that later produced rap stars like Ja Rule and 50 Cent. … The defense claimed that after an earlier prison sentence for drugs, McGriff went straight in the late 1990s and pursued his dream of producing movies and music by teaming with Irv 'Gotti' Lorenzo, a neighborhood friend who headed the successful Murder Inc. record label. … Prosecutors alleged McGriff, 46, instead resumed his drug dealing operations in New York and Baltimore, and used Murder Inc. to launder more than $1 million in proceeds. When a little-known rapper named E-Money Bags shot and killed one of McGriff's friends in a 1999 dispute, the defendant allegedly paid a hit team to kill the rapper and a second man who McGriff feared might retaliate. … 'That man sitting in the courtroom is one of the most dangerous, feared, ruthless gangsters in all of Queens,' prosecutor Carolyn Pokorney said during closing arguments. 'And when Supreme gets in a fight with somebody ... he doesn't go to the cops. He doesn't hire a lawyer. He hires a hit team to assassinate them, to blow them away, so that their moms can barely recognize them when they go down to the morgue.'" The AP notes, "The same jury will return next Tuesday to deliberate the death penalty against McGriff. At the least, McGriff would face a sentence of life in prison without parole. … U.S. District Judge Frederic Block surprised prosecutors last week by asking them to contact U.S. officials and ask them to reconsider their decision to seek a death sentence for McGriff, saying a penalty phase would be an 'absurd' waste of time and money. The prosecutors told him this week the officials had not changed their minds."

The New York Times (2/2, Rashbaum) reports, "Shortly after the verdict was delivered in United States District Court, the mothers of the two victims told reporters in the courthouse hallway that they would be uncomfortable with a death sentence for their sons' killer." The Times adds, "The jury's decision came just two days after a jury in the same courthouse voted in an unrelated case to execute Ronell Wilson, who had been convicted of killing two police detectives. That was the first time a federal death sentence had been handed up in New York in more than 50 years."

Judge Revokes Bail Of Former UN Official Charged With Bribery. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/2, Neumeister) reports, "A judge revoked the bail of a former senior United Nations official and ordered him detained until his trial on bribery charges. Sanjaya Bahel, an Indian diplomat and the former head of the U.N. commodity procurement section, has pleaded not guilty of using his influence to steer contracts worth more than $50 million to a man who rewarded him with valuable real estate. … Bahel had been free on $900,000 bail, but U.S. District Judge Denise L. Cote said that was insufficient to ensure he would appear at trial." The AP adds, "Prosecutors said Bahel was fired from the United Nations last month and no longer was lawfully in the United States. The judge said his immigration status was 'precarious' but not illegal."

DOJ_NMG_0126379

Coke Trial Jury Deadlocked, But Judge Says To Continue Deliberations. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/2, Weber) reports, "A federal jury deliberating the fate of a former Coca-Cola secretary charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage maker in an effort to sell them to Pepsi told a judge Thursday it is unable to make a decision." US District Judge J. Owen Forrester "did not declare a mistrial. Instead, he told the jury to take another crack at reaching a verdict Friday in the case against Joya Williams."

FBI, New Jersey AG Investigating Nonprofit's Land Deal. The Camden Courier-Post (2/2, Walsh) reports, "State and federal investigators are probing a private nonprofit organization run by Randy Primas," former Camden chief executive. "The FBI and the state Attorney General's Office have subpoenaed records related to the Primas-led Camden Redevelopment Corp., according to City Council President Angel Fuentes. The nonprofit paid $1 for six properties in Cramer Hill that had been acquired for $692,000 by a city agency, the Camden Redevelopment Authority, that was also overseen by Primas until late last year." The Courier-Post notes Primas "previously has said the land deal was done to provide affordable housing, and not for personal gain. He said $30,000 in cash obtained as part of the deal was to be used for future audits for the nonprofit group."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/2, Ott, Moroz, 385K) reports, "Another wave of subpoenas from the New Jersey Attorney General's Office and the FBI has landed at the Camden Redevelopment Agency, city officials said yesterday. The subpoenas, delivered Wednesday, were the second batch of requests for documents from the agency in the last four months, amid questions about its relationship to State Sen. Wayne Bryant (D., Camden) as well as its role in the stalled $1.2 billion Cramer Hill Redevelopment Plan, which would have displaced more than 1,000 families."

South Florida Genovese Capo Pleads Guilty To RICO Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/2, Anderson) reports, "The admitted boss of the Genovese organized crime family's South Florida operations pleaded guilty Thursday to federal racketeering charges and could spend 20 years in prison. Renaldi 'Ray' Ruggiero, 73, admitted in a plea agreement that he was a 'capo' in the New York-based Mafia family and supervised a crew that committed numerous crimes including extortion, robbery, money laundering and possession of stolen property." The AP notes, "The guilty plea came after another federal judge rejected Ruggiero's attempt to throw out evidence from more than 12,000 phone calls intercepted on FBI wiretaps and 130 other undercover recordings that provide details about the group's plots and crimes. Four other defendants in the case have also entered guilty pleas to racketeering conspiracy charges, and two others are still pending."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/2, Blum, 237K) reports, "The 29-page indictment detailed a bloody assault against a South Florida businessman in October 2003 that prosecutors said Ruggiero approved. Ruggiero was not present at the beating, which took place in a Coral Springs office, but he later described the attack in a telephone call that was taped by authorities. Ruggiero said his crew 'broke [the victim's] fingers, messed up his other hand, beat him up, and told him if he did not pay him his money by next week, he'll know what to expect.' Ruggiero, who owns a Palm Beach County restaurant called Soprano's, also admitted that he helped launder purported drug proceeds and accepted stolen goods worth more than $100,000 from an undercover agent."

Phoenix FBI Agents Arrest Priest Wanted For Assault In Nevada. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/2, Myers) reports, "A Roman Catholic priest accused of beating and sexually assaulting a female employee at his Las Vegas parish and fleeing to Arizona could soon be extradited to Nevada to face charges, an FBI official said. The Rev. George Chaanine, 52, was arrested without incident Thursday by FBI agents in Apache Junction, about 30 miles east of Phoenix, said Deb McCarley, a spokeswoman for the FBI office in Phoenix." The federal unlawful flight "charge most likely would be dropped so Chaanine can be quickly extradited to Las Vegas, where he is wanted for attempted murder, sexual assault, kidnapping and battery with a deadly weapon, McCarley said." The AP notes, "In a statement from the Roman Catholic Diocese of Las Vegas, Bishop Joseph Pepe praised authorities for finding Chaanine."

Indiana Man Pleads Guilty To Katrina Relief Fraud. The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel/AP (2/1) reported Alan King of Bloomington "pleaded guilty Wednesday to collecting nearly $44,000 in funds meant to help Hurricane Katrina victims and $105,000 in fraudulent student college loans, federal authorities said. … Federal investigators allege King collected 12 government payments totaling $43,972 after claiming he and a family member lived at two addresses in New Orleans and one in Biloxi, Miss., during the hurricane and flood in September 2005."

DOJ_NMG_0126380

Mississippi Women Charged With FEMA Relief Fraud. The Biloxi Sun Herald/AP (2/1) reported, "Two Saucier women are charged with multiple counts alleging they made false statements to the Federal Emergency Management Agency for disaster assistance after Hurricane Katrina. Teresa M. Baumgart and Mandi D. Ely appeared Wednesday before U.S. Magistrate John M. Roper in Gulfport and were released on $25,000 bond each to await arraignment in federal court on Feb. 26." The AP notes, "Indictments…say Baumgart received $6,914 from FEMA in four wire transfers between Sept. 12, 2005, and Feb. 22, 2006, and Ely received $4,358 in wire transfers on Sept. 12, 2005 and Oct. 18, 2005."

Massachusetts Man Sentenced To Four Years In Prison For Defrauding Cisco. The Boston Herald (1/31, Fitzgerald, 184K) reported, "A Pepperell man and former worker at Hanscom Air Force Base was sentenced" Tuesday "to more than four years in prison for scamming Cisco Systems out of more than $4.7 million." Nicholas Stoupis, "who used to work as a military contractor at Hanscom, was also ordered by U.S. Judge Richard G. Stearns to repay Cisco $3.1 million that he stole from the firm by tricking it into sending him products that he resold on the Internet by touting them as used military equipment." The AP (1/31) also reported on the sentencing.

Judge Revokes Bail Of Alleged Pennsylvania Child Pornographer. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/2, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "A federal judge yesterday revoked the bail of a Delaware County woman accused of helping a boyfriend tape a staggering amount of child pornography. Dorothy Prawdzik, 43, had been free on bail pending trial, but was jailed yesterday after authorities alleged that she had not been truthful with investigators, specifically that she failed to tell agents about a sexual encounter with her boyfriend, John Jackey Worman, and a 10-year-old girl." The Inquirer notes, "Worman is accused of taping himself having sex with children of ages from 3 months to 15 years. The FBI said it discovered on Worman's computer 11,000 movies of him having sex with children. In a separate proceeding yesterday, Worman, 39, pleaded not guilty, and U.S. Magistrate Judge Charles Smith ordered him held without bail."

Report Warns Of Increasing Deaths, Imprisonment Of Reporters. The AP (2/2, Yen) reports, "The number of journalists killed or jailed worldwide has reached its highest level in a decade, with arrests rising as governments seek to control the Internet, an advocacy group said Thursday." The AP continues, "The survey by Reporters Without Borders, a media-advocacy group, found that 81 journalists were killed last year and more than 140 are behind bars. It was the worst year for deaths since 1994, which was marked by the Rwandan genocide, civil war in Algeria and conflict in the former Yugoslavia." The AP adds, "In the United States, blogger Josh Wolf was jailed in August after defying a federal judge's order to hand over his video of a protest at an economic summit of the world's industrial powers. Sudanese Al-Jazeera cameraman Sami al-Haj was imprisoned at the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, without charges on suspected al-Qaida links. … 'There has never been a more dangerous time to be a journalist,' said Lucie Morillon, Washington director of Reporters Without Borders. 'But even more deplorable was the lack of interest, and sometimes even the failure, by democratic countries in defending everywhere the values they are supposed to incarnate.'" The AP notes, "The report said many governments seek to gain more control over the Internet, a popular medium for dissent in less democratic countries and a growing source of news in the U.S. … At least 60 people are in prison worldwide for posting criticism of their governments online. … China has been a leader among those countries in installing spyware and demanding that U.S. companies Yahoo Inc., Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Cisco Systems Inc. alter their search-engines to filter out Web sites critical of the government, the report said. … In the U.S., the report said journalists and bloggers' 'freedom of expression' is at risk. It called for laws requiring that telecommunications companies treat all Internet broadband content alike. … Legislation to do that was rejected by the Senate in June, but backers are hopeful that the new Democratic-controlled Congress will change course. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, meanwhile, has said Congress should require Internet providers to preserve customer records as a way to assist prosecutors' investigations into child pornography and possibly terrorism."

Inmate Who Escaped With Official's Wife Is Sentenced. The New York Times (2/2, Blumenthal) reports from Mangum, OK, "A confessed murderer who slipped out of prison with the deputy warden's wife and hid for more than 10 years before being recaptured was sentenced Thursday to the maximum seven years for escaping. … Questioned by prosecutors about details of the relationship, the escapee, Randolph F. Dial, said he could not remember." The Times continues, "The warden's wife, Bobbi Parker, 44, disappeared from the Oklahoma State Reformatory in Granite with Mr. Dial in August 1994. They were discovered living together in a trailer on a chicken farm in East Texas in April 2005. … Mr. Dial, 62, a sculptor, writer and spinner of tales, was shaggily white-haired and bearded when he appeared in state court here in western Oklahoma, telling Judge Richard Darby that heart disease and tumors left him only months to live. … But Judge Darby added seven years for escaping to his previous life sentence for murder and fined him $1,000 plus court costs and restitution, penalties that his public defender said Mr. Dial had no way of paying."

DOJ_NMG_0126381

Mother Reunited With Abducted Boy. The Washington Times (2/2, Wagner) reports from Linthicum, MD, "A young mother arrived on a flight from Missouri yesterday, shedding tears and clutching her toddler, whom authorities said was taken from her home 16 months ago by her boyfriend, a Mexican national. … 'My grandma told me we would never find him,' said Crystal Debrodie, of Jefferson City, Mo., upon being reunited with son Abraham Felipe Monroy, 2, at Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport." The Times continues, "Authorities say Felipe Monroy, of Hyattsville, took the child Sept. 17, 2005. Mr. Monroy was charged with parental kidnapping and was being held in a Prince George's County jail. State police on Monday arrested Mr. Monroy at his most recent residence, in Riverdale. … Miss Debrodie said Mr. Monroy is not the child's biological father and is an illegal alien. Police could not confirm whether Mr. Monroy was the father or his immigration status." The Times adds, "Miss Debrodie's big break came in October when Prince George's County resident Nicole Baldwin became suspicious of the new child and father, who continued to change his story on the whereabouts of the boy's mother. … She eventually found a picture of the boy on the Web site for the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children."

DC Transit Police Cracking Down On Metro Robberies. The Washington Post (2/2, B3, Sun) reports, "The number of robberies throughout the Metro transit system increased more than 6 percent last year, prompting Metro police to form a special unit to capture criminals, officials said yesterday." The Post continues, "The number of robberies in the Metro system rose to 354 last year -- nearly one a day -- from 332 robberies in 2005, according to Metro crime statistics. Riders reported thefts of 32 iPods and 82 cellphones, accounting for a third of all robberies. … Metro Transit Police set up the robbery unit in early December, a time of year when criminals take advantage of longer periods of darkness. Robberies also tend to go up during the holiday season because people carry more cash and packages, officials said." The Post adds, "In less than two months, the special unit has arrested 21 robbery suspects, compared with six robbery arrests in the same period the previous year, according to Transit Police spokeswoman Linda Foxwell. … Police officials declined to say how many officers are in Metro's robbery unit and where they work, because they do not want to reveal their methods. Although their focus is on robberies, they are also performing their other Metro police functions, officials said."

"Failure To Appear" Charges Face Opposition In Connecticut. The New York Times (2/2, Cowan) reports from Norwalk, CT, "Some call the 'failure to appear' charge a prosecutor's best friend because it is relatively easy to prove and can swiftly bring a defendant to the bargaining table. Others see the long-accepted but little-discussed practice of punishing late or absentee defendants as a crutch for overworked judges to maintain decorum and keep criminal cases from clogging their courtrooms." The Times continues, "Now such criminal charges are being challenged in Connecticut, where nearly 1 in 10 of the cases not involving motor vehicles that ended in convictions over the past five years included a conviction for failure to appear. Those found guilty of what could be a procedural misstep can face up to five years in prison." The times adds, "Bringing the issue into the open is the case of Ayanna Khadijah, 34, who was convicted of the felony version of failure to appear after she failed to wake up from a nap and arrived 45 minutes late to court one day in August 2003. Her case is extraordinary because she fought back. … It was the only court date Ms. Khadijah missed among 45 sessions over three years defending herself against a set of drug charges that were eventually dismissed, in 2005. Ms. Khadijah, a single mother with a criminal history, received a suspended three-year sentence on the failure-to-appear charge. … She had spent the day before she was late for court at her job as a community organizer and then delivered newspapers from 1 to 8 a.m. Prosecutors argued that she should have known better than to work all night before a court appearance." The Times notes, "Connecticut's appellate court overturned her conviction last fall after concluding that the inadvertent doze was not a willful shirking of responsibility. But the state is appealing to the State Supreme Court for fear the widely used tool could become harder to wield. … At least 30 states treat failure to appear as a crime that stands alone, according to information in American Law Reports, with most tying the severity of the penalty to the seriousness of the underlying charge. … Statistics on how often such cases are filed or lead to convictions are hard to come by, because the Federal Bureau of Investigation lumps the information it collects into a catch-all bin it calls 'other offenses.'"

Kaine Questions Expansion Of Death Penalty In Virginia. The Washington Post (2/2, B5, Shear, 690K) reports Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, "who ran for office pledging to enforce the death penalty despite his personal opposition, said he has strong reservations about efforts by the General Assembly to expand the crimes that are eligible for capital punishment." Speaking to Washington Post reporters and editors, Kaine "questioned the need for new laws that would allow prosecutors to seek the death penalty for those who are accomplices to murder, such as Washington area sniper John Allen Muhammad, and for people who kill judges." Kaine said, "I do not look at the expansion of the death penalty with a favorable eye. … I would not say that the problem in Virginia is that the death penalty is not applied enough." The Post adds Kaine also "discussed two contentious Northern Virginia issues: his decision to build an aboveground Metrorail line through Tysons Corner, and Dominion Virginia Power's plan to erect a high-voltage transmission line across scenic land in the outer suburbs."

DOJ_NMG_0126382

CIVIL LAW:

FEC To Examine 527 Group Activities. The Washington Post (2/2, A13, Mosk, 690K) reports the Federal Election Commission "said yesterday that it will police '527' groups, political organizations that largely operated outside the new campaign finance limits during the 2004 presidential election, by looking at how the groups word their appeals for contributions, how they describe themselves, and how they spend their money." If the groups "make clear that they are advocating for or against a specific candidate, the FEC would regulate them." FEC Chairman Robert D. Lenhard said, "We're providing clear guidance. This makes it clear that the existing rules will be enforced." The Post adds the FEC "filed the 44-page explanation of its approach in U.S. District Court yesterday in response to a lawsuit challenging the agency's effectiveness in regulating the independent groups."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Suit Claims Pennsylvania Apartments' No-Dog Policy Discriminates Against Blind. The AP (2/2) reports, "The Justice Department filed a lawsuit Thursday against the rental manager and owners of a Lancaster (PA) apartment complex, alleging their rental policies discriminate against the visually impaired." The AP continues, 'The complaint charges that a policy forbidding residents at Barrcrest Manor Apartments to keep dogs violates the federal Fair Housing Act because the landlords were refusing housing to people who use the animals as guides." The AP adds, "Department of Justice officials posing as potential renters conducted the investigation into the complex's policies. … The investigation found the apartments use discriminatory housing practices by 'refusing to make reasonable accommodations in their no-dog policy when such accommodations may be necessary to afford a person with a handicap equal opportunity to use and enjoy a dwelling,' the complaint said." The AP notes, "The suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, seeks to end the policy and asks for compensation for those it affected. … 'The services of guide dogs are essential to individuals with visual impairments,' Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney General for the Civil Rights Division, said in a statement. 'Our fair housing testing program will continue to proactively root out violations of the Fair Housing Act and ensure nondiscriminatory treatment.'"

DOJ Settles Voting Rights Allegations With New Mexico County. The AP (2/2) reports from Grants, NM, "The U.S. Department of Justice has settled voting rights claims against Cibola County (NM). … The department announced Wednesday it had settled allegations that the county violated the Help America Vote Act and the National Voter Registration Act. Those claims had been added to a lawsuit alleging violations of the Voting Rights Act, which originally was filed in 1995, attorney Joe Diaz of Albuquerque, who represented the county, said Thursday." The AP continues, "Justice Department oversight of elections in the county will be extended through 2008 under a consent decree with the county. … The federal agency filed the consent decree Wednesday resolving the lawsuit. It still must be approved by a federal judge. … 'I felt that the county had been complying but the Justice Department felt there were a few problems' that warranted the extension, Diaz said." The AP adds, "American Indians complained that their rights continued to be violated, and county officials agreed to the extension, Diaz said. … Federal law requires counties to hire interpreters and translate ballots and other election material into Indian languages. In the case of Cibola County, officials must provide voter information and assistance in Navajo and Keresan to voters who need it. … The Justice Department alleged the county failed to ensure that valid voter registration applications were processed and added to voter registration lists in a timely manner; that voters' names were not removed from the rolls without cause; and that provisional ballots were offered at elections to voters whose names were not on the voter rolls."

Mississippi Voting Rights Trial To Resume February 15. The AP (2/2) reports from Jackson, MS, "A federal judge has recessed for two weeks the trial of a black Democratic Party official in Noxubee County accused of trying to limit whites' participation in local elections." The AP continues, "Ike Brown, the chairman of the county's Democratic Executive Committee, is accused of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Southern states strictly enforced segregation. It is the first use of the act to allege discrimination against whites. … Noxubee County is a rural area along the Alabama line with a majority black population." The AP adds, "On Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee recessed the trial until Feb. 15, at which time he expects to hear from an elections expert enlisted by the Noxubee County Democrats to counter allegations by a political scientist hired by the U.S. Department of Justice. … Lee, who is hearing the case without a jury, has not indicated when he might rule. … The trial began Jan. 16 in federal court in Jackson." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors want Lee to rule whites' voting rights were violated by Brown and other black Democratic Party officials in the county and to order unlawful practices stopped. … The Democrats' expert - Richard Engstrom - has said Noxubee County whites lose elections simply because they're in the minority. … However, Justice Department expert Theodore Arrington said Brown and his 'political machine' have exploited the election process to ensure blacks control the county."

DOJ_NMG_0126383

Alabama Appeals DOJ Ruling On County Commissioner's Appointment. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (2/2, Murtaugh) reports, "The state has filed an appeal of the U.S. Department of Justice's refusal to approve the appointment of a Mobile County commissioner, calling the decision 'an affront to the state's sovereignty and federalism itself.'" The Press-Register continues, "In a 32-page letter addressed to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez, Alabama Attorney General Troy King laid out his argument that state law should trump federal regulations when it comes to Gov. Bob Riley's 2005 appointment of Mobile County Commissioner Juan Chastang. … The Justice Department's decision 'invites chaos into state governmental functioning,' the letter stated." The Press-Register adds, "Last month, the Justice Department ruled that the appointment violated the federal Voting Rights Act of 1965, saying it 'appears to diminish the opportunity of minority voters to elect a representative of their choice.' … The reasoning was that Chastang's district is majority black, while the governor is elected by a majority-white statewide populace." The Press-Register notes, "Cecil Gardner, the attorney who filed the federal lawsuit challenging the appointment, said the whole point of the Voting Rights Act is to override certain state decisions when they impact minority voters. … A three-judge federal panel in Montgomery is awaiting the result of the state's appeal before deciding whether to strip Chastang of his office and hold a special election to fill it, as the lawsuit filed by three area Democrats is seeking."

Texas Deputy At Center Of Furor Over Convicted Border Agents. The Washington Times (2/2, Seper) reports, "A Texas deputy sheriff who fired shots at a fleeing vehicle after the driver tried to run him down faces 10 years in prison for injuring one of the passengers, a Mexican national being smuggled illegally into the United States." The Times continues, "The U.S. attorney, who won lengthy prison terms last year for two U.S. Border Patrol agents in the shooting of a drug-smuggling suspect, also prosecuted Edwards County Deputy Sheriff Guillermo F. Hernandez, who is to be sentenced next month. … The deputy's boss, Sheriff Donald G. Letsinger, said his officer -- who had been on the job for a year – 'followed the letter of the law' in defending himself in the April 2005 incident and questioned why the government brought charges. … 'This is a fine young man, and I just don't believe he committed the wrong of which he was accused,' Sheriff Letsinger said. 'I have never had anything hurt me so badly as this prosecution. We've got to make this right.'" The Times notes, "Rep. Ted Poe, Texas Republican, called the prosecution and conviction of Hernandez, known to his friends as 'Gilmer,' 'another example of how the federal government is more concerned about people [who are] illegally invading America than it is about the men who protect America.' … 'Once again, our government is on the wrong side of the border war,' Mr. Poe said." The Times notes, "The deputy's Dec. 1 conviction has enraged his hometown of Rocksprings, Texas, population 1,250, where "Free Gilmer" signs have been posted. The Baptist church is paying the deputy's mortgage and others have come up with costs for the family's truck, propane and water bills. … U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton, appointed in October 2001 by President Bush, said Hernandez fired shots at the vehicle as it sped away 'knowing it was occupied with the nine individuals,' at least seven of whom were illegal aliens -- some of whom later were called to testify for the government. … Hernandez was convicted after a jury trial in U.S. District Court in Del Rio, Texas, 75 miles southwest of Rocksprings -- found guilty of violating 'under the color of law' the civil rights of Maricela Rodriguez-Garcia, a Mexican national."

DC Hairdresser Sued For Sexual Harassment. The Washington Post/AP (2/2, C07) reports, "Andre Chreky, a prominent Washington hairdresser who used to cut first lady Laura Bush's locks, is the target of his second sexual harassment lawsuit in a little more than four months." The AP continues, "An ex-employee said Chreky routinely demanded sexual favors, grabbed and touched her and made humiliating comments about her appearance and her husband's sexual prowess. When she rebuffed him, Chreky retaliated by taking away clients, refusing to accommodate her during her pregnancy and ultimately firing her, the plaintiff, Ronnie Barrett, said in the complaint filed in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia." The AP adds, "Lawyers for Chreky and his salon denied Barrett's allegations. Chreky is fighting similar charges by another former employee, Jennifer Thong, who sued in September. … Barrett, who is seeking $4 million in damages from Chreky and his salon, said in a telephone interview with the Associated Press that she didn't leave earlier because of an agreement forbidding her to work at another salon within a radius of five miles for six months after leaving."

DOJ_NMG_0126384

Florida To Abandon Touch-Screen Voting Machines. The New York Times (2/2, Goodnough, Drew, 1.16M) reports Florida Gov. Charlie Crist "announced plans on Thursday to abandon the touch-screen voting machines that many of Florida's counties installed after the disputed 2000 presidential election. The state will instead adopt a system of casting paper ballots counted by scanning machines in time for the 2008 presidential election." Voting experts "said Florida's move, coupled with new federal voting legislation expected to pass this year, could be the death knell for the paperless electronic touch-screen machines. If as expected the Florida Legislature approves the $32.5 million cost of the change, it would be the nation's biggest repudiation yet of touch-screen voting, which was widely embraced after the 2000 recount as a state-of-the-art means of restoring confidence that every vote would count."

55% Say Military Should Let Gays, Lesbians Serve Openly. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, 2.04M) reports a "new poll from Harris Interactive found that 55% of Americans think gays and lesbians should be allowed to serve openly in the military." By comparison, "19% of the 2,337 Americans polled said gays and lesbians should be allowed to serve 'only if they keep their sexual orientation a secret,' and 18% said they should 'not be allowed to serve in the military at all.'" The survey, "conducted online between Jan. 11 and 18, also measured American attitudes toward the U.S. military's 'Don't Ask, Don't tell' policy, which prohibits the military from asking personnel about their sexual orientation, but allows homosexuality to be a cause for discharge from the military." Forty-six percent "said they oppose the policy, unchanged from a Harris poll in 2000, and 36% said they favor the policy, compared with 34% in the previous poll. However, the policy is supported by far more men (43%) than women (29%)."

ANTITRUST:

US Subpoenas PackerKiss Securities In Bond Probe. Bloomberg (2/2, Cataldo) reports, "PackerKiss Securities Inc., the firm that has handled over $49 billion of investment contracts for local governments, received two subpoenas as part of a U.S. criminal probe of bid rigging in the municipal bond market." Bloomberg continues, "The Delray Beach, Florida-based firm disclosed the subpoenas in December as it applied for investment business from the state of New Jersey related to a $3.6 billion sale of bonds backed by tobacco settlement payments. Treasury officials hired Dallas-based First Southwest Co. after reviewing applications from five firms, and released the applications this week. … 'As a registered broker dealer we are required to maintain all the files and records that the subpoena requested,' said Mary Packer, the company's president, in a telephone interview. 'We fully cooperated in supplying these in the full knowledge they were complete and absolute.'" Bloomberg adds, "PackerKiss is among more than a dozen banks, brokers and insurance companies that were subpoenaed in November as part of the widest antitrust probe of the municipal bond market, where more than 10,000 of states, cities and local government authorities have $2.3 trillion of bonds outstanding. … U.S. prosecutors are trying to determine if firms fixed prices on financial products used by local governments to invest bond money until it is needed to pay for projects. State and local governments sold almost $379 billion of debt last year, according to Thomson Financial."

Microsoft Plans To License Instructions In Bid To Pacify EU. The AP (2/2) reports, "In a bid to pacify rivals and antitrust regulators, Microsoft Corp. said Thursday that it will license for the first time a series of instructions to help competitors make software products that work smoothly with its servers." The AP continues, "The licenses cover three sets of instructions, known as protocols, that influence the way instant messages, e-mails, shared documents and other software applications are handled by Windows-based servers. Although the offer falls short of some rivals' earlier demands, Microsoft says it shows a new willingness to cooperate." The AP adds, "EU regulators fined Microsoft in July for failing to submit the 'complete and accurate' data it said was needed for rival server software to work with Microsoft's ubiquitous Windows desktop operating system. … Microsoft has rewritten a technical manual to try to meet EU requirements, but the European Commission has not yet said whether the company has now obeyed the original 2004 antitrust ruling ordering the company to hand over these protocols. … Microsoft claims its offer to license these three protocols marks a new approach in its dealings with rivals and antitrust regulators. In the past, it has largely given access to such information only after regulators demanded it. This time, Microsoft says it is being proactive."

United Airlines CEO Sees Mergers As Still Viable. USA Today (2/2, 3B, Adams) reports, "US Airways' failed hostile bid for Delta Air Lines doesn't kill prospects for other airline mergers, United Airlines CEO Glenn Tilton said Thursday." USA continues, "Speaking one day after the US Airways-Delta deal fell apart, Tilton said the circumstances of a future deal between airlines 'would be different if the two companies and the boards agreed.' … A strong supporter of airline consolidation, Tilton didn't address possible merger partners for his own airline, but argued a friendly merger proposal stands a much better chance of success, though politics and government policies are still potential barriers." USA adds, "He noted that U.S. airlines have lost $35 billion and laid off more than 150,000 workers since the Sept. 11 attacks, and have only recently started to become profitable. Consolidation would produce stronger airlines that could sustain profitability, Tilton argues. … His view on the impact of the failed deal contrasts with that of JPMorgan airline analyst Jamie Baker, who told clients on Thursday that prospects for industry consolidation now have 'ground to a halt.' … US Airways, in mid-November, surprised Delta with its bid to buy it out of Chapter 11 bankruptcy. Delta management vigorously resisted the bid, saying its own plan to emerge from Chapter 11 as an independent airline provides creditors a better deal than US Airways $10 billion stock-and-cash offer."

DOJ_NMG_0126385

ENVIRONMENT:

Report Expected To Heighten Pressure On Governments To Reduce Emissions. The CBS Evening News (2/1, story 8, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The world's leading scientists will release their highly anticipated study on global warming tomorrow, and the news is not good." CBS (Phillips) added, "The grim report to be issued [in Paris] tomorrow by the world's top climate scientists is expected to go further than ever before in laying the blame for global warming on human activity." Phillips: "In the same way as the US took a long time to accept the realities of global warming and its human causes, the Bush Administration is now stressing a very different response to most countries in how to respond to it." The US "is counting on future science. It's funding a study to see if millions of reflective plates launched into space and positioned between the earth and the sun could reflect enough energy away to limit the warming, a giant space sunscreen that even the man studying it says is a hugely expensive, desperate idea." Pressure on the US to reduce greenhouse gases "will continue to rise, just like the temperature of the planet."

The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A4, Naik, Ball, 2.04M) says the report, to be published today by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, "is expected to increase pressure on governments and companies to reduce fossil-fuel emissions." A summary of the report "is expected to assert that human activity is 'very likely' the cause of a global-warming trend in recent decades. It comes as governments and some of the world's biggest companies are wrestling with a big challenge: how to apportion among companies and consumers the economic pain that is expected from significantly curbing fossil-fuel emissions." The "document doesn't contain prescriptions for action, though its conclusions will inform the debate about how to respond to climate change." EPA Administrator Steve Johnson "hailed the IPCC report, saying, 'Although many of the findings contained in the report are not new, they are a reflection of increased certainty of observed trends and heightened reliability of climate [computer] model predictions. This is very helpful and useful to us.'"

USA Today (2/2, 6A, O'Driscoll, 2.27M) reports, "Numerous scientists who had seen previous drafts or participated in the global project have told USA TODAY and other news agencies in recent days that the report foresees worse heat waves and droughts, more powerful storms, heavier rain and gradually rising sea levels as temperatures rise and polar ice continues to melt." The "White House said it would review the report. 'The president has long said that humans are playing a role in global warming, and he's put forward programs to address it,' White House spokesman Tony Fratto said."

The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Maugh, 850K) reports the panel says warming "has become a runaway train that cannot be stopped. The warming of Earth and increases in sea level 'would continue for centuries ... even if greenhouse gas concentrations were to be stabilized," according to a 20-page summary of the report that was leaked to wire services.'" The Times adds, "Many scientists had argued during the editing process that the report should say it is a "virtually certain" that human activities are causing global warming. That would indicate a 99% certainty. But the change was strongly resisted by China, among other nations, because of its reliance on fossil fuels to help build its economy."

USA Today Urges US To Confront Global Warming. In an editorial, USA Today (2/2, 8A, 2.27M) writes that today's report "makes the most compelling case yet that global warming is real, man-made and a threat to the planet. It should have the steadily dwindling group of global-warming naysayers melting away faster than the polar ice caps." The "political climate for change appears to be improving, perhaps radically, despite the cost. ... Even President Bush, a longtime skeptic, mentioned global warming in his most recent State of the Union address." States "have started responding out of frustration at the mismatch between federal inaction and the severity of the problem." The US "has always confronted its most serious problems, whether winning wars or taking on environmental threats. There is no reason it can't do so now with global warming."

Cato Scholar Warns Against Wasting Billions In Futile Attempt To Curb Warming. In a USA Today (2/2, 8A,

DOJ_NMG_0126386

2.27M) op-ed, reports, Patrick J. Michaels of the Cato Institute writes, "Climatically, Kyoto would do nothing." The "stark reality is that if we really want to alter the warming trajectory of the planet significantly, we have to cut emissions by an extremely large amount, and -- a truth that everyone must know -- we simply do not have the technology to do so. We would fritter away billions in precious investment capital in a futile attempt to curtail warming." The "best policy is to live with some modest climate change now and encourage economic development, which will generate the capital necessary for investment in the more efficient technologies of the future." Instead of "burning our capital now for no environmental gain (did someone say 'ethanol?'), let's encourage economic development so people can invest and profit in our more efficient future."

Judge Mulls Release Of Material From Rocky Flats Grand Jury. The AP (2/2, Sarche) reports from Denver, "A federal judge said Thursday he wants to release as much information as the law allows from a grand jury investigation of alleged environmental crimes at the former Rocky Flats nuclear weapons plant. … But U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch said a federal appeals court that instructed him to consider what could be released 'cast us adrift in uncharted waters.'" The AP continues, "Matsch asked for guidance from attorneys for former grand jurors who want to publicize alleged misconduct by prosecutors and from government attorneys who argue none of the information can be released. … Matsch had ruled in March 2004 that grand jury secrecy rules prevented the release of testimony transcripts and other documents that 18 of the 23 former grand jurors want the public to see. He also had ruled that he didn't have the authority to release material that might not be covered by those rules." The AP adds, "The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last year reversed that ruling and sent the case back to Matsch, instructing him to determine what could be released. … In a hearing Thursday, government attorneys told Matsch they believed the materials cannot be released. Matsch gave them a month to file supporting arguments, saying the Colorado U.S. attorney's office should consult with Justice Department officials in Washington because the outcome of the case could affect how the agency conducts grand jury investigations in the future. … Matsch also said he wanted both sides to determine how best to notify the prosecutors who worked with the grand jury that some of the information could be released. … 'These allegations being made against counsel are very serious, and the allegations being made against the Department of Justice are very serious,' Matsch said."

CDC Issues Guidelines For Battling Flu Pandemics. The Washington Post (2/2, A3, Brown, 690K) reports the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention issued guidelines for battling flu pandemics yesterday afternoon, as noted in yesterday's briefing. The guidelines recommend that states "be prepared to keep children out of school for three months," and businesses "should be prepared to operate with skeleton workforces, children should be prepared to play mostly with their siblings, and parents should be prepared to lose income as they skip work." The 106-page document also outlines "'non-pharmaceutical interventions' against a virus that can sometimes be caught simply by standing near an infected person. The chief strategy is to keep people physically apart as much as possible during the eight-to-10-week-long waves of illness." Moreover, "states and metropolitan areas would decide when to invoke various measures, such as, closing schools and banning concerts and sporting events." But the guidance "did not suggest restricting travel. Its authors believe that if a pandemic's effects can be blunted or spread out over time, the essential functions of the economy may be able to continue largely unchanged." "'We don't expect we would be able to protect everybody,' the CDC's director, Julie L. Gerberding, said at a news conference" in Washington, D.C.

The AP (2/2, Stobbe) reports that "Federal officials say they don't expect a vaccine will be available" for a pandemic virus "until at least six months into a pandemic" and "on Thursday, Mr. Leavitt granted companies protection from lawsuits for vaccines against the bird flu virus." Under Leavitt's declaration, "all H5N1 vaccines developed through a grant, contract or cooperative agreement would be protected through all production stages from testing to use. The protection would run through February 2010." The Journal notes that "although the U.S. government has enough medicine for more than 22 million people, it's not clear that they will work against whatever virus emerges, and it's doubtful that will be enough if many of America's 300-million residents become ill."

The New York Times (2/2, McNeil, 1.16M) reports that while "[h]ealth officials acknowledged that such [flu pandemic] measures would hugely disrupt public life," they "argued that these measure would buy the time needed to produce vaccines and would save lives because flu viruses attack in waves lasting about two months." Dr. Martin Cetron, director of global migration and quarantine for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, in releasing the guidelines, said, "We have to be prepared for a Category 5 pandemic. It's not easy. The only thing that's harder is facing the consequences. That will be intolerable."

Army Corps Releases Locations Of 122 Substandard Levees. USA Today (2/2, 1A, Eisler, 2.27M) reports on its front page that the Army Corps of Engineers bowed "to demands from news organizations"

DOJ_NMG_0126387

Thursday and "revealed the locations…of 122 levees nationwide that are so poorly maintained they could fail in a major flood. Some of the substandard levees protect densely populated areas, such as Springfield, Mass., Albuquerque and Sacramento. Many others are in rural areas, where they shield valuable farmland but relatively few people." Maj. Gen. Don Riley, director of civil works for the corps, "said communities have one year to fix the problems." USA Today adds, "Some local officials first learned of the problems this week, after USA TODAY reported Monday that the corps had found 146 levees with problems so severe that floods could overwhelm them. The corps, which inspects about 2,000 levees nationally, refused at that time to list the specific levees."

ABC World News (2/1, story 6, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In most communities, the strength and solidity of…levees are taken for granted. … Today, a new report says 122 levees all around the nation are in danger of failing, and the report says government at all levels has been lax in maintaining the flood walls." ABC (Stark) added, "This list may be the tip of the iceberg. There are other levees also in trouble for structural problems. Local officials are pleading for federal dollars to help."

The New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) reports, "In most cases, the corps built the levees and handed them over to local communities to maintain them. The new assessment inevitably misses many local levees whose owners have not tried to meet federal standards and would not have been counted, General Riley said. There is more work to be done, he said, adding, 'It is a concern.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Drug Kingpin Sentenced To 40 Years. The AP (2/2) reports from Tampa, FL, "A Colombian drug kingpin was sentenced to 40 years in prison Thursday and must forfeit $110 million, authorities said." The AP continues, "Joaquin Mario Valencia-Trujillo, 49, was sentenced in federal court after being convicted in October on trafficking and money laundering charges, the Justice Department said. … Valencia-Trujillo was arrested in Bogota, Colombia, in January 2003 and later extradited to Florida. He was arrested on charges of conspiracy to import cocaine, conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine and conspiracy to engage in money laundering." The AP adds, "During his trial, Valencia-Trujillo was described as the supplier of over 100 tons of cocaine annually to the United States since the early 1990s until his arrest. … 'The Valencia-Trujillo case serves as another example of the cooperation and commitment of the United States and Colombia to the counterdrug effort,' said U.S. Attorney Paul I. Perez. 'The human misery and societal cost for which this defendant is responsible immeasurable. The punishment is well-deserved and long overdue.'"

"Operation Dawg Pound" Targets Bloods Gang In New Jersey. The New York Times (2/2, Kocieniewski) reports police on Thursday "arrested 20 members of a street gang that is accused of widespread drug dealing and gun violence in Trenton and central New Jersey. Col. Joseph R. Fuentes, the New Jersey State Police superintendent, said the organization, a faction of the Bloods who referred to themselves as 'Money, Sex, Murder,' are considered the state's most violent youth gang and are believed to have been involved in as many as 19 of the 31 homicides in Trenton in 2005."

The AP (2/2) reports, "Five-hundred packets of heroin, a half-kilo of cocaine, nine weapons and $80,000 in cash were seized in the raids. … Numerous federal, state and local police agencies were involved in the raids, known collectively as Operation Dawg Pound. The nickname was taken from the gang's own references to its members and because gang members wore a trademark tattoo of a dog's paw print." Newsday, WINS Radio in New York, and the Carlisle Pennsylvania Sentinel are among the news outlets that used the AP story.

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/2) reports, "Most of those arrested were charged with racketeering and drug trafficking. Two of the leaders of the Monmouth County gang were also charged with conspiracy to commit murder. … County and local police, the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration, and the state police took part in yesterday's action. In addition to the arrests, authorities seized three pounds of cocaine, one-half kilogram of crack cocaine, 500 packets of heroin ready for street sale, $100,000 in cash, and nine weapons, including a loaded Mac-11 submachine pistol."

The Trenton (NJ) Times (2/2) reports, "By the time state Attorney General Stuart Rabner announced the probe in the afternoon, officers had apprehended 15 people and served charges against six gangsters who were already behind bars on other charges. Eleven of the suspects are from Trenton's branch of the gang."

Neptune, New Jersey's Asbury Park Press (2/1) reported state, federal and local law enforcement officials "arrested 17 adults in a new offensive against the Bloods street gang. Operation Dawg Pound targeted the gang's presence in central New Jersey — predominantly in Mercer, Monmouth and Ocean counties. Charges included conspiracy to commit murder, racketeering, distribution of CDS, and transfer of weapons."

The Cherry Hill (NJ) Courier-Post (2/1) reported the raids "were similar to a gang takedown in July in which more than 60 members of the Nine Tre Gangsters were arrested in cities across the state, including four gang leaders who authorities said were directing gang activities from inside state prison."

DOJ_NMG_0126388

The Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger (2/2, Hepp) reports authorities yesterday "arrested 17 suspected leaders of a violent street gang that has kept a stranglehold on vast areas of central New Jersey by employing a volatile mixture of guns and drugs. More than 300 federal, state and local law enforcement officers fanned out in the early morning hours to dismantle two chapters of the Sex Money Murder street gang. … [Bobby] Williams…was charged yesterday by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents for selling $3,000 worth of crack cocaine on two separate occasions to an undercover informant."

On its Web site, WPVI-TV, Philadelphia (2/1) reports, "Among those arrested…at locations in Hamilton, Trenton, Bucks, Monmouth and Ocean Counties was 27-year-old Antonio Merritt of Trenton - identified as the leader of Sex Money Murder, which is a sub set of the Bloods street gang. After a gang-shooting spree last Spring that left fifteen wounded in five days, including 7-year-old Tajanique Lee, the Sex Money Murder set was identified as the biggest threat statewide and to the Trenton community."

WABC-TV, New York (2/2) reports on its Web site that state police "say this is a major assault on the 'Bloods' street gang, which have become notorious across the state for drug activity and gun violence."

Federal Officials' Handling Of Afghan "Drug Lord" Case Scrutinized. The New York Times (2/2, Risen) reports that in April 2005, federal law enforcement officials "summoned reporters to a Manhattan news conference to announce the capture of an Afghan drug lord and Taliban ally. While boasting that he was a big catch...the officials left out some puzzling details, including why the Afghan, Haji Bashir Noorzai, had risked arrest by coming to New York. Now, with Mr. Noorzai's case likely to come to trial this year, a fuller story about the American government's dealings with him is emerging. … In fighting the war on terrorism, government officials have often accepted trade-offs in developing relationships with informants with questionable backgrounds who might prove useful. As with Mr. Noorzai, it is often not clear whether the benefits outweigh the costs." The Times adds, "Federal prosecutors in New York handling Mr. Noorzai's case refused to comment for this article, as did spokesmen for the Drug Enforcement Administration, Central Intelligence Agency and United States Central Command."

St. Kitts Man Gets 11-Year Sentence In Cocaine-Smuggling Case. The Sun St. Kitts/Nevis (2/1) reported that in about 11 years, Glenroy "Bobo" Matthew "could be released from a U.S. federal prison to be reunited with his family in St. Kitts. Earlier this week, Matthew was sentenced by U.S. District Court Judge K. Michael Moore to spend 135 months behind bars, to be followed by five years of supervised release. The punishment was handed down on Monday, three months after he pleaded guilty to conspiring to import cocaine into the United States." The case "was the result of a joint ICE and DEA investigation of AmeriJet International employees who were using the freight air carrier to smuggle cocaine into Miami from various Carribean Islands. Matthew was the exclusive agent for AmeriJet on the island of St. Kitts."

Georgia Man Faces Attempted Murder Charges Following Drug Investigation In New York. The AP (2/2) reports a drug suspect from Georgia "was charged Thursday with attempting to murder federal agents who were investigating reports of drug activity inside a Buffalo hotel room. A federal indictment alleges that Camara Griffin of Atlanta stuck a loaded pistol into a hallway Jan. 11 at the downtown Comfort Inn and pulled the trigger after three Drug Enforcement Administration agents arrived at a room where hotel staff had reported smelling marijuana and seeing what appeared to be crack cocaine. … The agents closed the hotel room door and after a few minutes talked [Colin] Greenaway and Griffin into surrendering, Assistant U.S. Attorney Timothy Lynch said. Investigators found one ejected .40-caliber round in the room." Georgia's Columbus Ledger-Enquirer and WSTM-TV in Syracuse used the AP story.

Former Maryland Teacher Gets 6-Year Sentence In Meth Case. The Columbia (MD) Flier (2/1) reported a former River Hill High School social studies teacher "was sentenced in January to six and a-half years in federal prison for a scheme to sell $50,000 worth of the drug methamphetamine. On Jan. 19, U.S. District Court Judge Andre Davis sentenced Timothy Hartlove to 78 months in prison followed by three years of supervised release. Hartlove, who taught social studies at River Hill from 2001 to September 2005, was arrested in September 2005 during a joint investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and Maryland State Police."

ATF, FBI Probing Similar Bombs Found In Kansas City, Chicago. The Kansas City Star (2/2, Morris) reports, "Federal agents on Thursday investigated whether similar bombs, each accompanied by a note and found a day apart in Kansas City and Chicago, were connected." The Star continues, "Authorities disarmed an explosive device in a downtown Chicago business Thursday afternoon, said Wanda Shipp, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Postal Inspection Service. … It resembled a pipe bomb found Wednesday morning in a Kansas City investment company's mail facility, she said." The Star adds, "A threatening note accompanied the Kansas City bomb. The device in Illinois also was accompanied by a note, though Shipp would not characterize it as 'threatening.' … The close timing of the discoveries was worrisome. Typically, postal inspectors investigate only a few instances of explosive devices sent through the mail each year, according to the agency's annual reports. One exception was 2004, when inspectors chased down 21 incendiary letters that a Nevada prisoner sent to state officials." The Star notes, "Bomb squads from the Chicago Police Department and agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives defused the bomb, Shipp said. No one was injured. … Postal Inspector Don Obritsch said investigators from his agency, the FBI and ATF were aggressively pursuing leads."

DOJ_NMG_0126389

13 In San Diego Charged With Weapons Violations In "Operation Colt .45." The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/2, Soto, 324K) reports, "Eight gang members and five other men who sold weapons to a man posing as an illegal-gun dealer but who was working on behalf of federal authorities were charged with weapons violations Thursday. … They are scheduled to appear Friday in San Diego federal court, and could face prison sentences of up to 10 years. The arrests came as a result of a 9-month undercover operation that focused on buying guns from gang members in San Diego, Spring Valley and Lemon Grove, said Dan Dzwilewski, head of the FBI's San Diego office. 'San Diego gang members routinely buy and sell firearms as a commodity,' he said, noting several of the guns had been stolen in other states." The Union-Tribune notes, "The investigation was called 'Operation Colt .45' and included the FBI, San Diego Sheriff's Department, San Diego Police Department and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives."

Connecticut Gun Dealer Pleads Guilty To Federal Violation. The Connecticut Post (2/2, Mayko) reports from Bridgeport, KT, "Frank D'Andrea leaned against a wall outside a federal courtroom, nervously tried to manage a smile before saying, 'I'm glad it's over.' … With one word – 'guilty' -- D'Andrea, 62, of Soundview Drive, Shelton, ended his 36-year career as a federally licensed firearms dealer who operated stores in Bridgeport, Stratford and Milford." The Post continues, "Come April 20, D'Andrea faces anywhere from 37 to 46 months in prison and a $10,000 fine when U.S. District Judge Janet C. Hall sentences him for possessing a unregistered explosive device. … The device — a .12 gauge Cobra shotgun with a motorized barrel called a Streetsweeper — was found behind an office during an April 2005 audit conducted at the Stratford store by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosive Devices. … But that charge was only one of 12 in a federal indictment returned last spring against the gun dealer. In December, Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Reynolds vowed to go back before the grand jury and indict D'Andrea on more charges if a plea-bargain deal was not worked out." The Post adds, "Over the years, D'Andrea, a frequent critic of stronger gun laws, was no stranger to the ATF. They cited him in 1998 for record-keeping violations and issued him warning letters for similar problems in 2000 and 2001. … Yet, they also sought his help as a witness in some federal prosecutions. … It wasn't until U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor stepped in with his Project Safe Neighborhoods program that D'Andrea was prosecuted."

ATF Gang Probe Leads To Drug Charges Against Two In Washington. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (2/2, Gutierrez) reports, "Two men, including a suspected gang member, have been indicted as part of a federal investigation that netted 14 pounds of cocaine worth about $100,000, federal officials announced Wednesday." The P-I continues, "Federal prosecutors say that one defendant is a member of the Norteno street gang. The mostly Hispanic gang is rooted in California but has extended its presence and illicit drug dealing into Washington, primarily in the Yakima Valley, U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Sullivan said. … The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' Violent Gang Task Force led the investigation." The P-I adds, "This wasn't one of the larger recent drug busts, but federal officials used the arrests to showcase work of the task force, which includes investigators from Seattle police and the King County Sheriff's Office. … 'Anytime you take that much dope off the street it's going to have significant impact on the distribution level in the city. Maybe short term, but it's still going to have an impact,' said Special Agent Kelvin Crenshaw, who supervises the ATF's Seattle office." The P-I notes, "The defendants were identified as Edward Martinez, 21, of Yakima and Cody Higgenbotham, 20, of South King County. Both men are being held in the Federal Detention Center in SeaTac. They were indicted this week on cocaine distribution charges and are scheduled to be arraigned Feb. 8 in U.S. District Court."

IMMIGRATION:

Judge Rules Louisiana Law Banning Illegal Immigrants From Driving Unconstitutional. The AP (2/2) reports from Gretna, LA, "A state law requiring drivers from other countries to prove they are in the United States legally has been ruled unconstitutional." The AP continues, "In a decision handed down late Wednesday, State District Judge Jo Ellen Grant said the law, passed by state lawmakers as an anti-terrorism measure in 2002, illegally steps on federal immigration law. … The ruling applies only in Jefferson Parish. A similar challenge is pending in neighboring New Orleans." The AP adds, "The judge threw out the state's case against Omar Barrientos, who was stopped by police last March for having an expired license plate. At the time, he was carrying somebody else's Texas identification card, authorities said. … Under the law, any 'alien student' or 'nonresident alien' who drives in Louisiana must carry documents proving they are in the United States legally. Violators face up to a year in jail and a $1,000. … The law also requires state authorities to report violators to the federal Immigration and Naturalization Service." The AP notes, "Grant said the definition of 'alien student' or 'nonresident alien' was different from that contained in federal law. The identification requirement 'exceeds the standard contemplated by federal immigration law,' the judge wrote. … Melissa Crow, an attorney with the National Immigration Law Center who argued against the law, said the legislative history of the law's passage showed its intended purpose was to stop the use of fraudulent driver's licenses. However, most people booked with the offense do not have licenses, she said."

DOJ_NMG_0126390

Texas Immigration Raid Nets 53 Arrests. The AP (2/2) reports, "Federal agents arrested 53 suspected illegal immigrants Wednesday after raiding a trash collection plant, officials said." The AP continues, "U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said those arrested at the Republic Services Inc. plant near Houston face deportation. Many of the immigrants are from El Salvador, Mexico, Honduras and Nicaragua." The AP adds, "Agents detained workers hired through temporary agencies, said Will Flower, a spokesman for the Fort Lauderdale, Fla.-based company. The company has no oversight on how the temporary staffing agencies that provide workers to Republic comply with federal regulations, he said. … The company has yet to learn why some workers were arrested, Flower said." The AP notes, "Wednesday's raid is the latest in a string of immigration arrests in recent months, including nearly 1,300 in meatpacking plants in six states in December, and more than 750 in metropolitan Los Angeles last week."

Martinez Endorses Guest-Worker Measure. The Washington Times (2/2, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida, the Republican National Committee's new general chairman, wants Congress to pass an immigration bill this year that will include a guest-worker program with 'earned citizenship' requirements for illegal aliens." Martinez, "whose election encountered sharp opposition from some RNC members who think his support for giving illegal aliens a path to citizenship is a thinly veiled form of amnesty, said, 'I don't support deporting these people because I don't believe that's a realistic approach.'" In an interview with The Washington Times, he "acknowledged the opposition to his election and his support for the Kennedy-McCain bill that called for a multistep process of earned amnesty for all but the most recent illegals. But he said, 'My views on immigration are not well understood.'" Added Martinez, "I did support Kennedy-McCain. I did vote for that, but I had some amendments to that bill that made it, I think, more conservative. We need border security and strong assimilation. I voted for the 700-mile fence on the border. I'm a strong advocate of these things. … But I don't wake up every morning worrying about the issue. It's an important issue. It needs to be dealt with. But I don't have some agenda here."

End Of Catch And Release Said To Have Placed Strain On Immigrant Detention System. In a front page article, the Washington Post (2/2, A1, Hsu, Moreno, 690K) reports the "futuristic tent city" in Raymondville, Texas, built "to keep pace with Washington's increasing demand for stronger enforcement of immigration laws." It "marks both the success and the limits of the government's new policy of holding captured non-Mexicans until they are sent home." The change "has led to a dramatic decline in border crossings by non-Mexicans, according to the US Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency. But civil liberties and immigration law groups allege that out of sight, the system is bursting at the seams," with detainees "confined 23 hours a day in windowless tents made of a Kevlar-like material, often with insufficient food, clothing, medical care and access to telephones. … Gary Mead, assistant director of ICE detention and removal operations, said the agency is proud of its record, calling Raymondville 'a modern, clean facility' that meets federal standards – 'which we believe are among the highest you'll find anywhere.'"

TAX:

Protective Order Granted In Nebraska Tax Case. The North Platte (NE) Telegraph (2/2, Lindenberger) reports that attorneys representing "Lowell Baisden have been granted a protective order preventing the U.S. Justice Department from using depositions of Burt McKeag, Evan Geilenkirchen and Jane Geilenkirchen, all of North Platte." The Telegraph continues, "Baisden, the California accountant who has been accused of tax fraud, was to appear in U.S. District Court on Feb. 8 for a hearing to determine whether to grant the Justice Department's request for a preliminary injunction. On Tuesday, that hearing was continued to March 2 due to the court's heavy caseload." The Telegraph adds, "The Justice Department claims Baisden has been promoting an illegal tax avoidance scheme to many of his clients. Among his current and former clients are seven North Platte health care practitioners. … Those who were scheduled to appear for depositions last week are all former clients of Baisden's who have hired new accountants to re-file their tax returns and correct the information reported by Baisden." The Telegraph notes, "Prior court documents have stated that McKeag consulted a new accountant in 2003 to prepare an amended return and correct the false information Baisden had reported on his 2002 tax return. … The Geilenkirchens have also re-filed the tax returns prepared by Baisden and filed their own lawsuit against the accountant, seeking damages for the interest and penalties that have been assessed against them by the IRS."

DOJ_NMG_0126391

Judge Rejects Tax Shelter Once Sold By KPMG. The New York Times (2/2, Browning) reports, "A federal judge in Texas has ruled that a widely used aggressive tax shelter was based on fake bank loans and is therefore not legitimate, giving an unexpected boost to federal prosecutors overseeing a widening criminal investigation into tax shelters." The Times continues, "The shelter, known as Blips, plays a central role in the criminal inquiry of Deutsche Bank over questionable tax shelters and in the pending criminal trial in federal court in Manhattan of 16 former employees of the accounting firm KPMG and two outsiders." The Times adds, "The civil ruling on Tuesday by Judge T. John Ward of Federal District Court for the Eastern District of Texas will probably add ammunition to Manhattan prosecutors' arguments that Deutsche Bank acted improperly by providing fake loans for Blips and similar shelters. Judge Ware's is the first major civil ruling on the legitimacy of Blips, or bond-linked issue premium structure. … It is also likely to bolster prosecutors' case against certain KPMG defendants who are also named in the judge's ruling. They are John Larson, Robert Pfaff and David Amir Makov, all former employees of an investment firm called Presidio Advisory Services, now defunct. According to previously disclosed internal Deutsche Bank documents, Blips was created and sold primarily by Deutsche Bank, KPMG and Presidio." The Times notes, "Judge Ward's ruling is also notable in that it absolves of any guilt two wealthy Texas investors who bought Blips. The investors were Harold W. Nix and C. Cary Patterson, two lawyers on a legal team that earned sizable fees for winning a $17 billion tobacco settlement for Texas in 1998. … Mr. Nix and Mr. Patterson sued the Internal Revenue Service after it disallowed their claims for around $25 million each in losses stemming from Blips on their federal tax returns from 2000 through 2002. … Judge Ward ruled that both investors must pay the taxes they owe, but that they were not liable for multimillion-dollar penalties stemming from their use of Blips."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Seek $70 Billion Savings From Medicare, Medicaid. The New York Times (2/2, Pear, 1.16M) reports President Bush will "ask Congress in his budget next week to squeeze more than $70 billion of savings from Medicare and Medicaid over the next five years, administration officials and health care lobbyists said Thursday." The proposals, "part of a White House plan to balance the budget by 2012, set the stage for a battle with Congress over entitlement spending. Even some administration officials say they cannot imagine approval of such large cutbacks in a Congress now controlled by Democrats." Bush is "also expected to propose changes in the Children's Health Insurance Program to sharpen its focus on low-income families. The changes could reduce federal payments to states that cover children with family incomes exceeding twice the poverty level."

Bush To Propose Large Boost In Pell Grants. The Washington Post (2/2, A5, Paley, 690K) reports, "The Bush administration yesterday proposed boosting the nation's main financial aid program for low-income college students by the largest amount in more than three decades, the latest in a flurry of measures this week by Congress and the White House to make higher education more affordable." U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings announced during a speech at North Carolina State University in Raleigh yesterday the proposed increase in the maximum Pell grant by $550 to $4,600. In response, "advocates for students hailed the proposed expansion" but "cautioned that it would be meaningless if offset by cuts to other federal aid programs." Massachusetts Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D) said that "he welcomed the change but criticized Bush and fellow Republicans for failing to increase the Pell grant in recent years."

The New York Times (2/2, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "Ms. Spellings's announcement suggests that the administration will try to emphasize access to education, an issue that Democrats have seized upon as the cost and debt burden of higher education continue to rise. Democrats have already proposed legislation in the Senate that, exceeding the administration's plan, calls for an increase to $5,100."

The Washington Times (2/2, Fagan, 88K) reports the administration is proposing to "increase the grants to $5,400 over five years, the largest five-year increase ever." The plan is expected to "meet with skepticism from some conservatives who say the government already is pouring an exorbitant amount of money into higher education. But the government has been under pressure to help more because rising college costs are making it increasingly difficult for some to attend college."

DOJ_NMG_0126392

The AP (2/2, Pope) reports, "Education advocates warned that they're unsure how the increase would be funded, and caution it could come at the expense of other financial aid programs." Spellings said that it "would be paid for with increased revenues and 'efficiencies' that she declined to specify, saying details would be released with the president's budget announcement Monday." While, Sen. Kennedy said the proposal "shows how a Democratic Congress is changing the nation's priorities," "increasing Pell grants was a key recommendation of Spellings' national Commission on the Future of Higher Education."

Portman Defends Bush Budget Plans. In a New York Times letter to the editor (2/2), Office of Management and Budget director Rob Portman says, "In 'The Budget Illusion' (editorial, Jan. 28), regarding the president's balanced budget proposal, you correctly focus on the need for honest budgeting and consistency. On Monday, we will present a budget that uses realistic assumptions to reduce deficits each year and achieve balance by 2012. The editorial specifically warns against 'pie in the sky' revenue assumptions. I believe that the revenue projections provided by the career professionals at the Treasury Department will be viewed as credible, even cautious."

Labor Department Official's Email Highlights Budget's "Weaknesses." In the Washington Post's "In The Loop" column (2/2, A13), Al Kamen says, "Federal agencies are putting the final touches on the administration's fiscal 2008 budget, due out Monday, checking the numbers and preparing to do battle with the Democrats over priorities and programs." David James, 'an aide to Labor Secretary Elaine Chao, sent an e-mail Wednesday to various Labor and White House officials titled 'DOL Budget Highlights and Low-Lights for . . . Budget Roll-Out.'" One "part of the e-mail highlighted 'Vulnerabilities/Democrat Attacks.' One budget proposal is to 'consolidate and streamline' four training programs, the e-mail said, but 'Democrats portray this as simply a cut on worker training' and oppose it." Another proposal "calls for 'a reduction in the budget' for the Bureau of International Labor Affairs and having 'other federal entities' take over the bureau's 'grant-making function.' 'This will be attacked as neglecting international child labor programs,' James's e-mail said."

"Emergency" Bill Expected To Include Unneeded Spending. USA Today (2/2, Yaukey, 2.27M) reports the Bush Administration next week "is expected to send Congress what could be one of the largest supplemental spending requests in history — $100 billion or more, primarily for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan." The spending bill is "supposed to cover basic costs, including personnel, equipment repairs and replacement, ammunition and other directly related operating expenses not covered by the Pentagon's regular annual budget for fiscal year 2007." But military budget analysts "and tax watchdogs say if the past is any indicator, the Pentagon and the Congress will try to load this off-budget shopping cart with expensive new weapons and pork for the voters that has nothing to do with defense or any of the disaster relief that emergency spending bills sometimes fund as well."

Democrats Put Imprint On 2007 Spending Measure. The Christian Science Monitor (2/2, Chaddock, 59K) reports after "blitzing six top-priority bills through the House in their first 100 legislative hours, Democrats struck a quick deal on unfinished spending bills from the last Congress, and made it look easy." It is the "first test of whether the new majority on Capitol Hill can keep promises to voters to rein in federal budget deficits, yet also fund its party's defining priorities." In a "bid to move quickly, House Democrats precooked a master compromise with the Senate Wednesday that rolls all nine remaining spending bills into one. The deal accepts the White House ceiling of $463.5 billion, avoiding a clash with Mr. Bush. But it carves out some $10 billion for 'unmet needs,' including veterans' healthcare, low-income housing, education, and some 500 research programs." In "Washington terms, $10 billion is not much in a spending cycle that totals more than $2 trillion. But it sends a strong signal, reinforcing what Democrats say will be a key issue in the 2008 election campaign: their commitment to help the middle class." Their "targets for new spending include: $3.6 billion for veterans' healthcare, a $260 increase to the maximum Pell grant for some 5.3 million college students, $3.5 billion for federal highways, $1.4 billion for low-income housing, as well as new funds for low-performing schools, Head Start, special education, the National Institutes of Health, law enforcement, and global HIV/AIDS prevention."

OMB Deputy Director Suggests There Has Been Too Little Congressional Oversight. The AP (2/2, Ben Feller) reports, "A White House management official said Thursday there is 'very little real accountability' in the federal government, and he welcomed the tougher oversight the Democrats have promised now that they control Congress. 'There cannot be enough accountability in the federal government,' said Clay Johnson, deputy director of the Office and Management and Budget, which supervises executive branch agencies. 'There is very little today. Very little real accountability.'" However, "Johnson challenged Democratic lawmakers to help solve problems -- not just hold hearings about them." He also "said Democrats can expect candor and cooperation."

DOJ_NMG_0126393

OMB Wants Agency Employees To Make Federal Programs More Effective. Under the headline, "A Tale Of Mice Illustrates How To Save Money," the Washington Post's (2/2, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "For an example of how federal employees can make a difference," OMB "offered up the story of feeder mice. When the Interior Department began looking for budget savings, the staff at the Chickasaw National Recreation Area took a look at the time and money they spent on raising mice to feed to reptiles and birds of prey at the Oklahoma refuge. They calculated that they could save $15,000 a year by buying mice from vendors, and they now have more money available for their nature trails." Clay Johnson called the "feeder mice 'my favorite example' of how a group of federal employees can be given budget data and asked to sort out spending that is essential and spending that indirectly supports an operation. In the Chickasaw case, raising mice turned out to not be all that important." The OMB "wants to focus on making strides in the effectiveness of federal programs over the next two years, after spending much of the past six years urging agencies to improve internal management techniques and practices." The Post adds, "Federal employees are key to making programs more effective, Johnson said."

Bush Approval Edges Up To 38% In Fox News Poll. Fox News' Special Report (2/1, Hume) reported, "The latest Fox News/Opinion Dynamics Poll finds Americans feeling slightly more favorable about President Bush. His job approval rating rose to 38 percent, that's from 35 percent just two weeks ago. Not great, but better. Congress, however, seems to still be in the doghouse with Americans; 33 percent now approve of the job Congress is doing, about the same as those asked in mid January."

Bush Says Cheney Optimistic, Not Out Of Touch. In the Washington Post's "In The Loop" column (2/2, A13), Al Kamen says, "Vice President Cheney has taken a pounding in the biased liberal media for touting the 'enormous successes' in Iraq. He's been called 'a little crazy,' 'crazy as a loon,' 'a compulsive liar' and 'deranged.'" But President Bush, "who knows Cheney far better than his critics do, says nothing could be further from the truth. Cheney, in fact, is 'a person reflecting a half-glass-full mentality,' which translated into English means he sees the glass half-full, not half-empty." Bush, "making the media rounds in a State of the Union follow-up, also lamented the nastiness of the nation's capital. 'And there is distrust in Washington,' he told NPR's Juan Williams on Monday. 'I am surprised, frankly, at the amount of distrust that exists in this town. And I'm sorry it's the case, and I'll work hard to try to elevate it.'"

Senate Passes Minimum Wage Hike With Business Tax Cuts. The CBS Evening News (2/1, story 2, :20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The country's lowest paid workers may finally be get a raise. The Senate voted today to increase the Federal minimum wage for the first time in a decade. The jump from the current $5.15 an hour to $7.25 would be phased in over two years. The House has also voted for a wage hike, but the Senate bill includes some controversial tax provisions and it may take months to work out a compromise." The NBC Nightly News (2/1, story 5, :30, Williams, 9.87M) noted the Senate "linked the wage hike to tax cuts for small businesses. … The two houses have to agree on a final version before anything can be sent to the President."

USA Today (2/2, 5A, 2.27M) reports the Senate tally was 94-3, and says Majority Leader Harry Reid "raised the possibility that the Senate negotiators may agree to demands from Democrats in the House of Representatives that the tax breaks be stripped from the bill that eventually gets sent to…Bush." The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A4, Lueck, 2.04M) also notes Reid "questioned whether 'we need all these business pieces of sugar' in the legislation. Rep. Richard Durbin (D., Ill.), the assistant majority leader, said a minimum-wage increase could emerge from a House-Senate conference without the tax breaks. 'If we go through the process and go through a conference and the message comes back, "You can have the minimum wage stripped down or not at all," then we'll face another vote,' Mr. Durbin said. 'We need Republicans to pass it. If they continue to oppose it, then it will not pass.'"

The New York Times (2/2, Zernike, 1.16M), however, reports that although Reid "said in a meeting with reporters early Thursday that he thought the Senate might approve a clean bill if the House sent it back for another try," his office "later said that he did not believe the vote count had changed and that he expected that the differences could be worked out in negotiations."

The AP (2/2, Kuhnhenn) says "the wage hike has both real and symbolic consequences. It would be one of the first major legislative successes of the new Democratic-controlled Congress." Now "the measure presents a challenge to Democrats who must navigate between the demands of labor and other interest groups and the realities of the Senate, where Republicans hold 49 of 100 votes. House and Senate Democrats now must try to negotiate a way out of the potential standoff." House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "has said she supports some tax provisions in the House package, but said she would prefer them in a separate, House-initiated tax bill." In a statement, President Bush "encouraged House Democrats to accept the Senate version of the bill. 'The Senate has taken a step toward helping maintain a strong and dynamic labor market and promoting continued economic growth,' Bush said." But "AFL-CIO President John Sweeney vowed to 'turn up the volume' to pass a bill without tax breaks." The three senators voting against the bill were Republicans "Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, Jon Kyl of Arizona and Jim DeMint of South Carolina."

DOJ_NMG_0126394

The Washington Post (2/2, D1, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "As approved by the Senate, the bill would extend several business tax deductions and credits, including one that allows small businesses to accelerate deductions for new purchases." It "would extend for five years a tax credit for employers who hire welfare recipients and 'high-risk youth' and expand the provision to include disabled military veterans. To cover the costs of those provisions, the bill would close loopholes used by corporations that do business overseas and increase penalties for tax evasion. It would also place new restrictions on one of the most popular perquisites in corporate America by forbidding executives from deferring more than $1 million in pay every year and placing the money in tax-deferred accounts. Anyone who exceeded the allowable amount would be forced to pay taxes on all income deferred since Dec. 31, 2006, plus a 20 percent penalty." McClatchy (2/2, Talev) notes Sen. Ted Kennedy, "the liberal icon who's long championed a minimum-wage increase, said the GOP tax package is one of the 'least offensive' possible because it includes incentives for hiring minorities and disadvantaged Americans."

The Washington Times (2/2, Miller, 88K) reports "Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, has demanded a "clean" minimum-wage bill identical to the House version. … Ways and Means Committee spokesman Matthew Beck said Republicans were 'holding hostage' the wage increase."

Minimum Wage Hike Seen As Not Enough To Help Poor. In a Washington Post op-ed (2/2, A15), former Clinton adviser Thomas Z. Freedman says the US should "raise the minimum wage while committing our country to a bigger bargain: If you work full time, then you and your family will live above the poverty line. This goal is not only morally right but one our country can afford." On its own, "the minimum wage is an imperfect means for ensuring no full-time worker is poor. First, it almost certainly will not be raised enough." It would "take a wage of $10 an hour for a worker to earn $20,000 a year, about the poverty threshold for a family of four. Second, there are reasonable arguments that a $10 minimum wage would harm many small businesses. Finally, increases in the minimum wage are not indexed for inflation -- and may never be." A "better approach would be to increase the wage and simultaneously expand the earned-income tax credit (EITC)."

Bush Says Healthful Diet Is Individual, Not Government Responsibility. The Washington Post (2/2, A5, Abramowitz, 690K) reports "President Bush yesterday added his voice to the growing debate over childhood obesity, as he met at the White House with representatives of some of the companies considered responsible for aggravating the problem and urged them to stress the importance of healthful eating and physical fitness in their marketing campaigns." However, "[a]s described by those present, the meeting was cordial" but "the president signaled no intent to pursue more aggressive policies favored by some consumer groups, such as, banning the marketing of junk food to children or requiring more detailed nutritional labeling." Bush told the "executives that it is an individual's responsibility to maintain a healthful diet, not the government's."

USA Today/AP (2/2) also covers the Bush meeting, noting that "more than 10-million school-age children in the US -- about 18% -- are now considered overweight. The percentage of overweight children tripled among adolescents during the past 25 years, and nearly doubled for children ages 6 to 12." The New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) also carries the AP story.

Democrats Rescue Bush Global Health Package. The New York Times (2/2, Dugger, 1.16M) reports, "At a time of intensifying conflict between President Bush and Democrats in Congress over the Iraq war, the Democratic-led House acted this week to rescue another of Mr. Bush's international priorities: the global fight against AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis, diseases that kill millions of Africans each year. That Democrats stepped in to champion Mr. Bush's signature global health undertakings suggests the deepening of political support for foreign aid programs, especially those that quickly demonstrate they can save hundreds of thousands of lives. It also bucks a historical pattern of declining support for foreign assistance when control of Congress and the White House is divided between Democrats and Republicans."

Bush Administration To Give Vaccine Companies Immunity From Avian Flu Suits. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A12, Zhang, 2.04M) reports, "The Bush administration triggered a provision of a 2005 law that gives companies protection from product-liability lawsuits for vaccines or drugs they produce in connection with the avian-flu strain. The law, enacted 13 months ago, gives the Secretary of Health and Human Services the power to grant immunity to vaccine makers in the event of a risk to public health." HHS invoked the clause last week in a directive that cited "a credible risk that an avian influenza virus spreads and evolves into a strain capable of causing a pandemic of human influenza."

DOJ_NMG_0126395

FDA Reform Proposals Contain "Bitter Pills" For Pharmaceutical Companies. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Mathews, 2.04M) reports, that "big reforms" Congress may pass for the FDA "could produce some bitter pills for the pharmaceutical industry: potentially, tougher safety rules and provisions to reduce the cost of medicines." The Journal continues, "Yesterday, Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Sen. Michael Enzi of Wyoming, the chairman and ranking Republican of the health committee, respectively, introduced legislation that would give the FDA new authority to impose safety requirements on medicines once they go on the market, including restrictions on consumer advertising." The Journal adds, "Proposals to beef up regulation have stalled before, often due to skepticism from Republican allies of the industry. This year is likely to be different. Democrats aren't reluctant to give expanded authority to federal regulators and see the drug industry as a tempting target because of its tenuous popularity with consumers and its traditional ties to Republicans."

Congress Moves Quickly On Children's Health Insurance Program. The AP (2/2, Freking) reports that while Congress probably will take its time in considering President Bush's plan for expanding health insurance coverage," it is "moving more quickly to renew" the State Children's Health Insurance Program, "a program that now provides coverage to 6 million people, mostly children," and expires Sept. 30. The AP continues, "When Congress approved the program in 1997, it provided $40 billion over 10 years. States use the money, along with their own dollars, to subsidize health coverage for families with incomes too high to qualify for Medicaid but too low to afford insurance through the private sector."

Senate Democrats Urge Stricter FCC Rule Enforcement. The New York Times (2/2, Labaton, 1.16M) reports, "Signaling tougher oversight, Democrats who recently gained control of the Senate urged the head of the Federal Communications Commission on Thursday to take a more aggressive approach to the industries he oversees." In his first appearance before the Senate Commerce Committee under Democratic leadership, Kevin J. Martin, the FCC chairman, "and the other commissioners faced sharp criticism from some senior senators on the handling of the recent acquisition of BellSouth by AT&T." Lawmakers also "questioned the commission's practice of renewing broadcast licenses of radio and television stations with virtually no review." The Times adds "the aggressive questioning by the panel's senior Democrats -- including its chairman, Daniel K. Inouye of Hawaii; John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia; Byron L. Dorgan of North Dakota; and Barbara Boxer of California -- suggested that the senators would be applying significant pressure on the policy-making apparatus of the commission."

The Washington Post (2/2, D2, Babington, 690K) reports "several Democrats on the Senate Commerce Committee warned the agency not to try to relax limits on the number of media outlets one company can own, as the FCC did in 2003 only to have a federal court stay the action. Recent FCC policies on media ownership," said Dorgan, have been "a spectacular failure." Dorgan "railed against rules that allow one entity to own eight radio stations in a large city and against proposals to allow one owner to have three TV stations in a city."

USA Today (2/2, Davidson, 2.27M) notes Martin "faced tough questions from a Senate panel Thursday over his comments that he would not enforce a key condition the FCC imposed before approving of the AT&T-BellSouth merger." Inouye the chairman "did not intend to 'stand by the deal' and that he was obliged to withhold his vote and negotiate further if he had concerns about any of the conditions." The Washington Times/Cox News Service (2/2) runs a similar story.

Frank To Push For Data Privacy Laws. The Washington Post (2/2, D3, Krebs, 690K) reports, "Data privacy is likely to be among the hottest technology issues to face Congress this year, in part due to interest" from House Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank, who says "he plans to craft a bill that would exempt companies from disclosing data breaches, provided they secure the data with encryption software or other technology that would render it virtually unreadable if it fell into the wrong hands. Frank also said he wants retailers to be held more accountable for data breaches. … While some major corporations -- most recently Microsoft -- have expressed support for some kind of federal consumer privacy law to govern how companies can use, combine and trade consumer data, the effort to produce baseline privacy protections for consumers may set off contentious policy debates, said Fred von Lohmann, a senior staff attorney with the Electronic Frontier Foundation."

Two More Lawmakers Criticize Baca, But Don't Resign From Hispanic Caucus. The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Simon, 850K) reports, "The Congressional Hispanic Caucus was thrown into turmoil Thursday after Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Santa Ana) resigned her membership amid accusations that its chairman, Rep. Joe Baca (D-Rialto), had been demeaning to women. Two of the remaining five women in the 21-member caucus expressed concerns about how the group treated them, but did not resign." Rep. Hilda L. Solis "complained about the 'lack of respect afforded to women members of the Hispanic Caucus.'" And Rep. Linda T. Sanchez "stood by her sister and fellow congresswoman, saying: 'I am waiting to see whether the Hispanic Caucus leadership will make good on its promise to be more fair and inclusive of Latina members.'" On Wednesday, Loretta Sanchez "told the Politico, a new Capitol Hill newspaper, that Baca had called her a 'whore.'" Baca "denied the charges Thursday, saying, 'These accusations are categorically untrue.'" This morning, The Politico (2/2) notes that in a statement, Baca said Sanchez "has decided to resign from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus…and has chosen to air baseless statements."

DOJ_NMG_0126396

The AP (2/2, Werner) reports, "Baca was supported by only one of six women in the 21-member caucus when he was elected chairman in November." Solis, Loretta Sanchez and her sister, Linda, and Rep. Nydia Velazquez "subsequently disputed the election procedure and asked for a new secret-ballot vote. All caucus members are Democrats." The AP adds, "Other concerns include Baca's decision to use money from the caucus' political action committee to fund his sons' unsuccessful campaigns for state office in California last year. That led Solis, the Sanchez sisters and three other lawmakers to sever ties with the fundraising groups."

NYTimes Calls For More Protection For Federal Judges. The New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "One of the more refreshing changes in Congress's mind-set growing out of the November election is that the House is no longer led by Republicans who demonize judges for sport. This change to more judge-friendly leadership should, at long last, lead to the House's joining the Senate in passing a much-needed bill to protect federal judges from physical attack."

OTHER NEWS:

Bush, Democrats Painting Dramatically Different Economic Pictures. The AP (2/2, Raum) reports, "The booming economy that President Bush paints is a far cry from the worrisome one increasingly portrayed by Democratic presidential candidates and party leaders. To them, there are worker insecurities, stagnant wage growth and soaring costs for health care and college. The vision of rival economies already is a main issue for the 2008 presidential and congressional races. Economists say both sides are right -- and wrong. It just depends on what numbers you summon." The AP adds, "Bolstering Bush's outlook was a new Commerce Department report showing that the economy gained speed in the final three months of 2006. The economy grew at an annual rate of 3.5 percent, much faster than the 2 percent increase of the previous three months. Stocks soared after that report and after the Federal Reserve's decision to leave interest rates steady. But hold on." Presidential candidates John Edwards and Barack Obama have argued the country is seeing an increasing "rich-poor" divide. Obama has "cited 'skyrocketing health care bills,' lost pensions and struggles to pay for college." Also, "the cutback in building has led to thousands of layoffs in the construction industry, Democrats note."

Strength of Job Market Led Fed To Decide Against Rates Cuts. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, C1, Hilsenrath, 2.04M) reports, "Lots of investors expected interest-rate cuts early this year. But one part of the economy refused to cooperate: the job market. Economic output seemed to slow in mid-2006, but the job market remained healthy. Government surveys of businesses showed jobs grew at a respectable clip of around 150,000 a month. Surveys of households showed they grew even faster." The unemployment rate "fell to 4.5% in December from 4.9% in December 2005. And the performance was all the more remarkable because the labor force grew faster than it had in six years, meaning more to employ." In a story titled "Fed's Inflation Dilemma," the Wall Street Journal (2/2, A2, Ip, 2.04M) also examines the debate inside the Fed about "an explicit target for inflation," in which some prefer "an implicit, or 'soft' target." The debate "reflects Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke's belief that the central bank needs to develop a clearer, more systematic way of communicating its intentions to the public, to lessen the chance of any market-jolting surprises. Currently, the Fed's…doesn't specify what rate or range of inflation it thinks would fulfill that goal."

Americans Have A Negative Savings Rate. ABC World News (2/1, story 4, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was a revealing and some might say alarming report about what Americans are doing with their paychecks. They now have a negative savings rate. They spent 1% more last year than they earned. That represents the lowest personal savings rate since the great depression. Betsy Stark joins us now. It sounds frightening when you say Americans are spending more than they earn." The CBS Evening News (2/1, lead story, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) said, "There is no way around it, we Americans are addicted, addicted to spending. And we're spending more than we're earning."

Dow Soars To New Record. NBC Nightly News (2/1, story 6, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York today, another record close for blue chip stocks. The Dow gained just under 52 points [to close at 12,673.68] on this day to finish at a new record of 12, 673 at the close. NASDAQ was up more than 4 points [to close at 2,468.38] on the day." The Washington Post/AP (2/2, D5) notes the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "rose 7.70, or 0.54 percent, to 1445.94." The Wall Street Journal (2/2, C1, McKay, 2.04M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock numbers.

Manufacturing Activity Down In January. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A2, Conkey, 2.04M) reports, "Dogged by excess inventory, the nation's manufacturers cut back production in January, suggesting the sector will continue to weigh on economic growth a while longer." The Institute for Supply Management "said yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity fell to 49.3 last month from 51.4 in December. Figures below 50 indicate a contraction; for the past four months the index has averaged 50.5. The recent readings have pointed to a stagnating manufacturing sector that continues to be held back by weakness in the housing and automobile industries." The slowdown "follows a four-year growth spurt in the manufacturing sector." The Financial Times (2/2, Callan), taking a more negative view, says "the US manufacturing sector contracted unexpectedly this month as factory activity fell to its slowest pace in nearly three years, according to a fresh survey. … The poor performance underlined economists' fears that the sector could be sliding into recession."

DOJ_NMG_0126397

GOP Fundraising Slow Since Election Defeat. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column this morning, "Fund raising for Bush's party slows after elections, complicating efforts to retire House Republicans' $14.4 million debt. Senate Republican committee -- criticized within the party for lackluster campaign -- has $1.3 million debt. Republican National Committee ends 2006 with $3.1 million cash, compared with Democrats' $3.7 million."

Sharpton Grills Biden Over Remarks On Obama. The AP (2/2, Fouhy) reports, "Civil rights activist Al Sharpton on Thursday took Sen. Joe Biden to task for calling Democratic rival Sen. Barack Obama 'articulate' and 'clean,' questioning how the description reflects on other blacks." Biden "spent his first day as an official presidential candidate Wednesday explaining his statement that Obama is 'the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean.' Speaking "by telephone on Sharpton's radio show,'" Biden "told Sharpton he regretted the comments and said he hadn't meant to disparage other blacks who had run for president in the past, including Sharpton," and the Rev. Jesse Jackson. However, "Sharpton told Biden: 'A lot of people took it from you that because [Obama] is Harvard-trained, that people don't see someone as good and clean unless they are less connected to the struggle of the African-American community.' Sharpton also compared the gaffe to former Virginia Sen. George Allen's use of a racial slur against an Indian-American man last summer -- a controversy that was widely believed to have cost Allen re-election. 'George Allen got 'macaca' -- this might be a step past that,' Sharpton warned. Biden responded by lavishing praise on Sharpton, saying he and Jackson were the most articulate people in the country."

Of Remarks On Obama, Biden Says He "Was Complementing A Colleague." On MSNBC's Hardball (2/1, Matthews), host Chris Matthews asked Sen. Joe Biden about his remark that Sen. Barack Obama is "the first mainstream African-American who's articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy." Biden said, "I wasn't making a historical statement. I was trying to complement a colleague. I was complementing a colleague." Biden added, "There's not a single politician in either party who wouldn't like to be positioned where he is at this point. That was the point I was making when I said he's clean -- what I meant to say was fresh, that he was new, he's exciting."

Robinson Sees Racial Overtones In Use Of "Articulate" To Describe Obama, Other Blacks. In his column in the Washington Post (2/2, A15, 690K) Eugene Robinson weighs in on the controversy surrounding Biden's comments, writing, "For my part, I never made it past 'articulate,' a word that's like fingernails on a blackboard to my ear. As it happens, President Bush used that same word Wednesday to describe Obama. 'He's an attractive guy. He's articulate,' Bush told Fox News. Will wonders never cease? Here we have a man who graduated from Columbia University, who was president of the Harvard Law Review, who serves in the U.S. Senate and is the author of two best-selling books, who's a leading contender for the Democratic presidential nomination, and what do you know, he turns out to be articulate. Stop the presses." Robinson adds, "Articulate is really a shorthand way of describing a black person who isn't too black -- or, rather, who comports with white America's notion of how a black person should come across. Whatever the intention, expressing one's astonishment that such individuals exist is no compliment. Just come out and say it: Gee, he doesn't sound black at all."

On MSNBC's Hardball (2/1, Matthews), Eugene Robinson said he thought Sen. Biden meant "not articulate in being eloquent, but articulate -- what do white people mean when they call black people articulate? This is a -- this is a -- this is something I have always wanted to know. It seems to me that it means: Kind of like us. Talks kind of like us. Gives off the right kind of social cues of -- of being one of us. It's used for Barack Obama. It's used for Condi Rice. It's not used for Jesse Jackson. It's not used for Al Sharpton, even though they are both eloquent speakers."

Morris Criticizes Biden's Comments. On Fox's "The O'Reilly Factor" (2/1, O'Reilly), Dick Morris said, "Every political grave has to have a tombstone with an epitaph on it and this would be his. Actually his second epitaph. There was one in '88. I think that gaffes like this only are important if people believe that, despite the denials, it reveals a window into the politician's real thinking. … At a certain level, Biden was reflecting the establishment opinion of white politicians on Capitol Hill, which I do not share, which is to disparage the African-American members, to say that there's a lot of corruption, that there's a lot of cronyism, and to -- to say that they really -- there really hasn't been a clean, articulate, bright black to emerge on the national stage. I think it's wrong."

DOJ_NMG_0126398

Obama's Multicultural Background A Sticking Point For Some African-Americans. The New York Times (2/2, Swarns, 1.16M) reports, "He is hailed by his supporters as the hope of an increasingly multicultural nation, a political phenomenon who can wow white voters while carrying the aspirations of African-Americans all the way to the White House. So why are some black voters so uneasy about Senator Barack Obama? The black author and essayist Debra J. Dickerson recently declared that 'Obama isn't black' in an American racial context. Some polls suggest that Mr. Obama trails" New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "in the battle for African-American support." Obama "is the American-born son of a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas." And "many pollsters and analysts believe Mr. Obama's life story of growing up in Hawaii and Indonesia with his mother and his maternal grandparents and of his struggle to define his own racial identity will resonate with voters across ethnic and color lines." But "Obama's melting pot background…remains profoundly unsettling for some blacks who argue that he is distant from the struggles and cultural identities of most black Americans. The black columnist Stanley Crouch has said, 'When black Americans refer to Obama as 'one of us,' I do not know what they are talking about." And Dickerson said, "His father was African. His mother was a white woman. He grew up with white grandparents. … He married black. He acts black. But there's a lot of distance between black Africans and African-Americans."

Clinton Asking Top Donors To Raise At Least $1 Million. The New York Times (2/2, Healy, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports that New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "is establishing record-setting goals for presidential campaign fund-raising, her advisers say, asking donors to raise at least $1 million for the honor of being in her top echelon of supporters. That million-dollar benchmark is 10 times the amount that President Bush's 'Pioneers' were expected to raise in his 2000 race; at that time, the Pioneers' $100,000 goal was considered sizable. Clinton advisers said the new fund-raising levels, laid out in meetings of finance team members this week, would help achieve their goal of raising $75 million in 2007. At least $15 million is expected from New York, Mrs. Clinton's home base, the advisers said." the Times notes, "Several Clinton fund-raisers said in interviews that they expected dozens of donors to reach the tier of $500,000 -- in part because of the star power at their disposal. The campaign has lined up surrogates for Mrs. Clinton at Democratic fund-raisers around the country; among them are former President Bill Clinton and a senior campaign adviser, Ann Lewis. 'It will be almost impossible for any other candidate to raise the money that the Clintons can raise,' said John Catsimatidis, a New York fund-raiser for Mrs. Clinton."

Morris Says Clinton Would Raise Taxes, Reintroduce Healthcare Plan. On Fox's "The Big Story Will John Gibson" (2/1, Gibson), Dick Morris said, "I think that" Rudy Giuliani "is the only Republican candidate that could really defeat" Hillary Clinton. Morris continued, "The first three things that I think Hillary will do as president are raise taxes, and by that I mean repeal the income tax cuts and the Bush package, certainly for the top and maybe for the middle bracket. It's going to go back up to 39 or 40 percent that her husband put it at. I think she repeals the capital gains tax cut. I think that she cancels the attempts to take down the estate tax. And she will have a Democratic majority with her that will make it possible for her to pass it. Secondly, I think she changes welfare reform so she makes things like job training and going to school and answering a matchbook ad for a truck driver school acceptable alternatives to employment to get welfare benefits, ruining the program. And thirdly, I think she reintroduces her health care plan that she has never repudiated. But this time it passes because the Fortune 500 companies will get behind it because they want to get rid of the health care burden."

Simon Says Edwards Emphasizing Sacrifice To Demonstrate Authenticity. On MSNBC's "Tucker" (2/1), Roger Simon of The Politico said, "John Edwards is stressing sacrifice as his way of showing he is authentic. He's not doing the political expedient thing. He's not promising not to raise taxes. He is promising, in fact, that gasoline is going to cost more under his presidency, we're going to have to pay more for universal healthcare under his presidency, and that Americans are going to have to sacrifice to eradicate poverty in America in our lifetimes. That's all very tough stuff. And people, when you interview them in crowds after a speech, they all say, I want to be asked to sacrifice for my country. And they always mention John F. Kennedy. And I think he is going for that constituency."

McCain, Giuliani No-Shows At Some Conservative Events. The Politico (2/2, Martin) reports, "A speech given by former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney before a National Review-sponsored conference last week may have been panned as unfocused, but in the eyes of those who attended, he at least had one thing going for him: He showed up. Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, both of whom face serious skepticism from many conservatives, skipped the National Review event, and neither plans to attend a gathering of the Republican Study Committee, a group of conservative House members, this weekend in Baltimore." Meanwhile, "Romney, who is aggressively seeking the favor of conservative leaders, is on the schedule to address the RSC on Friday. In March, he is scheduled to speak at the Club for Growth's winter conference in Florida and to appear before the annual Conservative Political Action Conference in Washington. David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union and one of the chief organizers of CPAC, said his group hadn't heard back yet from either McCain or Giuliani about whether they'll be at the three-day meeting, which starts March 1. 'I frankly don't get it,' Keene shrugged in an interview Wednesday. 'On the one hand,' he said, McCain has been 'trying to court the right, but on the other, he seems to be dissing them.'"

DOJ_NMG_0126399

Giuliani Tops McCain In Fox News Poll. Fox News' Special Report (2/1, Hume) reported that in the 2008 presidential campaign, the latest Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll shows that "among Republicans, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani holds a commanding lead, with 34 percent, followed by Senator John McCain at 22, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich with 15. Among Democrats, Hillary Rodham Clinton draws 43 percent. Senator Barack Obama trails her with only 15 percent. And former Senator John Edwards gets support from 12 percent of those whom we asked. The rest, you can see, well back."

Pawlenty Praises McCain. The Politico (2/2, patch) reports that Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty (R) "said Thursday that his fellow partisans must regroup after a bruising 2006 election cycle and decide between ideological purity and electability in the 2008 contest -- a not-so-veiled plea for conservatives to take a fresh look at Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz. 'The marketplace just told Republicans something,'" Pawlenty said, adding, "It told them that we are choosing for now to select the products and services of your opponent.'" Speaking "with reporters at the Washington offices of lobbying firm Clark & Weinstock, Pawlenty," who is serving as Minnesota co-chair of McCain's presidential exploratory panel, "took pains to avoid negative comments about fellow Republicans and focus the conversations on what he views as McCain's pluses. 'I believe he's in a league of his own,' he said. … Pawlenty acknowledged that there are concerns among conservatives about whether McCain's record is 'sufficiently conservative.' Pawlenty's comeback: 'If you hold any of these candidates to a purity litmus test, with the possible exception of [Kansas Sen.] Sam Brownback, we'll have nobody left,' Pawlenty said."

California Primary Change Could Prove Detrimental To McCain. The Washington Times (2/2, Hallow, 88K) reports, "Arizona Sen. John McCain's presidential aspirations stand to suffer a stunning setback if California Republicans carry out a plan to move part of their nomination process up from June to Feb. 5 next year. 'If the California Republican Party approves this idea, it may benefit candidates other than Senator John McCain,'" said Orange County state Assemblyman Chuck DeVore. The plan "backed by Mr. DeVore, an influential conservative activist, calls for the 1,600 members of the state Republican Central Committee to select at least 53 of their 165 delegates to the 2008 Republican National Convention at the California party's regularly scheduled February convention in Sacramento. An alternative plan being negotiated by Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Democrat-controlled state Assembly would move the 2008 presidential primary election up from its traditional June date -- where it has in recent years had no effect on the selection of the party's presidential nominee -- to Feb. 5." The Times notes that "many Republican leaders in the state -- who would vote in the February convention under Mr. DeVore's plan -- oppose Mr. McCain. 'The activists on the state central committee here have still not forgiven him for the McCain-Feingold assault on the First Amendment nor do they appear comfortable with his incoherent philosophical agenda,' Mr. DeVore said."

'08 Hopeful Hunter Targeting Social Conservatives. USA Today (2/2, Welch, 2.27M) reports that CA52 Rep. Duncan Hunter (R) "sees his opening in the race for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination as the conservative's conservative." Hunter, "who chaired the House Armed Services Committee for the last four" years, "made his presidential candidacy official last month, basing it on three principles: ·A hard line on illegal immigration. ·Cracking down on countries, mainly China, that he says are killing American manufacturing with unfair trade policies. ·Unwavering support for a strong military and for the war in Iraq, including President Bush's addition of more than 20,000 U.S. troops. 'Over the next five to 10 years, clearly national security is going to be a major focus for our country,' Hunter says after being asked why he is running. 'I've concentrated on that function of government for the last 26 years in the House of Representatives.' … 'He's very much a long shot,' says Jack Pitney, professor of government at Claremont McKenna College in California and former head of research for the Republican National Committee. 'He sees a niche for a social conservative with a strong defense background,' he says. 'He's putting a steel beam on the beach and hoping lightning will strike.'"

Gore Nominated For Nobel Peace Prize. The Los Angeles Times/AP (2/2) reports former Vice President Al Gore "was nominated for the 2007 Nobel Peace Prize for his wide-reaching efforts to draw the world's attention to the dangers of global warming, a Norwegian lawmaker said Thursday." Conservative Member of Parliament Boerge Brende said, "A prerequisite for winning the Nobel Peace Prize is making a difference, and Al Gore has made a difference." Brende said "he joined political opponent Heidi

DOJ_NMG_0126400

Soerensen of the Socialist Left Party to nominate Gore as well as Canadian Inuit activist Sheila Watt-Cloutier before the nomination deadline expired Thursday."

Oil Price Stability Said To Be Key To Energy Security. In a New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) op-ed, Ronald E. Minsk, who was a special assistant for economic policy to President Bill Clinton, writes, "As Congress and President Bush face off over energy policy, we should reaffirm a few basic principles. A very important one is that our most critical goal in enhancing our energy security is to maintain a stable price for oil." Minsk adds, "In the short term, technology like plug-in hybrid cars could help with volatility, because it allows consumers to choose day to day whether to power their cars with oil or with the sources their utilities use. In the long term, however, if we cannot find a way to increase production and inoculate ourselves from oil-supply interruptions, we are either going to have to develop cars that need no oil, or learn to live with the risks of the global market." Minsk concludes, "There are many paths to take as we seek to improve our energy security, but all should be based on one principle: real security can come only through finding a way to keep prices stable."

Lindsey Criticizes Move To Ease Union Representation. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/2, A19), Lawrence B. Lindsey says, "Why is the new Congress in such a hurry to take away workers' right to vote? It seems extraordinary, but the so-called 'Employee Free Choice Act' is right there near the top of the Democrats' agenda. This legislation replaces government-sponsored secret ballot elections for union representation with a public card-signing system." But "sometimes the interests of workers and unions coincide, sometimes they do not. The chief complaint by the bill's sponsors is that unions only win secret-ballot elections half of the time. Apparently workers, after they think things over and when neither the union nor the company knows how they vote, often decide they are better-off without the union. The solution of the Employee Free Choice Act is to do away with such elections. It is hard to see how that 'empowers' workers. And it is hard not to conclude that this bill has little to do with employee choice or maximizing employee leverage, and everything to do with empowering union bosses and organizers."

Teaching Said To Be Among Better Paid Professions. Jay P. Greene and Marcus A. Winters of the Manhattan Institute write in the Wall Street Journal (2/2, A19, 2.04M) that public school teachers are "better paid" than architects, economists "and many other professionals" with an hourly wage of $34.06 which is "36% more than the hourly wage of the average white-collar worker and 11% more than the average professional specialty or technical worker." Increased pay for teachers accounts "for the bulk of public school spending increases over the last four decades." Yet "higher teacher pay seems to have no effect on raising student achievement." Instead, "the way we pay teachers is more important" because "providing bonuses to teachers who improve the performance of their students does raise academic proficiency."

NYTimes Calls For Bipartisan Trade Consensus. The New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The newest Democratic members of Congress have arrived in Washington with an important message from the voters: American workers are feeling economically insecure, and globalization and trade are heightening their fears. The White House and the new Congress still have a chance to create a bipartisan consensus on trade. They should seize it, for the good of the American economy, and for the good of the world's poorest nations, which need freer trade to pull themselves out of poverty." Now that the Democrats "control Congress, they can champion both free trade and the rights of American workers. They should push to improve the social safety net, especially access to health insurance. And they should promote increased retraining and wage assistance for displaced workers."

WSJournal Urges Utah To Adopt School Voucher Plan. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A18, 2.04M) writes in an editorial, "Another brick could soon fall from the Berlin Wall that surrounds America's failing public schools, as Utah's legislature considers what would be the first universally available statewide voucher program in America. The voucher bill passed out of committee earlier this week and is backed by Governor Jon Huntsman." The program "would offer students who attend private K-12 schools from $500 to $3,000 in tuition reimbursement based on family income." And "the biggest winners under the plan would be the state's growing Hispanic population, who haven't done well in general in Utah public schools." The projected "$9 million cost of the program is about 0.5% of total school spending." So "let's hope Utah lawmakers stare down the opposition and give this statewide experiment a try."

Rice To Seek Support For Renewed Mideast Peace Push. The Washington Post (2/2, A11, Kessler, 690K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will launch "a new effort to forge a Palestinian state by seeking an endorsement today from a rare Washington meeting" of the Quartet, which "has played a largely backstage role in the long-stalled peace process." However, Germany, which currently holds the rotating presidency of the EU, "has pressed to revive the role of the international group -- and US officials decided that an endorsement would help bolster Rice's planned return to the region this month" to host a meeting between Israeli and Palestinian leaders. European officials say that Rice's decision to hold the meeting in Washington "signals the administration's determination to make progress with just two years left in President Bush's term." Behind the scenes, the Post says there are "tensions in the Quartet group over the administration's determination to maintain an economic embargo on the Palestinian government led by Hamas." The Russians, in particular, "have pressed for an end to the embargo," while the Europeans last year "won approval for a temporary -- now largely permanent -- aid program that directly benefits the Palestinian people, bypassing Hamas institutions." The aid ban, however, "has allowed Iran to gain a greater role in Palestinian affairs as it provides huge amounts of smuggled cash to Hamas," the Post writes.

DOJ_NMG_0126401

Ban Wants Progress "On The Ground," Not Just Statements From Meeting. AFP (2/2) reports UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon wants the international Quartet for Middle East peace meeting Friday "to strive for progress on the ground rather than merely making statements," his spokeswoman said. Spokeswoman Michele Montas told reporters Thursday, Ban "hopes that the Quartet will seriously engage with the key issues that have a direct impact on the situation on the ground, going beyond mere statements," noting that he is "fully aware that within the region and beyond, many are looking at the Quartet to be more energetic in its efforts than it has been at times to break the current impasse in the peace process."

Palestinian Ceasefire Breaks Down Amid Growing Violence. The New York Times (2/2, A8, Myre, 1.16M) reports the "fragile truce" between Palestinian factions in Gaza "broke down" Thursday "when Hamas members fired on a convoy from the rival Fatah group, touching off an intense gun battle that killed six people and wounded at least 50." The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Ellingwood, 850K) reports Hamas believed the ambushed convoy was "carrying arms from Egypt destined for" Fatah, however, Egyptian officials in Gaza and a spokesman for the presidential guard of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas…denied the trucks were carrying arms."

Street Protests Pose Challenge To Lebanese Army. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A12, Simpson, 2.04M) reports, "For almost six months, Lebanese Army soldiers have helped control one of the world's most volatile flashpoints, patrolling near Lebanon's 49-mile border with Israel. Now, its troops are shouldering an even more urgent, and in many ways more difficult, task: standing between fellow citizens from rival groups on the same Beirut streets." This new job is "severely testing what may be the last Lebanese institution that still holds public confidence, and perhaps the only one keeping the deeply fractured society intact. Yet without a quick settlement to the political crisis," current and former army leaders warn, "street violence like last week's could spiral beyond the military's ability to contain it."

US Considers Re-Establishing Relations With Somalia. The Washington Times (2/2, Kralev, 88K) reports the State Department said Thursday it is "considering re-establishing a diplomatic presence in Somalia for the first time since US troops withdrew from the African country in 1994." However, officials cautioned that "even if the department determines that the political and security conditions on the ground have improved sufficiently, it will not reopen the US Embassy," but will "most likely set up a small presence post." The Times notes that during a trip to the region last month, Jendayi Frazer, assistant secretary of state for African affairs, pledged $40 million in financial assistance and said the United States was trying to "mobilize international support to help build the governance capacity" of the transitional authorities and to "move forward with the deployment of an African stabilization force."

Sectarian Violence Rising In Pakistan. The Christian Science Monitor (2/2, Montero, 59K) reports a recent rash of attacks in Pakistan against its Shiite minority "has heightened concerns that Iraq's conflict may be feeding sectarian violence here. Whether the conflict in Iraq is capable of igniting Pakistan's simmering sectarian tensions raises questions about a growing global sectarian war." The answer is important, analysts say, "because Pakistan's 30 million Shiites -- numbering more than Iraq's -- could become a flash point if sectarian violence spreads. … Many disagree, however, saying that what happens in Iraq will hardly convulse the community in Pakistan, more concerned as it is with its own troubles."

US Expresses Hopes For Progress On Deal With Pyongyang. The AP (2/2) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Thursday "he hopes six nations meeting in China next week will be able to take the first concrete steps toward eventual dismantling of the communist nation's nuclear weapons." His comments "could mean that North Korea might begin the process of denuclearization while receiving economic benefits from other countries participating in the talks," which would be "a significant breakthrough for a bargaining process that has achieved little since it began in August 2003."

Pyongyang Looks To Giant Rabbits To Curb Famine. The Washington Post (2/2, A10, Whitlock, 690K) reports that officials in Pyongyang have approached a German rabbit breeder known for producing some of the words largest animals as "a possible solution to their nation's endemic food shortage." But "how, exactly, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea intends to parlay the small herd of German Flopsies into hunger relief for its 23 million citizens is unclear." An official at the North Korean Embassy in Berlin "confirmed that the Asian nation coveted the German bunnies for their gigantism. But he refused to answer any other questions about the breeding program."

DOJ_NMG_0126402

Debate Over Gibraltar Delays Ban On Luxury Goods To North Korea. The Financial Times (2/2, Parker, Mulligan) reports Kim Jong-il "may be dispensing Hennessy cognac and Cartier watches to his cronies for a little while longer, thanks to a 300-year-old territorial dispute between the UK and Spain. The precise status of Gibraltar, a hunk of British-owned rock at the mouth of the Mediterranean, has caused a new row between London and Madrid that is delaying a European Union ban on luxury goods sales to Pyongyang."

US Suspends Space Ventures With China. On its front page, the Washington Times (2/2, A1, Gertz, 88K) reports the Bush administration has "suspended plans to develop space ventures with China, including joint exploration of the moon, in reaction to Beijing's Jan. 11 test of an anti-satellite weapon that left orbiting debris threatening US and foreign satellites." NASA spokesman Jason Sharp "said the weapon test undermined an agreement" reached between President Bush and Chinese President Hu Jintao during an April summit," and that "China's development and testing of such weapons is inconsistent with the constructive relationship that our presidents have outlined, including on civil space cooperation." Bush administration officials said the suspension is "meant to signal US displeasure" with the test, "as well as Beijing's failure to provide an explanation for its space arms program."

Kyl Says US "Seems To Lack The Will To Implement" Space Defense. The Washington Times (2/2, Gertz, Scarborough, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, that "the fallout from China's Jan. 11 anti-satellite (ASAT) weapons test that killed a Chinese weather satellite using a kinetic missile warhead" bring to light the issue of whether the US has the "will to implement" space defense of US satellites, according to Senator Jon Kyl, a Arizona Republican and veteran of the Senate intelligence committee.

UN Hopes China's HU Will Push For Resolution On Darfur During Visit. The AP (2/2, De Montesquiou) reports he United Nations hopes Chinese President Hu Jintao "will push for a solution to the Darfur crisis during his landmark visit to Sudan on Friday. But Khartoum expects its staunchest diplomatic ally to stick to boosting commercial ties, particularly those assuring its access to Sudan's oil." In what is seen as "an unusual foray into the field of human rights," Chinese officials have "called on Sudan to cooperate with the United Nations in finding a solution in Darfur."

Under the headline "Pressure On China As President Heads To Sudan," AFP (2/2, Saeed) says "international pressure" is on China, because "no other country has more clout on the Khartoum government than China, which absorbs 60 percent of Sudan's total oil output and has repeatedly used its UN Security Council veto power to block further sanctions on the regime."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/2, Baldauf, 59K), meanwhile, reports from Khartoum that if Hu "announces more investment and development projects, as promised at Beijing's summit of 43 African heads of state this past November, then China will cement its position as the continent's new business partner of choice. If he buckles to pressure from Western governments, and makes future aid dependent on Sudan's actions to halt the brutal civil war in Darfur, then African leaders will see that even China's aid comes with strings attached. Whatever happens, Hu's visit to Sudan will be historic."

Some In Africa Resent China's Growing Influence. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A1, Trofimov, 2.04M) reports from Chambishi, Zambia that "Hu Jintao embarked on an upbeat tour of Africa this week, doling out aid and lauding China's growing economic and political ties with the continent." But "there is little love for China in this ramshackle township, which had to be dropped from the agenda of President Hu's weekend visit to Zambia because of likely unrest." Chambishi "was supposed to be a showcase of Sino-African friendship. China's state metals conglomerate, China Non-Ferrous Metal Mining (Group) Co., bought the mothballed copper mine here in 1998, bringing plenty of jobs and investments. Initial gratitude, however, quickly turned into seething discontent, as the new Chinese owners banned union activity and cut corners on safety. … Similar feelings of resentment about China's unfolding scramble for influence in Africa are beginning to bubble up across the continent."

China's New Rules On Foreign Investment Spark Concern. The Washington Post (2/2, D1, Cha, 690K) reports, "Since the mid-1990s, China has aggressively courted foreign investment," but "in recent months, however, the Chinese government, saying it needs to protect homegrown companies from unfair competition, has thrown a multitude of new regulations at foreign firms seeking to do business in China." While some believe the new restrictions "may be only temporary measures to control growth, others worry that there's a larger political issue: that economic nationalism or even protectionism is rising." As a result, "several US firms, which complain that the new rules are too restrictive and overly complex, to reassess their plans in China."

DOJ_NMG_0126403

Russian TV Aids Putin In Anointing Successor. On its front page, the Washington Post (2/2, A1, Finn, 690K) reports, "[T]wo favorites of President Vladimir Putin play prominent supporting roles on a television game show called 'Happy Bus.' ... Dmitri Medvedev and Sergei Ivanov hand out awards and urge young people in general to live healthy lives. Ostensibly, the two men have perfectly straightforward reasons for appearing on the show: Each week, one team of contestants is sponsored by Gazprom, the state-controlled energy giant chaired by Medvedev." The "opposing team is sponsored by the New Generation Foundation, headed by Ivanov, who is also defense minister." But the program "is widely viewed here as proof of the Kremlin's ability to commandeer the airwaves...to aid Putin in anointing a successor. By most accounts, the president has narrowed his choice to Medvedev or Ivanov, and over the last year each man's image, particularly Medvedev's, has been rigorously burnished." The Post adds, "Whoever turns out to be Putin's nominee will dominate television and almost certainly ride unimpeded through the presidential elections in early 2008, analysts said."

Putin Defends Energy Policies Toward Neighbors. The Financial Times (2/2, Buckley) reports, "Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, on Thursday hit back at accusations that the country was using energy as a weapon, saying critics were deliberately distorting its policy of moving to market prices for oil and gas supplies to former Soviet neighbours." Putin said, "We must not subsidise the economies of other countries in large amounts, comparable with their budgets. No one else does that. Why do they demand that we should do it?" He "added that new pricing and tariff arrangements agreed with transit countries such as Belarus and Ukraine were aimed 'precisely at ensuring the interests of key consumers' in western Europe, despite temporary disruptions to supplies last month and in January 2006."

Police Interview Blair About Cash-For-Honors Scandal. The New York Times (2/2, Cowell, 1.16M) reports, "After a news blackout lasting six days, the British police acknowledged Thursday that officers interviewed Prime Minister Tony Blair a second time last Friday over allegations that high honors had been traded for campaign contributions." Blair "is said by British political analysts to be the first prime minister to be interviewed by the police while still in office." The Times adds, "The prime minister's office said in a statement on Thursday that Mr. Blair had been 'briefly interviewed by the police as a witness."

The Washington Post (2/2, A12, Sullivan, 690K) reports, "Police interviewed Blair for about 45 minutes last Friday but asked Blair's office 'for operational reasons' to keep the meeting secret until Thursday, police and Blair's office said in statements. Police said Blair was 'interviewed as a witness, not as a suspect and cooperated fully' in an inquiry in which the prime minister's top fundraiser and a top adviser have been arrested on suspicion of hampering the investigation into the widening scandal." The Post adds, "Blair…announced last year that he will step down before his party's annual conference in September. But as the scandal widens, political opponents are increasingly calling for Blair to resign sooner."

Gutierrez Says US Willing To Help Cuba Transition. The AP (2/2, Carl) reports Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez Thursday said Washington "is willing to help Cuba make the transition to a more open, democratic society." Speaking to reporters during a one-day visit to Mexico, Gutierrez said the US supports a "peaceful transition to democracy." Gutierrez said the United States "does not plan to meddle in Cuban politics, but wants to see the country make the transition to democracy." Gutierrez did not elaborate, "but last September he suggested that Cubans could work with the Organization of American States and other groups to hold a referendum on whether they want to live in democracy."

European Commission Critical Of US Farm Proposals. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Von Reppert-Bismarck, 2.04M) reports, "The European Commission expressed disappointment at a US plan to overhaul subsidies to its farmers, saying 'more ambitious cuts' are required to relaunch a stalled round of global trade talks. The White House's proposal to Congress on how to overhaul the US Farm Bill will make 'extremely modest' cuts to loan-deficiency payments and keep payments to dairy and sugar farmers 'virtually untouched,' said EU farm spokesman Michael Mann." Mann added, "The U.S. will need to propose more ambitious cuts and disciplines. … We had hoped the administration's proposal for the new farm bill would signal this more clearly."

The Wall Street Journal (2/2, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column this morning that the Administration "faces skeptics at home and abroad about farm-subsidy cuts." In addition to EC criticism, the Journal says "the White House plan squeezes 2008 Republican presidential candidates seeking Iowa support."

WPost Urges Bush Not To "Go Wobbly" On Kosovo. The Washington Post (2/2, A14, 690K) editorializes, "Today UN envoy Martti Ahtisaari is due to travel to the Balkans to kick off what should be the final resolution of Serbia's conflict with the province of Kosovo. … All along it's been obvious what the permanent solution must be: the recognition of Kosovo as an independent nation, with protections for its Serb minority. The question has been whether that outcome can be arranged without a diplomatic or even military blowup -- between Kosovo and a Serbia still infected by belligerent nationalism, or between the West and an increasingly troublesome Russia." The Bush Administration "is cautiously optimistic that the transition can be pulled off in the next several months. But it will take some deft Western diplomacy and, in the end, probably some American toughness." US "firmness might be needed. The Bush administration has avoided responding to multiple Russian provocations in recent months, the most recent being Moscow's sale of antiaircraft missiles to Iran." If Russian President Vladimir Putin "decides to make trouble over Kosovo, the United States will either have to push back or abandon allies it has supported against aggression: the Kosovo Albanians, or Georgia's liberal democratic government. The administration ought to make clear now that it will not go wobbly."

DOJ_NMG_0126404

NYTimes Urges Ulster's Paisley To Support Peace Process. The New York Times (2/2, 1.16M) editorializes, "Northern Ireland has lost thousands of lives, billions of dollars in economic opportunity and decades of democratic self-rule to what its people euphemistically call 'the troubles.' One man now has it in his power to help this British-ruled province finally put this lamentable era behind it and move on to a brighter future -- or to stand in the way. That man is the Rev. Ian Paisley, the fiery Protestant preacher, now 80 years old, who leads the province's largest party, the Democratic Unionists. Mr. Paisley, though, has yet to rise to the moment and acknowledge that the times have changed and his former foes have changed with them. … This is Mr. Paisley's last chance to leave a constructive, forward-looking legacy. If he continues to live in the past, the promise of self-rule will be postponed indefinitely. And one man will be to blame."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"U.N. Says There's No Stopping Global Warming."
"Milena's Mentor Stays On The Case."
"Costly L.A. River Plan Contains A Raft Of New Ideas."
"Marines Battle Their Past In An Iraqi city."
"Senators Castigate General On Iraq strategy."

USA Today:
"Sites Of Risky Levees Listed."
"Drastic Plans Unveiled To Fight Pandemic."
"Milestone Resonates Beyond NFL."

New York Times:
"Florida Shifting To Voting System With Paper Trail."
"An Afghan's Path From Ally Of US. To drug Suspect."
"General Parries Senate Attacks On Iraq Record."
"So Far, Obama Can't Take Black Vote For Granted."
"Democracy Rules, And Pop Culture Depends On It."
"Dark Days Follow Hard-Hitting Career In N.F.L."
"Late for Court: Connecticut Case Draws Scrutiny."

Washington Post:
"Border Policy's Success Strains Resources."
"Iraq at Risk Of Further Strife, Intelligence Report Warns."
"Va. Transportation Deal Withers In Senate Panel."
"Two Men Acquitted Of Conspiracy To Fund Hamas Activities in Israel."
"Russian TV Shines Warmly On A Likely Successor To Putin."
"Fleeing One Bomb, Iraqi Shoppers Die In Blast Of Another."

Washington Times:
"New RNC Chief Backs Bill With Guest-Worker Plan."
"Casey Refutes Iraq Pessimism."
"U.S. Halts China Space Ventures."
"Katrina Vehicles Flood This Area."
"Abducted Boy, Mom Reunited."

Detroit Free Press:
"Governor To Push Free Tuition."
"Michiganders Doubt President."
"Historic Low: Ford 4th With U.S. Buyers."
"'The Room Was So Full Of…Forgiveness' For Abraham."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Medicare Cuts Reach Deep Into Hospitals."
"Nation Bemused As Network Appeases Boston Over Stunt."
"Apology Asked For Sterilizations State Required."
"Jury Told To Keep At It In Clinton Secret Case."
"Bill Will Allow Consumers To Order Wine Shipped Directly From Maker."

Houston Chronicle:
"Minimum-Wage Hikes Clears One Hurdle, Faces Another."
"Report: Global Warning To Last For Centuries."
"Casey Says Demand For Troops Excessive."
"Democrats Rip State Agency For Hiring D.C. Lobbyist."
"Giuliani Mines For Texas Gold."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Senate Resolution-Iraq; Senate Resolution-Analysis; Gen. Casey-Senate Hearings; Americans Saving Less; Economic News; Army Corps Report The Levees; Terror Scare Boston-Aftermath; Italian Spat; Schools In Cambodia.
CBS: Negative Savings Rate; Senate-Minimum Wage; Exxon Profits; Iraq Violence; Casey-Surge; Iraq-Security Crackdown; Syria-Anti-US Propaganda; Climate Change Report; Southeast-Winter Weather; Katrina Victims-

DOJ_NMG_0126405

Depression; UK Terror Suspects; Boston Terror Scare; Democrats-Work Week; Super Bowl Ads.
NBC: Gen. Casey-Hearings; Senate Resolution-Iraq Surge; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Terror Scare Boston-Aftermath; Minimum Wage Increase; Stock Market; Exxon Profits; Binge Eating; Winter Weather-Colorado Cattle; Richard Kelly Obit; National Prayer Breakfast; Italian Spat.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: UN Global Warming Report; Super Bowl-Security Preparations; Senate-Minimum Wage; Savings Rates For Americans Down; PA-Strike At Harley-Davidson Plant.
CBS: UN Global Warming Report; Army Corps Of Engineers-Levees; Report Of US Chopper Going Down North Of Baghdad; Senate-Iraq Resolution; Senate-Minimum Wage Bill; Presidential Candidates To Attend Democratic National Committee Meeting; Exxon Oil-Record Profits; Ford Sales Down, Toyota Sales Up.
NPR: Tony Snow-Iraq Surge Plan; Casey-Confirmation Hearing; Mississippi River-Barge Accident; EU Calling For Worldwide Moratorium On Death Penalty; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Philippines-Truck Explosion; World Intellectual Property Organization-Counterfeiting Costs; Groundhog Day Forecast.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Photo opportunity with the Carolina Hurricanes. East Room.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Participates in a roundtable discussion with cardiologists, survivors and partners. Bryant Park Hotel, New York; attends the Heart Truth 2007 Fashio Show. Bryant Park, New York.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: CONSUMER ASSEMBLY _ The Consumer Federation of America holds its Consumer Assembly Conference. Highlights: 10:15 a.m. FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras. 11:30 a.m. Michael Jacobson, Executive Director, Center for Science in the Public Interest. Location: Washington Plaza Hotel, 10 Thomas Circle.

PANDEMIC FLU _ Influenza experts hold a two-day meeting to assess the current level of US preparedness for a possible bird flu pandemic. Highlights: 8 a.m. Session on influenza planning, with CDC Director Julie Gerberding, others. 12:05 p.m. Luncheon speaker - Rajeev Venkayya speaks on national preparedness for pandemic influenza. Location: Marriott-Crystal Gateway, 1700 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington.

TAX SYMPOSIUM _ The Tax Council Policy Institute holds its Eighth Annual Tax Council Policy Institute Symposium, ``Understanding the Global Tax Arena: Risk & Regulation." Location: Ritz Carlton Hotel, 1150 22nd St. NW.

US-CHINA _ The US-China Economic and Security Review Commission holds a public hearing on ``The US-China Relationship: Economics and Security in Perspective." The hearing will examine US-China relations from multiple perspectives to assess this bilateral relationship since the granting of permanent normalized trade relations to China, and the challenges facing the relationship in 2007. It will consider the economic, security, and diplomatic impacts of Chinas accession to the World Trade Organization, and seek to identify trends in US-China relations and opportunities for greater bilateral cooperation and dialogue. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. - 12 p.m. The hearing continues with an examination of the US-China military and security relationship and the prospects for US-China political cooperation and diplomacy. The Commission will hear testimony from Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs Thomas Christensen, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Treasury for International Affairs, Asia, Robert Dohner, as well as scholars and policy experts. Location: Room 562, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

WORKING FAMILIES-SECURITY _ The National Academy of Social Insurance holds a conference on how policymakers can ease insecurity for working families and strengthen economic security for all Americans. Highlights: 10 a.m. Session on the 9/11 Victim Compensation Fund, with Kenneth Feinberg, Special Master. 1:15 p.m. Luncheon speaker - former CMS Administrator Mark McClellan. Location: National Press Club.

DEMOCRATIC MEETING _ Winter meeting of the Democratic National Committee. Highlights: 9 a.m. General Session, with General Session. Speakers in order of appearance: Senate Majority Leader Senator Harry Reid; DNC Chairman Howard Dean; Senator Christopher Dodd; Senator Barack Obama; General Wesley Clark; Senator John Edwards; Representative Dennis Kucinich; Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. 6:30 p.m. Executive Committee meeting with Governor Janet Napolitano of Arizona; Mayor Adrian Fenty of Washington, D.C; Mayor Shirley Franklin of Atlanta, Ga.; DNC Vice Chair & ASDC President Mark Brewer. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

PENTAGON-IRAQ BRIEFING _ 9 a.m. The Pentagon holds its regular briefing on Iraq. Location: DOD Studio, 2E781, Pentagon.

PRESTON-SMALL BUSINESS _ 9:30 a.m. SBA Administrator Preston discusses the Disaster Assistance Program and Reform Agenda along with economic growth and issues affecting Americas small businesses. Location: National Press Club.

DOJ_NMG_0126406

PENTAGON ROUNDTABLE _ 9:55 a.m. Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates and Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace will conduct an on the record media roundtable. Location: DOD Briefing Room, Pentagon 2E579.

ECONOMIC BRIEFING _ 10 a.m. Treasury Assistant Secretary Phillip Swagel holds a briefing for economic media. Location: Room 4121, main Treasury.

SWAGEL-EMPLOYMENT _ 10 a.m. Treasury Department Assistant Secretary for Economic Policy Phillip Swagel hold an economic media briefing to discuss January 2007 employment numbers and the state of the US economy. Location: Treasury Department.

US-CLIMATE CHANGE _ 10 a.m. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) Administrator Stephen L. Johnson joins U.S. Secretary of Energy Samuel W. Bodman, and National Oceanic and National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) Administrator Vice Admiral Conrad Lautenbacher for a media availability to discuss the U.S. contribution to the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) Working Group 1 report and U.S. investments to advance climate science and clean energy technology research. Location: U.S. Department of Energy, 1000 Independence Ave. SW, Small Auditorium GJ-015.

HEALTH CARE _ 11:45 a.m. The Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association hold a briefing on BCBSA's 2007 federal legislative priorities and to give an overview of state legislative healthcare and insurance issues. Location: 12th floor, 1310 G St. NW.

AMERICA-FUTURE _ 12 p.m. Sen. Charles Schumer and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich discuss America's Future, sponsored by the National Press Club. Location: National Press Club.

CLIMATE CHANGE _ 12 p.m. The University Corporation for Atmospheric Research holds a telephone briefing on the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, with U.S. scientists who helped write the report (released today in Paris). Notes: Callin number: 877-804-1919; verbal passcode: NCAR.

HEALTH INSURANCE-DEDUCTIONS _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute holds a briefing to discuss the possibility of giving a standard income tax deducation for health insurance costs, with Council of Economic Advisers member Katherine Baicker, Leonard Burman of the Urban-Brookings Tax Policy Center, and Michael Cannon of the institute. Location: Room B-338, Rayburn.

MARINE CORPS _ 12 p.m. The US Marine Corps will hold a background briefing for reporters on the proposed increase in the end strength of the Marine Corps Location: Pentagon briefing studio, room 2E781.

IRAQ-EUROPE _ 12:15 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a discussion, ``Integration vs. Confrontation: Or Why Europe Likes the Iraq Study Group Report More than the White House," with Michael Backfisch of Handelsblatt and Steve Clemens of the foundation. Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

OBAMA _ 1 p.m. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., speaks at ``Yes We Can!," a rally organized by Students for Barack Obama, a national student group committed to supporting Obama. Location: Johnson Hall, George Mason University, Fairfax. Va.

GOVERNORS _ 2 p.m. The Center for American Progress holds a discussion with governors Janet Napolitano of Arizona and Kathleen Sebelius of Kansas. Location: 10th floor, 1333 H St. NW.

GUATEMALA _ 2 p.m. The Alliance to End Hunger and InterAction hold an information session about Guatemala's efforts to meet the First Millennium Development Goal, with Andris Botran, Secretary of Food Security and Nutrition for the Government of Guatemala, and chair of the Guatemalan Alliance Against Hunger. Location: Suite 500, 50 G St. NW.

IRAQ _ 2 p.m. The Wilson International Center for Scholars holds a discussion on new politics in Iraq with David Satterfield, the State Department's senior adviser and coordinator for Iraq. Location: 6th floor Flom Auditorium, Reagan Trade Center.

SAUDI ARABIA _ 2 p.m. Georgetown University holds a screening of the film ``Abdulaziz and a panel discussion on King Abdulaziz of the building of the modern Saudi Arabia, with Saudi Amb. Prince Turki Al-Faisal, others. Location: Bunn Intercultural Center Auditorium, on campus.

GOP LEADERSHIP _ 3:15 p.m. Members of the Senate Republican leadership will be available following the Senate Republican Conference Retreat to discuss the days activities and outline their legislative priorities for the 110th Congress. Participants: Senators Mitch McConnell, Trent Lott, Jon Kyl, John Cornyn, and Kay Bailey Hutchison. What: Media Availability with Senator Mitch McConnell, Senator Trent Lott, Senator Jon Kyl, Senator John Cornyn, and Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison. Location: Library of Congress, Thomas Jefferson Building, exhibit area between the Great Hall and Members Room.

IMMIGRANT RIGHTS _ 4 p.m. The DC Committee for Immigrants' Rights holds a news conference to discuss the Virginia General Assembly actions regarding illegal immigrants. Location: In front of ICE offices, 425 Eye St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0126407

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, February 02, 2007 8:32 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Friday, February 02, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070202.pdf; dojclips070202.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Judges Pose Questions On Bush Detainee Policy (NYT) 4
Detainee Rights At Center Of Fight (WP) 5
Bush's War Powers Further Scrutinised (FT) 5
Two Men Acquitted Of Conspiracy To Fund Hamas Activities In Israel (WP) 6
Two Found Not Guilty Of Supporting Hamas (CHIT) 7
2 Men Cleared Of Charges Of Aiding Hamas Violence (NYT) 9
Federal Jury In Chicago Acquits 2 Men Of Racketeering Conspiracy In Hamas Trial (FINDLAW/AP) 9
U.S. Senators Briefed On Arar But Say They Have A Lot More Questions (CP) 10
Chinese Official Publishes Rebuke Of Bush (NYT) 10
Poster Of Hussein At Guantánamo Draws Detainee Complaints (NYT) 11
Travel Logs Aid Germans' Kidnap Probe (WP) 12
Neighbors Of British Terror Suspects Skeptical Of Charges (NYT) 13
Bank Group Is Told To Halt Flow Of Data To U.S. Officials (NYT) 14
No More Renditions (LAT) 14

Homeland Response:

Intelligence Pick Says He'd Fight Manipulation (USAT) 15
Judge Explains His Dismissal Of Scientist's Suit Against Times (NYT) 15
Judge Explains Tossing Out Suit Against N.Y. Times (WP) 16
Homeland Security Moves To Increase Armed Pilots (WT) 17
Little Progress Seen For Poorest After Hurricane (NYT) 17
Robin Hoods (commentary) (WSJ) 18
Off Guard (WP) 19

War News:

Senate Talks On Iraq Take A New Form (LAT) 19
Bush Senate Allies To Seek Iraq Benchmarks (WSJ) 21
Compromise Senate Measure Rebuffing Bush's Iraq Buildup Gathers Support (NYT) 22
Senate Prepares To Debate Opposition To Bush's Iraq Policy (MCT) 23
Senate Democrats Split On Measure Opposing Bush (WP) 24
Majority In Senate Support 'Stay The Course' Resolution (WT) 25
Is Iran Fighting Proxy War With U.S. In Iraq?; Interview With Howard Dean (CNN) 26
Will Politicians Unite Against Troop Build Up?; Interview With Carl Levin; Sex And Scandal In San Francisco; Mary Cheney Reacts To Political Fallout (CNN) 36
Troop Increase Is A Tough Sale For GOP Senators On '08 Ballot (USAT) 47
Troop Surge Could Be Up To 48,000 (CQ) 48
Surge Could Cost Triple Bush Projection, CBO Says (MCT) 49
Iraq At Risk Of Further Strife, Intelligence Report Warns (WP) 50
Potomac Watch Senator Feingold's Sin (WSJ) 51
Casey: Only Half Of Troop Boost Needed (AP) 52
Casey: Fewer Troops Can Do Baghdad Job (USAT) 54
Casey Defends Iraq War Effort (MCT) 55
Casey Refutes Iraq Pessimism (WT) 55
Senators Challenge Gen. Casey On Iraq War (WP) 57
War Supporter McCain Laments 'Missteps' In Iraq (WP) 57
General Parries Senate Attacks On Iraq Record (NYT) 58
Casey's Iraq Leadership Is Criticized At Hearing (LAT) 59
Suicide Bombers Attack Busy Market, Killing 45 (USAT/AP) 61
Fleeing One Bomb, Iraqi Shoppers Die In Blast Of Another (WP) 61
Iraq Suicide Bombers Kill 60 And Wound 150 In Market In Southern City (NYT) 62
Huge Force Readying Crackdown In Baghdad (AP) 63
Marines Battle Their Past In An Iraqi City (LAT) 65
Who's To Blame For The Killing (WP) 66
U.S. Says Iran Meddles In Iraq But Is Delaying Release Of Data (NYT) 67
Curbing Iran In Iraq Gets Trickier (WSJ) 68
Iraq Fears Being Caught In Middle Of U.S.-Iran Tensions (CHIT) 69
Iraq Plans Summit With Iran And Syria (LAT) 71
Ex-advisers Offer Revised Iraq Plans (AP) 72
Inside The Ring (WT) 72
Iran Leader Calls Nuclear Sanctions Ineffective (NYT) 74
Iran President Vows To Push Nuke Program (AP) 74
Iran Has Begun Assembling Centrifuges At Natanz Site: Diplomats (AFP) 75
Russia Supports A Break For Iran (WSJ/AP) 77
Moscow May Seek Accord With Tehran On Gas Supply (NYT) 77

Russia And Iran Discuss A Cartel For Natural Gas (WSJ) 78
In Uproar, Chirac Again Retracts Remarks On Nuclear Iran (NYT) 79
Chirac Assertions On Iran Force Retraction (WT/AP) 80
Bombing In Paris (WSJ) 81
Between State And Revolution (WSJ)..... 81
The Oil-Addicted Ayatollahs (NYT) 82
Afghans Urge Legal Amnesty For Those Involved In Wars (NYT) 83
U.S. Donates Vehicles, Arms To Afghan Army (AP) 84
An Afghan's Path From Ally Of U.S. To Drug Suspect (NYT) 85
U.S. Reconfigures The Way Casualty Totals Are Given (NYT).. 87

DOJ:

US Admits Misconduct In Mob Slaying Case (BOS) 88
Top Fed Heads To Duty In D.C. (WT&G) 89

Corporate Scandals:

Senate Report Says S.E.C. Botched Hedge Fund Inquiry (NYT)89
Dell's Woes Mount As Investors File Improper-Accounting Suit (WSJ) 90
US Probes Siemens Bribery Scandal (FT)..... 91
Long-Running AOL Trial Heads To Jury (WP)..... 92
CEO Whack-a-mole (LAT)..... 93

Criminal Law:

FBI Agent Shows Doubts For Libby's Story (NSDY/AP)..... 94
Libby Left Out Some Facts In Interviews, FBI Agent Says (WP) 94
F.B.I. Agent Says Libby Denied Being Leak Source (NYT)..... 95
Portions Of White House Briefing Tapes Played At Libby Trial (USAT) 96
Video Undercuts Libby's Defense (LAT) 97
A Failed Cover-Up (WP) 98
Net-betting Crackdown Freezes Funds (USAT) 99
Notorious NYC Crack Kingpin Convicted Of Murder For Paying To Have Rivals Killed (FINDLAW/AP)..... 100
Man Convicted In 2 Killings; U.S. To Pursue The Death Penalty (NYT) 100
Ex-U.N. Official Jailed Pending Trial (AP) 101
Hung Jury In Coca-Cola Conspiracy Trial (NSDY/AP) 102
Camden Redevelopment Corp. Records Subpoenaed (CAMCP)102
More Subpoenas Focus On Camden Redevelopment (PHI) ... 103
Mafia Boss Pleads Guilty To Racketeering (NSDY/AP) 104
Suspect Pleads Guilty To Racketeering (FLSUNSEN)..... 104
Priest Suspected In Attack Arrested (NSDY/AP) 105
Hoosier Admits Katrina Fund Fraud (FWNS)..... 105
2 Saucier Women Arrested In Katrina Fraud Cases (BSH)..... 105
Man Sentenced In Cisco Scam (BOSH) 106
Man Sentenced In Military Contract Fraud (BOS) 106
Woman's Bail Revoked In Child Pornography Case (PHI)..... 106
Journalists Pay Deadly Toll In Reporting News (AP)..... 107
Inmate Who Fled With Official's Wife Is Sentenced For Escape (NYT) 108
Abducted Boy, Mom Reunited (WT)..... 109
Transit Police Try To Crack Down On Robbers (WP)..... 110
Late For Court: Connecticut Case Draws Scrutiny (NYT)..... 110
Kaine Dubious On Death Penalty Expansion (WP) 112

Civil Law:

FEC To Police '527' Groups' Campaign Activities (WP) 113

Civil Rights:

Lawsuit Says Apartments' No-dog Policy Biased Against The Blind (AP)..... 114
Justice Department Settles Cibola County Voting Rights Claim (AP)..... 114
Miss. Voting Rights Trial On Break, Resumes Feb. 15 (AP) 115
State Appeals Justice Ruling On Chastang (MR)..... 115
Texas Deputy To Pay Price For Defending Self (WT) 117
Hairdresser To The Elite Faces New Lawsuit (WP/AP)..... 118
Florida Shifting To Voting System With Paper Trail (NYT) 118
Gays Should Be Allowed To Serve Openly In Military, Poll Finds (WSJ) 120

Antitrust:

Municipal Broker Receives Subpoenas In U.S. Probe (Update3) (BLOOM) 120
Microsoft Plans To License Instructions (AP) 121
United CEO Says Mergers Still Viable (USAT) 121

Environment:

U.N. Report Adds Pressure To Global-Warming Fight (WSJ).. 122
Political Climate Shifts As Verdict On Warming Arrives (USAT)123
Live With Climate Change (USAT)..... 124
Judge Looking To Release Material From Rocky Flats Grand Jury (AP) 124
CDC Issues Guidelines For Battling Flu Pandemic (WP)..... 125
Flu Advice Would Vary Under U.S. Plan (WP/AP)..... 126
Closings And Cancellations Top Advice On Flu Outbreak (NYT)127
Sites Of Risky Levees Listed (USAT)..... 129
Engineers Say 120 Levees Are Flood Risk (NYT)..... 129

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Drug Kingpin Sentenced To 40 Years In Prison (AP)130
20 Members Of Violent Street Gang Arrested In New Jersey Raids (NYT) 130
State, Federal Authorities Round Up Suspected Bloods Gang Members (NSDY/AP) 131
Bloods Targeted In Series Of Raids (PHI) 132
Gang Probe Brings Arrests (TTNJ) 132
17 Arrested In Bloods Gang Sweep (APP) 133
Suspected Bloods Rounded Up In Pa., N.J. (CHCP) 134
Troopers Arrest 17 In Effort To Dismantle A Violent Gang (NSL)134
State Police Arrest 25 Suspected Gang Members (WPVI) 135
Major Gang Crackdown In The Garden State (WABC) 136
'BOBO' GETS 11 YEARS ... Kittitian Man Put Away In US Jail (SKN) 136
Georgia Man Arrested For Attempted Murder In Drug Raid In New York (AP) 136
Former River Hill Teacher Sentenced In Drug Case (COLFL) . 137
Similar Bombs In KC, Chicago (KCS) 139

DOJ_NMG_0126411

Gang Members, Others Arrested On Gun Violations (SDUT).. 139
Gun Dealer Pleads Guilty To Violation (CTPOST) 140
Feds Investigate Gang, Charge Two For Cocaine (SEAPI) 141

Immigration:

Judge Nixes Louisiana State Law Banning Illegal Immigrants From Driving (FINDLAW/AP) 141
Immigration Raid Nets 53 In Texas (FINDLAW/AP) 141
New RNC Chief Backs Bill With Guest-worker Plan (WT)..... 142
Border Policy's Success Strains Resources (WP)..... 143

Tax:

Protective Order Granted (NPLATTET) 145
Court Rejects Tax Shelter Once Sold By KPMG (NYT) 146

Congress-Administration:

Bush Seeks Big Medicare And Medicaid Saving (NYT)..... 146
Bush's 2008 Budget Calls For Boost To Pell Grant (WP)..... 148
Bush To Seek Record Boost To Pell Grants (WT)..... 148
Bush Budget Calls For Pell Grant Boost (AP)..... 149
A Realistic Budget (1 Letter) (NYT)..... 150
In The Loop: Aide At Labor Found Budget's Weaknesses, So Democrats Don't Have To (WP)..... 150
Soaring War Funding Raises Concerns About Scope Of Spending (USAT) 151
How Democrats Work With Tight Purse (CSM)..... 152
White House Welcomes Tougher Oversight (AP) 153
FEDERAL DIARY: A Tale Of Mice Illustrates How To Save Money (WP)..... 154
Senate OKs Higher Minimum-wage Bill (USAT)..... 155
Senate's Minimum-Wage Rise To Face Test In House (WSJ). 156
Senate Passes Wage Bill, But Obstacles Await (NYT)..... 157
Senate Ups Wage To $7.25 Over Two Years (AP) 157
Senate Adds Tax Breaks To Minimum Wage Bill (WP)..... 159
Senate Votes To Raise Minimum Wage (MCT)..... 159
Senate Passes Wage Bill; House To Fight Tax Relief (WT)..... 161
How To Really Help Low-Wage Workers (WP) 161
Bush Urges Stepped-Up Campaign Against Childhood Obesity (WP)..... 162
Bush Urges Parents To Get Kids Outdoors To Fight Childhood Obesity (USAT/AP)..... 163
Bush Urges Parents To Get Kids Outdoors (NYT/AP) 163
Bush Gets Aid Of Democrats In Fighting Pandemics (NYT) 164
Vaccine Firms Get Immunity From The U.S. (WSJ)..... 165
Drug Industry Faces Bitter Pill (WSJ)..... 165
Lawmakers Eye Child Insurance Program (AP) 167
Senate Democrats Warn F.C.C. Of Tough New Oversight (NYT)168
Democrats Urge Tighter FCC Rules (WP)..... 169
Senators Bristle At FCC Chief's Enforcement Of AT&T-BellSouth Merger (USAT)..... 170
FCC Told To Focus On Public Interest (WT)..... 170
Data Privacy Bill Expected To Target Retailers, Banks (WP)... 171
Sanchez Quits Hispanic Caucus (LAT)..... 172
Breaking News: Two More Reps. Complain About Treatment Of Women In Hispanic Caucus (POL)..... 173
Hispanic Caucus Members Toil Over Insult (AP)..... 174
Better Security For Judges (NYT) 175

Other News:

Bush, Dems Have Different Economic Views (AP)..... 175
Job Market Was A Key To Fed's Call (WSJ) 177
Fed's Inflation Dilemma (WSJ)..... 177
Dow, Russell 2000 Close At New Highs As Economic Data Bolster Confidence (WP/AP)..... 178
Dow Rises 51.99 To A Record On Exxon Mobil's Results (WSJ)179
Manufacturing Activity Drops (WSJ)..... 180
US Manufacturing 'on Brink Of Recession' (FT)..... 180
Some Lawmakers Shun Big Game Pass (WSJ)..... 181
Sharpton Takes Biden To Task On Remarks (AP)..... 182
An Inarticulate Kickoff (WP)..... 182
So Far, Obama Can't Take Black Vote For Granted (NYT)..... 183
Clinton Setting A $1 Million Goal For Donors (NYT)..... 185
McCain, Giuliani Skipping Some Conservative Events (POL).. 186
Pawlenty Boosts McCain (POL) 187
California Primary Shift Seen Hindering McCain (WT) 188
Hunter Out To Capture White House (USAT)..... 189
Al Gore Nominated For Nobel Peace Prize (LAT/AP) 190
Praying At The Pump (NYT)..... 190
Abrogating Workers' Rights (WSJ)..... 191
Is $34.06 Per Hour 'Underpaid'? (WSJ) 192
A Bipartisan Trade Policy (NYT)..... 193
Free To Choose In Utah (WSJ)..... 194
Rice To Seek Support For Mideast Effort (WP) 194
UN Chief Wants More Energetic Mideast Peace Quartet (AFP)195
Shootout In Gaza Deepens Bitter Split (NYT)..... 196
6 Dead In Gaza After Renewed Palestinian In-fighting (LAT) .. 196
How Lebanon's Army Could Hold Key To Peace (WSJ) 197
U.S. Eyes Re-establishing Relations (WT) 198
Shiite-Sunni Conflict Rises In Pakistan (CSM)..... 199
U.S. Hopes For Progress On N. Korea Deal (AP) 200
A Colossal Leap Of Faith In Fight Against Famine (WP)..... 200
N Korea Leader Finds Life's Luxuries In Gibraltar (FT) 201
U.S. Halts China Space Ventures (WT) 201
U.N. Hopes China Pushes For Darfur End (AP) 202
Pressure On China As President Heads To Sudan (AFP) 203
Hu's Trip To Sudan Tests China-Africa Ties (CSM) 204
In Africa, China's Expansion Begins To Stir Resentment (WSJ)205
China Gets Cold Feet For Foreign Investment (WP)..... 208
Russian TV Shines Warmly On A Likely Successor To Putin (WP)..... 209
Putin Denies Using Energy As A Weapon (FT) 211
Blair Gives 2nd Interview In Inquiry About Graft (NYT) 212
For Blair, Round 2 Of Police Questions (WP)..... 212
Official Says U.S. Willing To Help Cuba (AP) 213
Europe Faults U.S. Farm Proposal (WSJ) 214
Solution For Kosovo (WP)..... 214
Ulster's Last Holdout (NYT)..... 215

DOJ_NMG_0126412

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judges Pose Questions On Bush Detainee Policy (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

RICHMOND, Va., Feb. 1 — In a series of probing and sometimes testy exchanges with a government lawyer, two of three judges on a federal appeals court panel here indicated Thursday that they might not be prepared to accept the Bush administration's claim that it has the unilateral power to detain people it calls enemy combatants.

The case was brought by Ali al-Marri, a citizen of Qatar who is the only person on the American mainland being held as an enemy combatant, at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C. Mr. Marri, a legal resident whom the government calls a sleeper agent for Al Qaeda, was arrested in Peoria, Ill., on Dec. 12, 2001, where he was living with his family and studying computer science at Bradley University.

"What would prevent you from plucking up anyone and saying, 'You are an enemy combatant?' " Judge Roger L. Gregory of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit asked the administration's lawyer, David B. Salmons.

Mr. Salmons said the executive branch was entitled to make that judgment in wartime without interference from the courts. "A citizen, no less than an alien, can be an enemy combatant," he added.

Mr. Marri's appeal had been expected mostly to concern the impact of a new law, the Military Commissions Act, which says the courts have no jurisdiction to hear challenges from any noncitizen "who has been determined by the United States to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant."

But questions from Judge Gregory and Judge Diana Gribbon Motz suggested that the court might be willing to reach the more fundamental question of when and how such enemy-combatant determinations should be made.

Judge Motz asked, for instance, about the broader implications of the government's position that the United States is at war with Al Qaeda and that people affiliated with it may be subject to military detention rather than criminal prosecution.

"Nations have wars against each other," Judge Motz said. "People have quarrels or fights. Individuals can be terrorists. Individuals don't make war."

Mr. Salmons responded that a 2001 Congressional authorization to use military force after the Sept. 11 attacks had granted the president the power to detain Mr. Marri.

Judge Motz asked a series of hypothetical questions about whether the president could designate someone affiliated with People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, or PETA, as an enemy combatant. "Could the president declare war on PETA?" she asked.

Mr. Salmons said the hypothetical was unrealistic, but he stopped short of categorically rejecting the idea. "The representative of PETA can sleep well at night," he said, because the executive branch's determination of who is an enemy combatant is a careful one.

Judge Motz also suggested that the criminal justice system could handle people like Mr. Marri.

"That doesn't mean he doesn't get punished," Judge Motz said. "Perhaps he gets punished worse, under the criminal process."

Mr. Marri was in fact charged with credit card fraud and lying to federal agents after his arrest in 2001, and he was on the verge of trial when he was moved into military detention in 2003.

The third judge, Henry E. Hudson, visiting from the Federal District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, asked relatively few questions, most of them centered on the adequacy of the hearing Mr. Marri received in the trial court.

Judge Gregory, by contrast, subjected both lawyers to tough questioning.

"Do you agree," he asked Jonathan Hafetz, a lawyer for Mr. Marri with the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law, "that Congress gave the president broad power after Sept. 11 to wage the war on terrorism?"

"Certainly, your honor," Mr. Hafetz responded. "Broad, but not unlimited."

Judge Motz indicated that the government's shifting legal tactics in other cases had lost it a measure of credibility. It moved Jose Padilla, once labeled an enemy combatant, into the criminal justice system as the United States Supreme Court was considering whether to hear his challenge to that designation.

"Often the government in these cases has a late-breaking development," Judge Motz said. "Is there any late-breaking development here?"

DOJ_NMG_0126413

Mr. Salmons said no.

Judges Motz and Gregory were appointed by President Bill Clinton, and Judge Hudson by President Bush.

Detainee Rights At Center Of Fight (WP)

By Sari Horwitz

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

RICHMOND, Feb. 1 -- The Bush administration argued Thursday that a Qatari national who it says was an al-Qaeda sleeper agent sent to the United States for a second wave of terrorist attacks has no right to challenge in court his status as an enemy combatant.

Attorneys for Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, held for 3 1/2 years in the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., have contested the president's authority to indefinitely detain a lawful resident of the United States without charges.

If the government is right, said lawyer Jonathan Hafetz, "they can pick up any immigrant in this country, lock them in a military jail and hold the keys to the courthouse. If this case stands, the United States could effectively disappear people."

In arguments before a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit in Richmond, Bush administration lawyers contended that the Marri case is unique and does not represent a threat to immigrants with no ties to terrorist organizations.

Assistant Solicitor General David B. Salmons said Marri met in 2001 with Osama bin Laden and accused Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed and received training from al-Qaeda in Afghanistan in the use of poisons.

The government contends that Marri was sent to help other al-Qaeda operatives carry out subsequent terrorist attacks and had been told by al-Qaeda to explore computer-hacking methods to disrupt the U.S. banking system. "This is not a close case," Salmons said. "Al-Marri is clearly an al-Qaeda operative."

Marri, 41, is the only accused enemy combatant still held in the United States. Yaser Esam Hamdi, a U.S. citizen, was freed and sent to Saudi Arabia after the Supreme Court upheld his right to challenge his detention; Jose Padilla, another U.S. citizen, was transferred to the civilian justice system last year. Marri, who took up residence in Peoria, Ill., on a student visa in 2001, was arrested there.

Marri was arrested by the FBI in December 2001 and charged with credit card fraud and lying to federal agents. He was accused of denying that he had repeatedly tried to call a man in the United Arab Emirates who was the paymaster for the Sept. 11 hijackers. The charges were dropped in June 2003 when President Bush declared Marri an enemy combatant and moved him to military control.

Thursday, the judges focused their questions not on whether Marri is an al-Qaeda operative but on whether he was properly designated an enemy combatant.

Judge Diana Gribbon Motz questioned under what circumstances the president can order someone on U.S. soil to be detained as an enemy combatant. Under the traditional laws of war, she said, combatants are captured on a battlefield and connected to a nation or state at war with the United States.

Motz said that she is concerned about giving the government broad authority "to pluck up anyone from the streets of the United States" and added: "We don't want other nations to do that to our people."

But Judge Roger L. Gregory suggested that Congress knew it was dealing with an "amorphous enemy" when it passed the Military Commissions Act last year, creating a tribunal system for accused combatants such as Marri to challenge their status.

The provision of the act that denies access to U.S. courts to foreign nationals deemed enemy combatants was aimed primarily at Guantanamo Bay detainees. Attorneys for those prisoners have filed a challenge to that provision, arguing that it violates constitutional guarantees against being detained without the right to contest the charges in court.

Bush's War Powers Further Scrutinised (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Richmond, Virginia

Financial Times, February 2, 2007

The battle to define presidential powers in the "war on terror" came under renewed scrutiny on Thursday when a foreign prisoner held in the US on suspicion of being an al-Qaeda "sleeper agent" asked a court to declare his detention unconstitutional.

Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a Qatari citizen studying computer science in the US, was arrested in Illinois in late 2001 in connection with the investigation into the September 11 attacks. He was slated for a criminal trial in 2003 on charges including credit card fraud.

Just weeks before the trial, however, President George W. Bush classified Mr Marri as an unlawful "enemy combatant" in the "war on terror". He was removed from the criminal justice system and transferred to a prison in South Carolina, where he has remained without direct access to his family. The administration has designated hundreds of detainees at Guantánamo Bay as "enemy combatants".

DOJ_NMG_0126414

But lawyers for Mr Marri argued in a federal appeals court in Virginia on Thursday that Mr Bush did not have the authority to declare legal US residents as enemy combatants. "The president cannot militarise the case of a man in Peoria [Illinois] with the stroke of a pen," said Jonathan Hafetz, a New York University lawyer representing Mr Marri.

The Justice Department argued that Congress gave Mr Bush the authority to declare Mr Marri an enemy combatant when it gave him the ability to use force to prosecute the "war on terror" after September 11.

Critics say Congress intended the president to have the authority to classify only prisoners captured on the battlefield, not legal US residents or US citizens, as enemy combatants.

"If the government prevails, any one of the 11.6m legal permanent residents in the US could – on the president's say-so...be held indefinitely as an 'unlawful enemy combatant' with no right to challenge his or her imprisonment in court," said Human Rights Watch.

In court on Thursday, the Justice Department argued the battlefield in the "war on terror" included the US. That view seemed to receive support from one judge on the three-member panel but another appeared to question the administration's argument, saying while Congress could have given Mr Bush the ability to declare legal residents and citizens as "enemy combatants", it was unclear it had done so.

But Congress may again tackle the debate over habeas, which could have implications for the case of Mr al-Marri and the several hundred detainees still imprisoned at Guantánamo.

Senators Patrick Leahy and Arlen Specter, the top Democrat and Republican on the Senate judiciary committee, last week said they would work to reinstate the right of habeas corpus for all detainees.

"The great writ of habeas corpus was done horrible damage by the Congress in a law the president signed last year," Sen Leahy told Alberto Gonzales, the US attorney-general last week.

"I just want to put everybody on notice: as chairman of this committee, I will do everything possible to restore all the rights under the write of habeas corpus that were there before we passed the [MCA] legislation," he said.

Two Men Acquitted Of Conspiracy To Fund Hamas Activities In Israel (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

A federal jury in Chicago acquitted two men yesterday of charges that they were part of a long-running conspiracy to finance Hamas activities in Israel -- marking the latest defeat for the Justice Department in cases involving support for radical Palestinian groups.

Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former Howard University professor who lives in Springfield, and Muhammad Salah, 53, a former grocer from suburban Chicago, were found not guilty of racketeering conspiracy. The charge was the most serious allegation against them and could have drawn life sentences for each.

But the two men were found guilty of lesser charges: Ashqar was convicted of obstruction of justice and criminal contempt for refusing to testify in front of a grand jury, while Salah was convicted of obstruction for providing false answers in a civil lawsuit.

The case provides the latest example of the serious difficulties faced by the Justice Department in its attempts to prosecute supporters of radical Palestinian organizations. In the Chicago case, prosecutors faced the additional challenge of trying to punish activities that occurred before Hamas was declared a terrorist organization by the U.S. government in 1995.

Salah, a U.S. citizen, was accused of helping funnel hundreds of thousands of dollars to militant groups in the West Bank and Gaza. He was captured by the Israelis with $100,000 in cash in 1993 and allegedly confessed to being a military commander in Hamas. Ashqar was alleged to have helped launder money and facilitate communications for Hamas.

Neither man denied that he helped move money for Palestinian causes. But both said what they did was aimed at helping the Palestinian people and not to promote terrorism. In addition, Salah said his confession was the result of torture by Israeli officials.

In Chicago yesterday, the defendants and their attorneys immediately characterized the verdicts as a victory and said they showed that the government had overreached by trying to punish legitimate opposition to Israeli policies.

"It was better than we thought," a tearful Salah told reporters in Chicago. "We are good people, not terrorists."

Salah's attorney, Michael Deutsch, called the verdict "a tremendous victory" and said his client "may not even go to prison at all."

"This rejects the idea we can criminalize someone for resisting an illegal occupation in another country," Deutsch said.

DOJ_NMG_0126415

The Justice Department in Washington declined to comment. First Assistant U.S. Attorney Gary S. Shapiro told reporters in Chicago: "We've convicted them. It's hard to say that we're disappointed."

The prosecution of Ashqar and Salah was deemed so important to the Justice Department that the 2004 indictments were announced in a news conference by then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft. But the outcome of the three-month trial is decidedly mixed.

In December 2005, a jury in Florida acquitted former computer professor Sami al-Arian of eight terrorism charges and deadlocked on nine others. Arian eventually pleaded guilty to supporting members of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad and is slated to be deported after finishing a short prison term.

One of Arian's attorneys, William Moffit, also represented Ashqar in Chicago.

The case was prosecuted by the office of U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who is in the spotlight as the special counsel in the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff.

The Hamas prosecution also featured another central player in the Libby saga: former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, who testified on behalf of prosecutors in Chicago about an Israeli interrogation session with Salah that she witnessed in the early 1990s.

Salah and his attorney argued that much of the evidence against him, including a confession, should be disregarded because it was obtained under torture when he was in Israeli custody. Miller testified that she saw no evidence of mistreatment when she witnessed an interrogation of Salah and -- in an unprecedented twist for a U.S. courtroom -- two Israeli interrogators testified under aliases that Salah was treated well.

Prosecutors also presented recorded conversations in which Ashqar discussed violent operations by Hamas. But Moffit said his client was never recorded planning any attacks or recruiting anyone to carry them out.

One other defendant remains under indictment in the case: Mousa Abu Marzook, Hamas's deputy political bureau chief, who was deported from the United States in 1997 and is now a fugitive living in Damascus, Syria.

Staff writer Kari Lydersen in Chicago and staff researcher Julie Tate in Washington contributed to this report.

Two Found Not Guilty Of Supporting Hamas (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Jeff Coen

Chicago Tribune, February 2, 2007

In a legal defeat for the Bush administration's domestic war on terror, a federal jury Thursday acquitted two men of being leading members of the Palestinian extremist group Hamas and conspiring to support terrorism from the United States.

Bridgeview businessman Muhammad Salah swallowed hard and visibly fought back tears of joy as the jury acquitted him and co-defendant Abdelhaleem Ashqar of the most serious charges in the landmark case.

Salah and Ashqar, a business professor living outside Washington, D.C., were found not guilty of the racketeering charges that could have resulted in life prison terms. The men were convicted of lesser charges including obstruction of justice, and their lawyers promised to fight to keep them out of prison altogether when they are sentenced in June.

Salah hugged his family and supporters and raised his arms in victory as he left the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse to applause.

"The terrorism theory is defeated," he said as he left. "We are not terrorists, and everyone can see it."

The case was among the first to level allegations that America was being used as a fundraising base for a government-designated terrorist organization, but it was built largely on evidence that was more than a decade old. Some of that evidence was gathered in Israel—including what the defense contended was Salah's coerced confession—and involved conduct that occurred in the early 1990s, before the U.S. had given Hamas the terror designation.

Former U.S. Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft had announced the charges against Salah and Ashqar in a 2004 news conference in Chicago that heralded a significant shift in the Justice Department's approach to allegations about domestic support for foreign militant groups.

But Salah's lawyers said their win shows the government was overreaching.

"It's a huge victory—what's left is a relatively minor charge," said Salah's lawyer, Michael Deutsch. "I think the jury rejected this idea that you can criminalize this kind of organizing activity under RICO [Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act] in the U.S.," he said. "It's a stretch."

Leaders of the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI in Chicago disagreed, and said the outcome of the Salah trial would do nothing to dissuade them from using the same tools again to fight terrorist organizations with branches or operatives here.

"This case is not going to prevent us from aggressively pursuing terrorism and terrorism financing cases," said Gary Shapiro, first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago

That includes the unprecedented use of Israeli agents to testify against defendants, as they did against Salah and Ashqar.

DOJ_NMG_0126416

"We don't believe we would have received guilty verdicts on all the other counts if it had not been for their testimony, which put all the conduct of the defendants into perspective," he said.

Jurors deliberated for 14 days over three weeks before finding Salah, a 53-year-old grocer, not guilty of conspiring to provide funding, recruiting, training and other aid to Hamas, a group responsible for dozens of terrorist attacks in Israel, Gaza and the West Bank. He was convicted of obstruction for lying under oath when questioned in a civil suit filed by the family of David Boim, an American student killed in a Hamas shooting.

$156 million awarded

In 2004, a federal jury awarded Boim's parents $156 million after finding that Salah provided support to Hamas.

Ashqar, 48, had been accused of archiving and distributing key documents and acting as a kind of switchboard who connected Hamas members across the globe to one another through his home telephone. He was convicted of obstruction and criminal contempt for refusing in 1998 to testify before a grand jury

Jurors said they were not divided, and simply applied the evidence presented in the three-month trial to the law they were given.

"There was a lot of evidence to go through, a lot of documentary evidence to go through," said juror Max Lapertosa, a lawyer for Access Living, a disabilities advocacy and services organization in Chicago. "The law was complex. In the end I think we came up with an unanimous verdict that is as fair as we could have possibly rendered."

That evidence included the confession of Salah, an American citizen, provided in 1993 while in the custody of Israel, as well as bank records showing he had received nearly $1 million from top Hamas leader Mousa Abu Marzook.

And the evidence included a trove of documents and wiretaps collected by federal agents in 1993 and 1994 under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA. The act permits electronic surveillance for the purpose of gathering intelligence domestically against people suspected of being foreign agents.

Some of the wiretaps and documents captured under the FISA order were entered as evidence against Salah and Ashqar in a process facilitated by the much-scrutinized Patriot Act.

The case had so many unusual elements that it's not possible to generalize from the results, Shapiro said.

But he said this was not a case about someone innocently sending or taking money overseas to aid charitable events. One of the defense positions in the case was that fundraising efforts were meant to support hospitals and education in the West Bank.

Prosecution cites terror acts

"The evidence in this case was pretty substantial that the money went overseas to aid the military wing of Hamas, and that that money went at least for the ostensible purpose of killing the Israeli military and engaging in other terrorist acts which killed civilians," Shapiro said.

Salah's lawyers also had contended that he was tortured into confessing while in Israeli custody. The prosecution had rejected that claim, and had even brought in former New York Times reporter Judith Miller—who had seen some of the interrogation—to testify about Salah's condition.

At the Mosque Foundation in Bridgeview on Thursday, Muslims who worship with Salah celebrated the verdict. They said it shows Muslims can find justice in the American legal system.

"Our community will no longer have to be afraid," said Amira Daoud. "I'm so glad that American people—his peers—gave a verdict that shows he couldn't have done this."

Leaders of Jewish advocacy groups expressed disappointment over the acquittals on the most serious charges.

"The fact that the charges were not sustained is a setback for the international fight against terrorism, plus for the public's understanding of how terrorist organizations can take advantage of the openness of democratic societies," said Yehudit Barsky of the American Jewish Committee in New York.

But they took some consolation in Salah's conviction for lying under oath in the Boim litigation.

"There is no escaping the fact that both of these individuals [Salah and Ashqar] were deeply involved with Hamas," said lawyer Steve Landes, who represented the Boim family at the trial.

Notified of the verdict, Boim's father, Stanley, said he was "at a loss for words."

"We have to hope that for people who do evil, justice will be done," he said from Jerusalem.

Salah relatives pleased

Salah's relatives said the jury's verdict shows Salah and Ashqar were only engaged in legal conduct, supporting Hamas' charitable work in gatherings protected by the U.S. Constitution.

Salah was forced to talk to Israeli interrogators and give a handwritten statement admitting he acted as the military commander of Hamas from his home in Bridgeview, they said.

Prosecutors had argued that Salah's confession to Israeli authorities was voluntary and included corroborating facts.

DOJ_NMG_0126417

"They were basically trying to do Israel's work," Salah's cousin, Abdullah Salah, said of the government. "They were using Israeli agents, [coerced] confessions, in an American courtroom. It's un-American."

"We are not terrorists. We are not bad people," said Mahmoud Salah, Salah's brother. "We came to this country to be free.

"Now we thank God because it is over."

2 Men Cleared Of Charges Of Aiding Hamas Violence (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

CHICAGO, Feb. 1 — Two men were acquitted Thursday of federal charges that they provided money and other aid to the Palestinian organization Hamas in the early 1990s.

The racketeering case against the men, Muhammad Salah, 53, a onetime grocer from suburban Chicago, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former university professor from suburban Washington, was announced with much fanfare in 2004 by the United States attorney general at the time, John Ashcroft, as an important part of the government's fight against terrorism.

But Thursday afternoon, after a three-month trial and 14 days of deliberations, a jury of seven women and five men rejected the core of the government's case and acquitted Mr. Salah and Dr. Ashqar of the most serious charge brought under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, that the two men used United States bank accounts to funnel money to Hamas's military leaders and were therefore responsible for the group's violent tactics against Israel.

The jury convicted the men of lesser charges, including obstruction of justice and, for Dr. Ashqar, criminal contempt.

Both men smiled and wept after the verdict, hugging and thanking family members and supporters in the packed and heavily secured downtown courtroom. "We are not terrorists," Mr. Salah told reporters in the lobby of the courthouse, his young son perched on his shoulders.

Defense lawyers said the verdict was a blow to what they called the United States government's decision to litigate the dispute between Israel and the Palestinians in American courtrooms.

"The government has tried to turn the Israeli-Palestinian conflict into something criminal," said William Moffitt, who is Dr. Ashqar's lawyer. "Maybe the government will get it in their heads that the conflict won't be settled in the criminal courts of the United States."

Prosecutors said they accepted the jury's decision, but also stood by the evidence they presented at trial.

"This was about an organization that has publicly claimed credit over and over and over again for terrorist acts," said Gary S. Shapiro, the first assistant United States attorney in Chicago, "not just acts against the Israeli military, but acts against civilians where Americans and foreign nationals were killed."

Prosecutors based their accusations against Mr. Salah on a 1993 confession he made while in the custody of the Israeli secret police, who arrested him at a checkpoint in the Gaza Strip and found $97,000 in his hotel room. Mr. Salah told the Israeli police that he had met with top Hamas military officials and given them money. He spent nearly five years in an Israeli prison.

Defense lawyers argued that the confession was false and obtained only after Mr. Salah endured weeks of torture by the Israeli agents.

The case against Dr. Ashqar centered on recorded telephone conversations he had with Hamas officials and records seized in the early 1990s from his home in Oxford, Miss., while he was a graduate student at the University of Mississippi.

Throughout the trial, both defendants denied membership in Hamas, which they pointed out had not been designated a terrorist organization by the United States government until 1997. They maintained that their interactions with the organization were humanitarian in nature, intended only to finance charities and help impoverished Palestinians living under Israeli occupation.

Federal Jury In Chicago Acquits 2 Men Of Racketeering Conspiracy In Hamas Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 2, 2007

(AP) - CHICAGO-Two men accused of furnishing money and fresh recruits to the militant Palestinian group Hamas were acquitted Thursday of racketeering but convicted on lesser charges.

The two men beamed broadly at the split verdict and defense attorneys immediately declared victory in the three-month trial that the government had described as a major component in its war on terrorism.

"We are not terrorists," former grocer Muhammad Salah told reporters as he left the courthouse with his 8-year-old son, Ibrahim, on his shoulders. "I feel good," he said as he was hugged by relatives and well wishers. "I thank God and I hope justice will prevail."

"This is a great day for justice," said Salah's attorney, Michael E. Deutsch.

DOJ_NMG_0126418

Salah, 53, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a one-time assistant business professor at Howard University in Washington, had been accused of laundering money for Hamas terrorists fighting to topple the Israeli government.

Defense attorneys portrayed the men as freedom fighters, comparing them to Nelson Mandela, Malcolm X and the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

Salah and Ashqar, who lives in Springfield, Virginia, have always denied being members of Hamas. But they have made no secret of their dislike of the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza.

Salah was convicted of obstruction of justice for providing false answers to questions in a civil suit filed by parents of an American teenager who was shot and killed by Hamas terrorists at an Israeli bus stop.

Ashqar was convicted of obstruction of justice and criminal contempt for refusing to testify before a federal grand jury after receiving immunity from prosecution for anything that he might have revealed.

The jury delivered the verdict amid heavy security in the courtroom after deliberating for 14 days.

"We've convicted them - it's hard to say that we're disappointed," First Assistant U.S. Attorney Gary Shapiro said.

Defense attorneys said they hoped to have the convictions reversed on appeal but added that, at worst, the men would likely serve comparatively short sentences.

Also charged in the case is Abu Mousa Marzook, described as one of the top leaders of Hamas. Prosecutors said it was Marzook who sent Salah on his mission to Israel and supplied him with money to give to Hamas leaders.

FBI agents also intercepted phone calls between Ashqar and Marzook.

Marzook is currently living in Damascus, Syria, and is classified by the government as a fugitive.

U.S. Senators Briefed On Arar But Say They Have A Lot More Questions (CP)

Canadian Press, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (CP) - Two U.S. senators who have been briefed on the Maher Arar case say they have a lot more questions.

But Democrat Patrick Leahy and and Republican Arlen Specter clammed up about what they were told by Justice Department officials today during a meeting that lasted an hour and 40 minutes.

They say the information is classified but wanted to assure people that the file was receiving a lot of congressional oversight.

The two senators say they want to know more about why Arar was sent to Syria and why the United States won't take him off its security watch list when he's been completely exonerated in Canada.

Leahy also wants the Government Accountability Office to look into Arar's case. The office is already conducting a study of how people make it onto the U.S. no-fly list.

Leahy angrily demanded answers from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a public hearing last month, saying the case was a black mark on the United States.

Chinese Official Publishes Rebuke Of Bush (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 1 — A senior Chinese government official issued a rare public rebuke of President Bush on Thursday, accusing him of waging a “unilateral” battle against terrorists that had worsened global tensions.

The official, Ye Xiaowen, director of China’s State Bureau of Religious Affairs, said in a front-page article in the overseas edition of The People’s Daily that Mr. Bush’s past references to a “crusade” and to “Islamic fascism” were verbal gaffes that revealed his effort to turn the fight against terrorism into a religious war.

Partly as a result, he said, the United States had lost support for the war in Iraq and had frittered away the good will Americans gained after the 9/11 attacks.

“The more they oppose terrorism, the more terror they produce,” Mr. Ye said in the article. “How many more troops will they send to die in the meat grinder” of Iraq.

Mr. Ye wrote that Mr. Bush had effectively “hijacked” one religion, Christianity, to engage in a battle against another one, Islam. That has strengthened Islamic fundamentalists and made the war unwinnable, he contended.

“Unilateralism and terrorism breed each other, but neither can overcome the other,” he wrote.

While such assessments of Mr. Bush’s leadership are not new among his opponents in the United States and abroad, Chinese officials generally take pains to maintain cordial relations with Washington. Beijing remained on the sidelines when the United States invaded Iraq, and Chinese officials have refrained from commenting extensively on the difficulties the American military has faced there.

DOJ_NMG_0126419

Even when China opposes American policies, it is rare for a sitting official to cast aspersions on an American president by name, a step often considered a breach of diplomatic etiquette.

It is unclear if Mr. Ye cleared his comments with other top leaders before publishing them in the overseas edition of the newspaper, the Communist Party's most authoritative publication.

Mr. Ye's bureau manages China's official Christian, Buddhist and Islamic associations. The associations regulate religious practice in China, which is officially atheist.

In the past, Mr. Ye has clashed with American officials who have pressed China to allow greater religious freedom, and he has tended to speak bluntly when defending religious policies.

The American Embassy in Beijing did not offer any immediate response to Mr. Ye's article.

Beijing at least initially embraced the American-led fight against terrorists. Human rights groups say China has used Mr. Bush's policies to justify a broader crackdown on its Muslim Uighur population in the western region of Xinjiang, where it says separatist groups operate.

Yet even as that crackdown has continued, the Chinese religious authorities have sought to improve relations with Islamic nations and Islamic religious leaders at home and abroad.

Last year, the Foreign Ministry officially condemned Danish cartoons that Muslims considered an insult to the Prophet Muhammad. This year, Chinese propaganda officials have ordered the Chinese news media to play down images or references to pigs ahead of the Year of the Pig in the Chinese zodiac, because China's Hui Muslim minority considers pigs offensive.

Mr. Ye suggested that Mr. Bush follow China's more accommodating approach. Mr. Bush should "abandon unilateralism" and "respect that differences can exist in harmony," Mr. Ye wrote.

Poster Of Hussein At Guantánamo Draws Detainee Complaints (NYT)

By David Rohde

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

Military officials have removed a poster of Saddam Hussein from the American detention center in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, after complaints from a detainee that it was intended to intimidate the prisoners there.

Lawyers for the detainee said the 7-by-3-foot poster, in a small recreation area for prisoners, featured images of Mr. Hussein being sentenced to death and a heading in Arabic that stated, "Because Saddam chose not to cooperate and not to tell the truth, because he thought by lying he would get released, for that reason he was executed."

The chief military spokesman in Guantánamo, Cmdr. Robert Durand, said the lawyers' description of the statement on the poster was inaccurate, but he declined to give its exact wording.

"A recent poster showed Saddam Hussein's capture, court appearances and sentencing," Commander Durand said in an e-mail message. "The intent of this poster was to show that the Iraqi people are making progress and have delivered justice."

Commander Durand said that the poster had been removed and that the military regretted that the "language of this poster appeared insensitive."

Lawyers for the detainee who complained, David Hicks, an Australian who was captured in Afghanistan in 2001, said news articles about Mr. Hussein's execution were also displayed in the recreation area. Other articles described the accidental decapitation of a Hussein co-defendant in a subsequent hanging.

"I have no doubt that those were put up for a particular reason," said Joshua L. Dratel, one of Mr. Hicks's lawyers. "For psychological warfare and for mental torture and intimidation."

Commander Durand said the articles had not been intended to intimidate prisoners. "The news photos that appear in the stories are neither graphic nor sensational," he said. "A BBC news article describing Saddam Hussein's execution, with a photo of him prior to his hanging, was included in the camp news."

Since the camp's opening, American military officials have displayed posters they created in Arabic and other languages that conveyed news events. Lawyers for the detainees said they focused on the arrests of terrorism suspects and the deaths of Iraqi and Afghan insurgents. Military officials described the posters as balanced.

In the past, military officials barred lawyers for the prisoners from describing outside events to them or giving them news articles.

The articles on Mr. Hussein were displayed under a new policy in which the American military posts a weekly collection of news reports in recreation areas around the prison, Commander Durand said.

DOJ_NMG_0126420

Travel Logs Aid Germans' Kidnap Probe (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

BERLIN, Feb. 1 -- If not for the pit stops on a Mediterranean resort island, where they relaxed in four-star hotels and went to the spa for a massage, the CIA operatives who now face arrest on kidnapping charges in Germany would have remained safely in the shadows, according to German prosecutors.

German investigators said they received detailed records of the intelligence agents' stopovers on the Spanish island of Palma de Mallorca from Spanish police last year. The documents, which included the operatives' passport numbers, hotel bills and aviation records, enabled prosecutors to identify a CIA abduction crew that allegedly kidnapped Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen, in a bungled counterterrorism operation in early 2004.

On Wednesday, prosecutors in Munich announced that a German court had issued arrest warrants for 13 people it named as CIA operatives involved in the Masri kidnapping. While most of the people used aliases and their true identities remain unclear, German authorities said the Spanish records provided a critical break and kept the investigation alive.

"It made it possible for us to identify specific individuals and to connect them with the kidnapping case," said Christian Schmidt-Sommerfeld, the chief Munich prosecutor, in a statement disclosing the warrants. "This information as well as other investigative evidence now leads to the grounds of suspicion against these 13 distinctly identifiable individuals."

It's not the first time that CIA officers have left a long trail of clues during an undercover counterterrorism operation in Europe. Italian prosecutors charged 25 CIA operatives and a U.S. Air Force officer with kidnapping a radical cleric in Milan in 2003 after investigators traced their cellphone logs and frequent-flier records. They also found that the operatives had racked up more than $150,000 in expenses while in Italy, including long stays at $500-a-night hotels.

Records of the other team's stopovers at Palma de Mallorca were gathered by the Guardia Civil, a Spanish police agency that has investigated the CIA's use of the island as a staging ground for other counterterrorism operations in Europe and North Africa. Some of the records were provided to The Washington Post by Human Rights Watch, a New York-based advocacy group that has investigated extralegal abductions by CIA counterterrorism squads.

A CIA spokesman at headquarters in Langley, Va., declined comment for this article.

Aviation records show that the CIA operatives arrived at Palma de Mallorca at 10 p.m. Jan. 22, 2004, from Algiers. They spent the night at the Marriott Son Antem Golf Resort and Spa, paying $175 each for a room, including breakfast. One male member of the team, who stayed in Room 216, was billed for $85 worth of massages and a $23 bar tab. He and the others paid with their Visa cards.

The next day, the CIA crew departed in a privately chartered Boeing 737 for Skopje, Macedonia, where Masri had been detained secretly for three weeks by Macedonian security agents on suspicion of involvement with a terrorist network, according to German prosecutors. The plane stayed on the ground for less than six hours before departing with Masri on board, heading first to Baghdad and then to Kabul.

Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, said he was kept in a secret CIA prison that was known as the Salt Pit and interrogated about Islamic radicals in Germany before his captors realized they had the wrong man. He said he was flown back to the Balkans five months later, released on a hillside in Albania and warned to keep his mouth shut.

After delivering him to Afghanistan, the CIA operatives flew back to Palma de Mallorca after a brief stopover in Romania, aviation records show. The team spent three more nights on the Spanish island before returning to Washington. For the flight home, they ordered a shrimp cocktail for the pilot and two bottles of Pesquera red wine, according to invoices from the ground services crew at the Palma airport.

John Sifton, a senior researcher on counterterrorism for Human Rights Watch, said the operatives may have taken a carefree approach because they assumed they were being protected by European intelligence partners. Masri, for instance, was handed over to the CIA by Macedonian security agents. And in the Milan kidnapping case, top officials with the Italian military intelligence agency known as Sismi have been charged with conspiring with the CIA.

"I suppose they never expected there would be a flap about all this or else they would have been more cautious," Sifton said. "When you think a local government is cooperating with you in your criminal activities, you're probably less careful."

U.S. officials have never publicly admitted guilt or responsibility in the Masri case, and the U.S. Justice Department has refused to cooperate with requests for information from German prosecutors.

Masri sued the CIA for damages in U.S. District Court in Virginia. His complaint was dismissed in May on grounds that the lawsuit could generate revelations that would damage national security. Masri is appealing. His attorneys said the recent revelations from Europe show that the secrecy concerns are moot.

DOJ_NMG_0126421

"It renders even more far-fetched the argument that every single development in this case is a state secret," said Ben Wizner, an ACLU lawyer who is representing Masri in his lawsuit.

Staff researcher Julie Tate in Washington contributed to this report.

Neighbors Of British Terror Suspects Skeptical Of Charges (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

BIRMINGHAM, England, Feb. 1 — Many residents in the area where nine people were arrested and accused of planning to kidnap, torture and behead a British Muslim soldier said Thursday that they were unconvinced of the accusations against them.

By most neighborhood accounts, for example, one suspect, Amjad Mahmood, is a father of two in his late 20s who has worked tirelessly to keep his father's grocery business going and who has shown no discernible interest in Islamic affairs.

He is cleanshaven, wears jeans and, like some young men in the Alum Rock section of this diverse city, seems more secular than religious, people who know him said. He rarely attended the mosque a block away from his house, they said.

For those reasons, and because of recent instances of the British police arresting suspects and then releasing them for lack of evidence linking them to terrorism, people here said they were not convinced of the accusations against Mr. Mahmood and the other eight suspects. The public and startling nature of the arrests in predawn raids made them angry and dismayed, they said.

In what the British authorities called a joint operation by the security service MI5, a newly formed West Midlands counterterrorism team and West Midlands police, the nine men were arrested in raids in poor, mainly South Asian neighborhoods of Birmingham, Britain's second-largest city, with one million people.

Pakistanis, Bangladeshis, Kashmiris and, recently, Somalis dominate the areas where the men were arrested. Birmingham, where a central area of recent urban redevelopment contrasts with the poor ethnic areas, is 14.3 percent Muslim, seventh highest among areas measured in Britain, according to the Office of National Statistics.

The neighborhoods of Sparkhill and Alum Rock are lined with often run-down but still neat Victorian-era two-story row houses that show pride with limited means. Some boast carved stone lintels, and many are decorated with lace-trimmed white curtains in their front windows.

The police shut and searched the Maktabah al-Ansar Islamic bookstore, a purveyor of radical Islamic books and tapes. They also closed the Blades Cyber Cafe and the Khan General Store. The police did not release the names of those arrested. Newspaper reports here described one of the suspects as the owner of a pizza shop.

A neighbor of Mr. Mahmood's said it was possible that Mr. Mahmood, whose father came to Britain from Pakistan, became the "victim of a bunch of bad lads."

"He had quite a few Arab friends, that's the only thing, looking back on it," said the neighbor, Amad Altaf, 30, a university student.

There seemed to be surprise in the neighborhoods that the supposed plot involved killing a British Muslim soldier. Indeed, a British Muslim soldier, Lance Cpl. Jabron Hashmi, 24, was killed in fighting against the Taliban in Afghanistan last year. Since the arrests, British television has shown pictures of a Lance Corporal Hashmi, and some newspaper reports said a commemoration of his death was held last week.

About 330 Muslims serve among the 180,000 members of the British armed forces. In an effort to increase the proportion, the army has held recruitment drives in recent years in South Asian neighborhoods, though to little effect, people here said.

Under British terrorism laws, police can detain suspects for up to 28 days without bringing formal charges.

Mohammad Khan, a friend of one of the suspects who is a lecturer in the department of education at the University of Birmingham, said that he had hired a lawyer for his friend and that the lawyer had visited the suspect in custody on Thursday. Mr. Khan declined to identify the suspect, saying only that he was "a very caring person" who had helped in antidrug programs.

Mr. Khan said the arrests put a spotlight on the lack of government services in the South Asian neighborhoods.

According to a survey by the Birmingham Voluntary Services Council, the Alum Rock and Sparkhill neighborhoods ranked highest on the "inequality index," Mr. Khan said.

The Sparkhill area where the Maktabah bookshop is located had the highest rate of unemployed university graduates in Birmingham, he said. That meant, he said, "You jump through all the hoops and you don't go anywhere."

The Labor government has poured money into religiously based community organizations since the terrorist bombings in July 2005 that killed 56 people, including 4 bombers, Mr. Kahn said. But the grants were unevenly distributed if the goal was to improve livelihoods in mainly poor and Muslim areas, he said. The grants went to 900 Christian groups, 400 interfaith groups and fewer than 300 Muslim organizations, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0126422

"They fund according to old relationships," said Mr. Kahn, who was invited by the American Embassy in London to visit the United States last year as part of a State Department program on conflict resolution. "They need to encourage Muslim organizations that offer something other than representation."

More effort should be put into promoting scholarships for Muslim youth, and offering counseling services, he said. There were almost no youth centers in the areas, he said.

A prototype of what can be done opened recently in the Sparkbrook neighborhood not far from Alum Rock: a gym for women run by women. Called Saheli Women's Group Gym — saheli means "best friend" in the Urdu language — the gym serves women who had nowhere to go outside their homes, said Naseem Akhtar, its founder. Many of the women who used the gym were conservative in their Islamic beliefs, wearing black robes and veils that showed only their eyes, she said.

Until the arrests on Wednesday, Birmingham had escaped the notoriety that has befallen a number of Muslim areas in Britain since the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States and the July 2005 bombing in London.

Last year, for example, in dramatic raids conducted by 250 policemen in the neighborhood of Forest Gate in East London, two Muslim men were arrested on suspicion of planning a terrorist attack. One was shot and had to be hospitalized. But both were released after no evidence was found to justify formal charges.

The chairman of the Birmingham Central Mosque, Mohammed Naseem, said the attention from the arrests was unwelcome because it was based on what he called the un-British notion of arresting people on the basis of suspicion.

But Dr. Naseem, 82, an outspoken critic of American foreign policy who confronted the American ambassador, Robert H. Tuttle, on Iraq during the ambassador's visit to the mosque last year, said he was concerned about "Muslim nationalism." This "Muslim nationalism" had developed among some of his constituents since 9/11 and was based "not on morality, but my nation right or wrong," he said. "That's the dangerous element, and we're trying to counteract it."

Bank Group Is Told To Halt Flow Of Data To U.S. Officials (NYT)

By Agence France-presse

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

BRUSSELS, Feb. 1 (Agence France-Presse) — The European Central Bank must take action by April to stop the transfer of personal information from Swift, the bank-data consortium, to American authorities for use in antiterrorism investigations, a regulatory agency said Thursday.

The agency, the European Data Protection Supervisor, told the bank to come up with measures "to make its payment operations fully compliant with data-protection legislation," urging it to "take appropriate measures as soon as possible."

Swift, the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, deals with trillions of dollars in global transactions daily between nearly 8,000 financial institutions in more than 200 countries.

It has come under scrutiny for taking part in an American program that allows analysts from the Central Intelligence Agency and other agencies to search for possible terrorist financing activity among the confidential financial transactions that Swift oversees.

The Bush administration has defended the once-secret program, which began after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States. But critics in Europe contend that it places American security interests ahead of European civil liberties.

Under European Union rules, information on money transfers can be used only for banking purposes and not for other uses, like combating terrorism.

No More Renditions (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

THERE ARE PLENTY of legal and moral reasons why the CIA shouldn't be snatching terrorism suspects off the streets of Europe and shipping them to unsavory countries to be tortured. But there is a simple, practical reason why the Bush administration should forthrightly repudiate its disastrous rendition policy: The United States cannot prevent terrorist attacks without help from its European allies, and they will be less inclined to cooperate when confronted with a policy they rightly believe to be beyond the pale.

After the disgrace of Abu Ghraib and the ongoing international furor over the indefinite detentions at Guantanamo Bay, the Bush administration cannot afford further self-inflicted damage to it's prestige. But this week, the bills for rendition came due when a German court issued arrest warrants for 13 Americans accused in the Keystone Kops kidnapping of a German citizen — the wrong man, as it turned out. Khaled Masri was imprisoned and abused in Afghanistan for five months before being released without charge.

DOJ_NMG_0126423

In Italy, prosecutors are also reportedly seeking to indict 25 CIA operatives for kidnapping an Islamic cleric in Milan and sending him to Egypt for alleged torture. Sweden too has been burned by cooperating with U.S. renditions. In December 2001, it handed over to CIA operatives two asylum-seekers accused of terrorism. They were sent back to Egypt where, despite promises to Sweden that they would be properly treated, both also were allegedly tortured.

Continental opposition to U.S. foreign policy is hardly breaking news. But that doesn't mean in this case that the furious European electorates are wrong. Due process remains a fundamental Western value, and outrage about violations is a sign of democratic health, not political opportunism. It did not smooth matters that the White House initially denied that any such practices were being used.

It's not as if the Bush administration can claim that renditions from Western Europe have produced life-saving intelligence. (We would have probably heard about the successes by now, if a plausible case could be made.) Even if they had, it's unlikely that the positive effects would outweigh the negative impact of having Washington's most important law enforcement allies — countries that have large Muslim populations known to periodically shelter and incubate terrorists — turn sour on collective policing and prevention efforts.

The administration needs to gain cooperation with local authorities before snatching suspects, ban the outsourcing of torture and keep its word to allied governments about the treatment of detainees. We damage the cause of fighting terrorism together when we don't respect European laws. There can be no more disappearances, no more renditions and no more Masris.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Intelligence Pick Says He'd Fight Manipulation (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's pick for director of national intelligence told senators Thursday that he'll blow the whistle on the president or any other official who tries to skew intelligence reports for political purposes.

"There have been a number of occasions in my career when I had to not be popular but to speak truth to power," J. Michael McConnell told the Senate Intelligence Committee at a hearing on his nomination.

"I've lived it, I've learned it, I believe it and I can only tell you that's what I'll do," he said.

McConnell's comments came as committee Democrats, including Ron Wyden of Oregon and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, repeated now-familiar charges that the Bush administration had "cherry picked" intelligence about threats posed by Iraq in 2003.

If confirmed, McConnell said, he would inform committee members if that occurs.

McConnell was nominated last month to replace John Negroponte as the overseer of all 16 federal agencies that collect or analyze intelligence. The 2-year-old position was created as part of changes recommended by a presidential commission that examined government failures that preceded the 9/11 attacks.

On other issues, McConnell promised to:

• Review security rules from the World War II and Cold War eras that make it difficult for intelligence agencies to hire foreign-language specialists whose families include non-citizens.

• Consider a first-of-its-kind audit of spending by individual agencies.

• Not use outside contractors in sensitive jobs such as interrogators.

• Support the committee's attempts to get documents that would test conclusions of intelligence agencies.

McConnell, 63, served 29 years as a Navy intelligence officer, including serving as intelligence officer to the Joint Chiefs of Staff during the 1991 Persian Gulf War. From 1992 until his retirement in 1996, McConnell directed the National Security Agency, which performs satellite spying as well as electronic surveillance.

Judge Explains His Dismissal Of Scientist's Suit Against Times (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — A federal judge who dismissed a defamation lawsuit against The New York Times acted after concluding that the scientist who brought the case, a bioterrorism expert investigated over deadly anthrax mailings in 2001, was a public official and could not show that the newspaper had knowingly published false information.

DOJ_NMG_0126424

In an opinion released Thursday, the judge, Claude M. Hilton of the Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va., laid out the reasons for his order last month dismissing a long-running case brought by Steven J. Hatfill, a specialist in biological weapons. Dr. Hatfill's lawsuit said a series of columns by Nicholas D. Kristof about the anthrax mailings had defamed him.

Mark A. Grannis, a lawyer for Dr. Hatfill, said Judge Hilton's opinion was unsurprising and was not the last word in the case.

"The opinion is more or less what we expected, given the judge's earlier statements," Mr. Grannis said. "We will appeal, and we expect to prevail."

Mr. Kristof wrote about a government scientist whom he initially identified as Mr. Z, saying this scientist had become the overwhelming focus of the investigation into the anthrax attacks. Then, in August 2002, Mr. Kristof wrote that Dr. Hatfill, formerly with the Army bioweapons center at Fort Detrick, Md., had come forward to identify himself as Mr. Z and say the news media had treated him unfairly.

Five people died in the anthrax attacks. Federal authorities identified Dr. Hatfill as a "person of interest" in the investigation but never charged him with any crime. The attacks remain unsolved.

Judge Hilton's opinion, which was dated Tuesday, said Dr. Hatfill could be considered both a "public official" and a "public figure" and therefore would have to meet a higher burden of proof than would a private figure in order to prevail in a defamation suit. Under that higher burden, a public figure bringing suit must demonstrate that the writer acted with "actual malice" — that is, either knew that what he was writing was false or had "a high degree of awareness" that it probably was.

The judge said Dr. Hatfill was a public official because even after he left his formal government position, he continued to perform official functions as a federal contractor. At the time Mr. Kristof wrote about the case, Dr. Hatfill was receiving federal money to work on national defense programs, the judge said.

The opinion said Dr. Hatfill was also a public figure, holding himself out as an expert on bioterrorism and granting interviews to a variety of news organizations.

Judge Hilton described at length the government's inquiry into the case and its focus on Dr. Hatfill. He disclosed that the F.B.I. had searched Dr. Hatfill's car and a condominium owned by his girlfriend and had seized several items, including "notes regarding the anthrax mailings, a spinner flask of anthrax stimulant and a container of Cipro." A spinner flask could be used to study the properties of anthrax, and Cipro is an antibiotic used to treat a variety of ailments, including anthrax poisoning.

Judge Explains Tossing Out Suit Against N.Y. Times (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

A series of New York Times columns that explored whether a former Army scientist was responsible for the 2001 anthrax attacks were "cautiously worded" and asserted that the scientist could be innocent, a federal judge wrote in explaining why he decided to dismiss a lawsuit against the paper.

Columnist Nicholas D. Kristof did not act with malice and did not believe his columns about Steven J. Hatfill were false, according to the opinion by U.S. District Judge Claude M. Hilton in Alexandria. Last month, Hilton said he would throw out -- for the second time -- the defamation suit Hatfill filed against the paper. An opinion explaining his reasoning was released Tuesday.

Although the columns identified Hatfill as a "likely culprit" in the deadly anthrax-spore mailings, Kristof "made efforts to avoid implicating his guilt," Hilton wrote. "Mr. Kristof reminded readers to assume plaintiff's innocence, and highlighted the fact that plaintiff was viewed by his family and friends as a patriot who could not have perpetrated the crime in question."

The opinion weighs heavily on the side of Kristof, who has been fighting the lawsuit that Hatfill filed in 2004. Hatfill accused the paper of defaming him and ruining his reputation in the columns. Authorities have identified Hatfill as a "person of interest" in the anthrax mailings that killed five people and sickened 17, but no one has been charged.

Kristof said last night that he was "really pleased that the judge recognized the importance of this kind of reporting" and called it "terrific to have a judgment that protects journalism at a time when the press has had a fair number of rulings against it."

The columnist said he was surprised at the "burden" of fighting a lawsuit. "There are just hundreds of hours that I've had to spend and vast amounts of money the Times has had to spend," he said.

Mark A. Grannis, an attorney for Hatfill, said the opinion "is more or less what we expected, given the judge's earlier statements." He said Hatfill will appeal and "expects to prevail."

Hilton's opinion recounted parts of the government's investigation of Hatfill and said FBI searches of his apartment, his car and a condominium owned by his girlfriend recovered among other things "a spinner flask of anthrax stimulant" and a container of Cipro, an antibiotic commonly prescribed for anthrax. Hatfill had previously said the Cipro was for a lingering sinus infection.

DOJ_NMG_0126425

Another attorney for Hatfill, Thomas Connolly, said yesterday that the stimulant was "a pesticide that can be purchased at any hardware store in America" and that Hatfill used it to train first responders in identifying a biological agent like anthrax. Hatfill had provided briefings to government officials and law enforcement agencies about biological weapons.

In the 2002 columns, Kristof said the FBI had failed to aggressively pursue a scientist he first identified as "Mr. Z." He wrote that the biodefense community had called Mr. Z a "likely culprit," partly because the scientist was familiar with anthrax.

Kristof later acknowledged that Hatfill was Mr. Z and wrote that Hatfill deserved the "presumption of innocence."

Hilton first threw out the case in 2004, ruling that Kristof accurately reported that the scientist was a focus of the FBI probe.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit reinstated the suit in 2005 and said Kristof's columns could be read as blaming Hatfill for the attacks.

Homeland Security Moves To Increase Armed Pilots (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

Homeland Security officials are making changes to the armed-pilot program to encourage more of the nation's 90,000 captains and co-captains to participate.

Armed pilots will be issued badges to identify themselves, they will be allowed to carry their weapons on flights they are not piloting, and U.S. officials will seek to expand the program for overseas flights.

Conan Bruce, spokesman for the Federal Air Marshal Service, which now operates the armed-pilot program, said the changes are in response to a working group that has been meeting for months to address pilots' concerns.

"We recognize there is a need to carry a weapon on international flights, but we have to work it out with host countries; it's not up to us," Mr. Bruce said.

But David Mackett, director of the Airline Pilots Security Alliance, doesn't expect a quick fix for a program that has attracted less than 10 percent of pilots.

"Maybe at some point, we will protect a handful of international flights, but the public should not feel secure that it will happen any time soon," Mr. Mackett said.

"Changes are coming at a glacial pace, and there seems to be no sense of urgency. The terrorist clock is ticking, and we need to be doing this now, not a year from now."

Federal air marshals, who number about 2,000, say they are concerned the agency will cut back their numbers as a cost-saving measure and instead turn to pilots to protect the aircraft.

Mr. Bruce said such a proposal is "absolutely not" under consideration.

Pilots are "an enhancement, not a replacement, they have totally separately and unique jobs," he said.

However, such a suggestion is coming from Capitol Hill, said one source familiar with the proposal.

"It is being advocated they use resources that are already in place, and that's the pilots, and use air marshals on targeted, high-risk and threat flights rather than scattered throughout the system like they are now," the source said.

"The air marshals are too elite of a group to be used like security guards," the source said.

One burden lifted is the rule that pilots commuting or "deadheading" on a flight no longer must pack their weapon separately in a lock box in the cargo hold.

Mr. Bruce declined to specify the rule, citing security reasons.

Little Progress Seen For Poorest After Hurricane (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

ATLANTA, Feb. 1 — The recovery from Hurricane Katrina has stagnated for the poorest families displaced by the storm, a new study shows. Many still suffer from a significant loss of income, a higher-than-normal rate of chronic diseases like hypertension and an exponential rise in mental health problems among children.

The study, conducted in the Gulf Coast region of Mississippi a year after the storm by the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University and the Children's Health Fund, showed no improvement since a survey in Louisiana six months earlier.

Among the new study's findings are that more than a third of working families earning less than $20,000 a year before the storm have not regained their previous income level; almost twice as many families are dependent on public assistance; and diagnoses of depression and anxiety among children have increased fourfold.

DOJ_NMG_0126426

School absenteeism remains high, with more than a third of children missing 10 or more days of class in April, May or June of 2006. Families with specific needs like food or household items found help far more easily than those who needed legal help, child care or mental health care.

Among adults, the rate of hypertension diagnoses increased by more than a third after the storm in August 2005, and more than 44 percent of parents or guardians tested "very low" on a basic mental health test. About 13 percent said they were coping "not very well or not at all" with the daily demands of parenting, significantly higher than the 1.5 percent who chose that answer in the 2003 National Survey of Children's Health, which the researchers used as a benchmark.

Nearly 40 percent of the respondents said they had been working before the storm but were now unemployed.

Dr. Irwin Redlener, the director of the National Center for Disaster Preparedness at the Mailman school and co-founder of the Children's Health Fund, said the survey results showed a lack of leadership in a relief effort marked by scattershot private efforts that resulted in an uneven distribution of help. For example, he said, the Children's Health Fund runs three mobile clinics, far from enough to meet the need.

"It's not a lack of money," Dr. Redlener said. "It's a lack of structure; it's a lack of distribution of the resources. We have a completely dysfunctional distribution system, and a great deal of bureaucracy."

The survey was conducted in face-to-face interviews with families living in private trailer parks, in Federal Emergency Management Agency trailer parks, or on their own property, usually in trailers provided by FEMA. The FEMA park residents, who are often isolated by lack of transportation, were the poorest and least financially stable, and the most likely to view their environment as dangerous.

"For all practical purposes, these FEMA trailer parks are in fact internal refugee camps," Dr. Redlener said. "Families are mired in these horrendous conditions with no sense of when this is going to be over, either in the minds of the families or in the officials responsible for them."

David Abramson, the study's principal investigator, identified what he called the "poverty penalty," pointing out that the working poor were far more likely to have lost income since the storm. More than half of those who made less than $10,000 a year in wages or salaries lost that income, compared with 15 percent of those who made $35,000 or more before the storm. Half of those living in FEMA trailer parks had a bank account, and 16 percent had a usable credit card, according to the study.

There were significant differences between the people studied in Mississippi and those in Louisiana. In the new study, 43 percent of the respondents were Mississippi natives, compared to more than 80 percent of the Louisianians. In the FEMA trailer sites in Mississippi, just under half those surveyed were black, compared with nearly 80 percent in Louisiana trailer parks.

Robin Hoods (commentary) (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

Hurricane Katrina was ugly enough, but leave it to Gulf state politicians to guarantee that even a mild future hurricane may cause more human hardship. They're busy rewriting private insurance contracts in such a way that will raise property and casualty rates for everyone, especially if you live near the coast.

In Mississippi, Attorney General Jim Hood has bludgeoned insurer State Farm into a gigantic settlement over hundreds of dubious claims. His populist opportunism is matched by Florida, where legislators have passed a "reform" that forces insurers to lower their premiums and allows the state-run insurer to co-opt the local market.

Mr. Hood has been on a campaign to loot insurers from the first days after Katrina. His complaint is that it is "unconscionable" that insurers have refused to pay for flood damage. Never mind that their contracts specifically contain flood exclusions even as they pay tens of millions for wind damage. This water exclusion has been well known among homeowners and state regulators for years, which is why the federal government offers flood insurance. Mr. Hood nonetheless filed a civil suit and began a criminal probe.

The insurance industry has won a few of these legal skirmishes. But that changed last month when a judge told State Farm to pay a Mississippi couple a $232,000 claim and a jury awarded $2.5 million in punitive damages (since reduced by a judge to $1 million). State Farm is the nation's largest home insurer and has already paid $1.1 billion in Katrina claims in Mississippi alone. But the company looked at its hundreds of other pending suits, did the math, and threw itself on the mercy of Mr. Hood. State Farm agreed to re-open some 35,000 claims it had already settled and to pay at least $50 million more. The insurer also agreed to hand over $80 million to some 640 households represented by tort kingpin Dickie Scruggs.

The one bit of good news is that Federal Judge L.T. Senter Jr. blocked the settlement last week. The judge recognized the deal as an "arbitrary" publicity payout -- long on glory for Mr. Hood but short on the specifics of who would get money. The judge might also have wondered if Mr. Scruggs and his legal team were going to ride off with as much as $46 million.

DOJ_NMG_0126427

The bad news is that the judge left the door open for a revised settlement, which is likely and would do unpleasant things to the state insurance market. Other insurers will feel pressure to follow State Farm's lead and pay the flood ransom. The obvious way to finance these unexpected claims will be to raise premiums for other policy holders, while refusing to sell policies in certain high-risk areas. Mr. Hood is basically stealing from future policy holders in order to pay off his current constituents.

As for Florida, insurers are understandably trying to build up their reserves against the likelihood of larger future payouts. Forecasters are predicting more frequent hurricanes for the state, which could mean hundreds of billions of dollars in claims. So premiums have been rising.

Florida legislators and new GOP Governor Charlie Crist have responded with one of the more un-Republican reforms on Florida's books. The measure mandates a reduction in homeowner premiums from private insurers by 5% to 25%, which means that companies are likely to be even less prepared to cover future damages. The legislation will also force insurers that write home and auto policies in other states to offer home insurance in Florida -- or be banned from the Sunshine State.

Another charming twist is that the new Florida law will allow the state-run Citizen's Property Insurance to begin competing with private insurers. This was done in the name of "competition," but it will have precisely the opposite effect. Citizens was designed as an insurer of last resort, but as a government company it will not have to worry about profits and other capitalist details. It will be able to offer lower prices because it has an implicit taxpayer guarantee, a la Fannie Mae. These arrangements typically end badly for the taxpayer, who in this case will be absorbing future hurricane risk without even realizing it.

Some insurers have already responded to all this by cancelling policies. And Governor Crist this week issued an "emergency" order freezing premiums and barring cancellations. So not only is the state imposing price controls, it is forcing companies to do business. Where'd the Governor learn economics -- Caracas?

More Americans are choosing to live in places at risk for natural calamity, only to seek a bailout from politicians when the worst happens. This trend is bad enough. But politicians compound the problem when they make insurers the scapegoats for acts of God. The insurance industry has spent billions of dollars to assist the recovery after Katrina. Who's going to pay when the next storm hits?

Off Guard (WP)

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

AFTER DECADES of service, the Coast Guard's fleet of planes, helicopters and cutters is aging, just as the service is trying to recast its mission to emphasize demanding new anti-terrorism efforts. But the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general reported last week that, to date, a scheduled retooling of the Coast Guard fleet has hit more than a few expensive and time-consuming snags, including a slew of basic design errors in the service's new flagship vessel. A congressional roasting of Coast Guard chief Adm. Thad W. Allen followed this week, along with a number of stinging news reports.

Though some of it is overblown, the criticism is deserved. The Coast Guard is guilty of one of the classic errors that other federal agencies within and without the Department of Homeland Security make all the time: poor contract management, an alarmingly -- and unnecessarily -- large source of government waste.

The problem dates to a contract the Coast Guard signed in 2002 with government mega-contractors Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman to manage the fleet's upgrade project and build needed new craft. The centerpiece of the Coast Guard's brand-new force was to be the National Security Cutter, a 425-foot ship capable of operating far from the American shoreline. According to the inspector general, though, the plans for the cutter contained a series of design flaws that could lead to cracks in the hull or deck and require the early retirement of the vessels. On top of that, the contractors botched the $100 million retrofitting of eight smaller cutters, rendering those craft essentially useless to the Coast Guard.

Before an irate House oversight panel, Adm. Allen took responsibility for the performance of his contract managers and detailed needed reforms to the service's contracting process. That's a start. Beyond administrative shakeups, the big challenge will be keeping costs down and ensuring the quality of the rest of the work that the Coast Guard's contractors have to complete, including the repair of the two National Security Cutters already under construction and the eight smaller cutters that the Coast Guard had to suspend from service. After a year's time, the Coast Guard's retooling must be back on course or more drastic measures will be warranted.

WAR NEWS:

Senate Talks On Iraq Take A New Form (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Nicole Gaouette

DOJ_NMG_0126428

The Los Angeles Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — The shape of the Senate debate over President Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq came into clearer focus Thursday as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz) and two other senators introduced a resolution to support the buildup.

After weeks of back-and-forth negotiations over resolutions, it appears likely the Senate debate over the 4-year-old war will pit McCain's resolution of "full support" against one introduced by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) that "disagrees" with the president's proposal.

But how that debate is likely to turn out became even murkier Thursday as lawmakers continued to mull the details of the two lengthy resolutions.

Two Democratic senators who oppose Bush's plan broke with their leaders and said they would not back Warner's measure, which was designed to unify opponents of the troop buildup.

And Republicans wrestled with the sharp divisions in their ranks exposed by the looming war debate next week. "The debate in my caucus has been very passionate on both sides," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who has signed on to Warner's resolution. "Feelings are running high."

Seven GOP lawmakers have expressed support for Warner's resolution. Opponents of the buildup are trying to recruit seven or eight more Republicans to reach the 60 votes that would be needed to overcome a promised GOP filibuster.

And pressure is mounting on undecided Republican senators, particularly moderates and those running for reelection in 2008.

Thursday afternoon, Sens. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) and George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who have criticized the troop buildup but have not endorsed any critical resolution, uncharacteristically rushed past reporters and into the Senate chamber.

Meanwhile, McCain and other senators escalated their attacks on the Warner measure and its supporters.

"Where is the intellectual honesty if you think that you're sending young Americans into harm's way in a futile effort?" McCain asked. "I know if I felt that way, I would say, 'My resolution is a binding resolution that cuts off funding.' That's the intellectually honest approach."

McCain, a former naval aviator who spent more than five years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, unveiled his alternative resolution Thursday afternoon with co-sponsors Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.). Lieberman still caucuses with the Democrats.

Warner's measure is nonbinding and urges the president to consider alternatives to sending more U.S. troops into Baghdad to halt the sectarian fighting.

Wednesday evening, Warner and his co-sponsors specifically added language opposing any funding cutoff, in an effort to woo more Republicans. So far, no additional GOP senators have joined him.

Democratic leaders, including Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin of Michigan, have lined up behind the Warner resolution.

On Thursday, Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), who had been pushing an alternative resolution with Levin that was more critical of the White House plan, abandoned their measure and backed Warner's.

Even Moveon.org, an antiwar grass-roots organization, praised the Senate's move toward a vote on the Warner resolution, saying, "This is an important first step toward Congress blocking the escalation and stopping the war."

But Democratic hopes of holding their caucus together behind the Warner resolution were dashed when Sens. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.) and Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) announced they would vote against the measure.

"The Warner-Levin legislation does not explicitly oppose the escalation, [and] it doesn't contemplate the phased redeployment from Iraq," Dodd said.

He and Feingold advocate immediate steps to start withdrawing U.S. forces from Iraq. Feingold proposed legislation Wednesday that would mandate a withdrawal from Iraq within six months after the bill is passed.

Other antiwar Democrats — including Sens. Barbara Boxer of California and Barack Obama of Illinois — said Thursday they were still reviewing the language in the eight-page Warner measure. California's other senator, Democrat Dianne Feinstein, said she would support it.

McCain and other GOP leaders meanwhile pushed forward with their drive to round up the undecided Republicans who could determine which resolution, if either, emerges from the Senate debate next week.

The McCain measure, which is also nonbinding, explicitly states that U.S. forces "should receive from Congress the full support necessary to carry out the United States mission in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0126429

It does acknowledge past mistakes and lists 11 "benchmarks" for Iraqis, a nod to lawmakers who complain that the Bush administration is not demanding enough of the Iraqi government. These include deploying sufficient forces to help U.S. troops, disarming militias, spending more on reconstruction, and devising a plan to share oil profits between the nation's major sects.

The measure does not spell out any consequences should the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki fail to meet these goals. And it conspicuously does not set any timelines.

"The day you say, 'When you fail to do them by a date certain,' you might as well fold up the tent and go home because the enemy knows exactly what they have to do," Graham said.

Some senators and Middle East experts believe that without outlining specific consequences, the U.S. will never succeed in pushing Iraqi leaders to take the difficult political steps they have avoided for years.

But Senate Republican leaders have managed to prevent any new defections to the anti-buildup camp all week and were sounding defiant Thursday.

"I'm trying to get 60 votes for something other than Warner," said Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), the ebullient No. 2 leader in the caucus.

Bush Senate Allies To Seek Iraq Benchmarks (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Trying to stem defections over Iraq, President Bush's Senate allies want a vote next week calling on the Baghdad government to "make visible concrete progress" toward 11 political, military and economic benchmarks.

The resolution, announced at a hastily called press conference late yesterday, is designed to slow the momentum behind a tougher Iraq measure crafted by Sen. John Warner (R., Va.), the former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, the Connecticut independent who usually caucuses with Democrats, is among the sponsors, but the support comes overwhelmingly from Republicans led by Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.). As recently as Wednesday, Mr. McCain's office had expected no announcement of an alternative Iraq measure so soon. But with the Warner proposal becoming a serious threat, waiting until next week was no longer feasible. "We want to make sure that it's out there," Mr. McCain said.

The Senate floor debate, due to begin Monday, reflects broad discomfort in both parties over Mr. Bush's plan to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq by 21,500, chiefly to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad.

Army Gen. George Casey, the departing top commander in Iraq, told a Senate panel yesterday that he had initially requested about half that number before the president adopted a more ambitious approach. At the same time, a new report by the Congressional Budget Office says the number could be higher than 21,500 once additional support personnel are counted.

By the CBO's estimate, the full commitment could run as high as 35,000 troops, costing $9 billion to $20 billion, depending on whether the peak deployment lasts four months or 12 months. But the Pentagon and congressional staff familiar with the military's request disputed the CBO's analysis and said the 21,500 total included support staff to complement those already on the ground in Iraq.

Sen. McCain has criticized Gen. Casey, who is now being succeeded in Iraq by Gen. David Petraeus, for not being more aggressive in waging the war and seeking more U.S. troops. But his own resolution reflects the conflict that Gen. Casey described in his testimony: how to balance the U.S. military might with the need to prod the Iraqi forces to take more of the lead.

First among Mr. McCain's benchmarks is a major commitment of "new Iraqi security forces to partner" with the larger number of U.S. troops. Other requirements include "disarming individual militias as circumstances warrant," distributing oil resources and building an independent judiciary.

The resolution doesn't spell out what options the U.S. should pursue if Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki fails to meet the benchmarks. And a recent meeting in Baghdad between a House delegation and Iraqi officials including Mr. Maliki showed the limits of Congress's power to pressure the Iraqi government.

Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), chairman of the House Appropriations panel that oversees funding for Iraq, said he warned that unless more progress was made, Congress would be reluctant to fund new equipment for the Iraqi forces. Mr. Murtha and others in the delegation said the Iraqi reply was that the Maliki government would then secure it elsewhere. "I was stunned," Mr. Murtha said.

A handful of liberal Democrats, notably Sens. Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, announced their opposition to the Warner language yesterday as too weak in its opposition to the administration's policy. But at this stage, the Virginian has a strong chance of commanding a solid majority in the Senate; even among the Republicans reluctant to join him, there is little contentment with the direction of the war.

DOJ_NMG_0126430

Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.), an ally of the White House, had surprised many this week when he said he was "considering" supporting the Warner language. Mr. Gregg said yesterday he had decided not to vote for the measure, concerned that the debate is more "a political exercise than a substantive exercise" and that he didn't want to be part of a public rebuke of the president. But Mr. Gregg said he continues to have "serious reservations" about the administration's policy.

Compromise Senate Measure Rebuffing Bush's Iraq Buildup Gathers Support (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1 — A revised Senate resolution criticizing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq drew new support Thursday as two authors of a sterner resolution of disapproval said they would accept the compromise, fashioned by Senator John W. Warner.

Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, and Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, said they would back Mr. Warner's alternative, which declares that "the Senate disagrees with the 'plan' to augment our forces by 21,500," calls on the president to consider other alternatives and urges him to limit the American role in countering sectarian violence.

"The bottom line of our resolutions is the same: Mr. President, don't send more Americans into the middle of civil war," said Mr. Biden, one of the authors of the initial resolution, which was approved last week by the Foreign Relations Committee, which he leads.

Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, was the third author of that plan, favored by the Democratic leadership; on Wednesday night he, too, agreed to support Mr. Warner, a Virginia Republican who has worked with Mr. Levin in the past on major military policy.

But at least two Democrats, Senators Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, said they would oppose the new compromise, objecting to its symbolic nature and to wording they said could tie the hands of war critics on potential future votes over military spending. The Warner resolution says Congress should not reduce financing for troops in the field.

"I regret we are not doing something that has more bite to it," said Mr. Dodd, one of the 2008 presidential contenders in the Senate whose positions on the Iraq resolution will figure into their emerging campaign themes.

The shifting allegiances — and the intense procedural gamesmanship preceding votes next week on Iraq policy — left it uncertain whether Mr. Warner's compromise could attract the 60 votes needed to overcome procedural obstacles. Given the party divide in the Senate, it appeared that about a dozen Republicans would have to break from the president to allow the debate to move forward; he had only six Republicans firmly on board.

The Senate Republican leaders intend to mount vigorous resistance to any plan that rejects Mr. Bush's troop buildup and were contemplating their options on Thursday.

"The chessboard changed last night," said Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, the Republican whip. "We had them checkmated, but now everybody has to go back and look at the board."

The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said Mr. Bush "will continue to exercise his responsibilities as commander in chief" even if the Senate — with House action expected to follow — approved a resolution opposing the buildup. He reiterated the administration view that a clear split between Congress and the president on Iraq could embolden the nation's enemies.

"Osama bin Laden thought that a lack of American resolve was a key reason why he could inspire people to come after us on September 11th," he said. "I am not accusing members of the Senate of inviting carnage on the United States of America. I'm simply saying you think about what impact it may have."

With the framework of the Senate debate still being set, House Democrats pounced on a new Congressional Budget Office estimate that the addition of 20,000 combat troops could require an additional 15,000 to 28,000 related support troops to be deployed.

Representative Martin T. Meehan, a Massachusetts Democrat who was among lawmakers requesting the estimate, noted the numbers exceeded administration projections. He said the report "only confirms what we already know: the president has continually tried to hide the true costs of this war, both in terms of money spent and lives affected."

The first significant Senate vote on the Iraq resolution is scheduled to occur Monday evening, when supporters of Mr. Warner's proposal will seek Senate approval to open the debate — a request that could require 60 votes.

Democrats said they were hoping that they could muster that many votes or reach an agreement with Republicans on the terms of the debate, allowing it to get under way. Then lawmakers would be given a few days to lay out their views before a more crucial cloture vote, which would also require 60 votes, on limiting the debate and moving toward a final vote.

DOJ_NMG_0126431

Many of the senators from both parties who represented potential swing votes on the Warner resolution said they would be reviewing it over the next few days before taking a stand. The latest draft includes 22 paragraphs of findings, 12 more expressing the “sense of the Congress” on the best options, and 2 requiring periodic progress reports.

Republicans were meeting privately on Friday at a policy retreat and the Iraq resolution was certain to be a major topic.

A few prominent Democrats quickly came out for the Warner plan, which was written with Senators Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, even as they expressed reservations.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York and a leading presidential contender, said that while she did not support all the provisions in the resolution, she would support it. “It makes the point, which is important,” she said. “We’re trying to get the attention of this president, to change course.”

But the outcome remained unsettled. As Senator Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana walked from the closed-door meeting of fellow Democratic senators, she declared, “It’s still not a done deal.”

While some Democrats argued that the Iraq resolution was too accommodating to the administration and were weighing opposition, she disagreed. “It sends a very powerful signal to the president,” she said.

Senate Prepares To Debate Opposition To Bush's Iraq Policy (MCT)

By Margaret Talev And Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Senate will begin formal debate Monday on legislation opposing President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq, but Democrats aren't sure that they've got the 60 votes they'll need to break Republican obstruction and move to a final vote.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and his leadership team said Thursday afternoon that they didn't have a firm vote count for the bipartisan resolution that the leadership has decided to support. It effectively declares no confidence in Bush's plan to send more U.S. troops to Baghdad and urges him to reconsider. They acknowledged that they could fall short because liberal Democrats consider the resolution too weak.

Senate Democrats met behind closed doors Thursday afternoon as their leaders assured them that the nonbinding bipartisan resolution was only a first step and that stronger measures to bring the war to a close would follow.

"It's a first step," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., "and a second step is following very quickly afterward where we're going to try to do something binding."

The bipartisan resolution was developed by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., a respected centrist who's long been influential on military matters and is World War II veteran and a former Navy secretary. Democratic leaders chose to endorse his plan and drop a more critical version sponsored by Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del., and Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., because they feel it has a better chance of winning enough votes to break obstruction from Republicans who back Bush's plan.

Warner's resolution opposes Bush's 17,500 troop buildup for Baghdad but supports the 4,000 troop increase against Sunni Muslim insurgents and al-Qaida in Anbar province. It also declares that it would be wrong to cut off funding for troops in the field. Some Democrats oppose those last two provisions.

Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., said he opposes Warner's resolution, and he hasn't ruled out joining Republicans to block a final vote on it.

"I don't know why people, especially those who voted against this war in the first place, would at this terrible stage want to vote for something that essentially reauthorizes this action and even intensifies it in places like al Anbar province, where most of our people are dying," Feingold said. "That strikes me as an odd strategy for people who want to end the war."

Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., also said he opposes the resolution, but said he wouldn't vote to block it. Biden and Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said they could accept Warner's approach for now.

Some key Republicans said they hadn't made up their minds, and Senate Republican Whip Trent Lott of Mississippi said he thought he could rally enough opponents to sustain a filibuster. "I'm always working," he said.

Senate Republicans huddle in a retreat on Friday, when their leaders plan to pressure wavering members to stick behind Bush. The president will apply pressure, too, when he meets with Senate Republicans at the White House in the afternoon and entertains them and their wives at a reception.

Reid left open the possibility Thursday that he might bring in South Dakota Sen. Tim Johnson, who's recuperating from brain surgery, if Democrats need his vote to move the resolution forward.

"We'll have to see. He's doing very well," Reid said in a brief interview with McClatchy Newspapers.

But Johnson's chief of staff said later that while the senator is making good progress, he physically wouldn't be able to return to the Senate to cast a vote by next week.

DOJ_NMG_0126432

While Reid stressed that there was no firm plan to try to get Johnson to the Senate to vote, the fact that he was willing to consider it demonstrates how fluid the parliamentary situation remains.

Most Senate Democrats are backing the Warner approach as their best bet to build a large bipartisan majority behind a no-confidence vote in Bush's plan. They got potentially important grass-roots support Thursday when the anti-war group Moveon.org issued a statement calling the Warner plan an "important first step" toward stopping the war.

The group also assured liberal lawmakers who were on the fence that "the compromise language would not constrain the Congress from using all of its powers to stop the escalation and force President Bush to implement an exit plan."

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., who opposes a troop buildup, joked that Moveon's position was making him second-guess his own inclination to back Warner. He said of many Democrats: "I think they're just so intent on criticizing the president that they probably see this as a vehicle. That's unfortunate."

Meanwhile, some lawmakers continued to propose other resolutions, although none appeared to have as much support as Warner's does.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn., joined with Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina to introduce a resolution that supports Bush but also tells the Iraqi government that it must meet performance benchmarks for the United States to continue its engagement long term.

Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., chairman of the Appropriations Committee, said he'll introduce a resolution that proposes to end the 2002 congressional authorization for the war.

Senate Democrats Split On Measure Opposing Bush (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 2, 2007

Senate Democratic leaders who decided to back a Republican resolution against President Bush's Iraq war plan in hopes of winning broad bipartisan support ran into stiff resistance yesterday from an unexpected quarter -- fellow Democrats.

The Democratic dust-up came on a day when opponents of the president's policies received some unexpected ammunition. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office reported that Bush's plan to deploy roughly 20,000 additional U.S. combat troops to Iraq is likely to require at least 15,000 support personnel, and possibly as many as 28,000.

That could mean the plan would involve up to 48,000 troops and contractors, at a cost of between $9 billion and $13 billion for the first four months and up to $27 billion for the first year.

The compromise resolution states that the Senate disagrees with the president's plan and urges Bush to instead consider all other options for achieving his strategic goals.

Democratic defections would probably not prevent the legislation from passing the Senate, provided that the measure gets to a final vote over a threatened filibuster by Republicans. But defections would deprive Democratic leaders of a strong united vote against Bush's decision to boost troop levels in Iraq by 21,500.

Two Democratic senators, Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) and Russell Feingold (Wis.), came out forcefully against the compromise, saying the newly worded resolution goes too far toward GOP positions. Dodd called it "essentially an endorsement of the status quo" in Iraq, while Feingold denounced it as "a deal with the devil."

"This is the United States Senate. This is not some city council somewhere," Dodd said. "It seems to me sending something down that engages the president, that forces the administration to pay attention is something we ought to be considering."

Several other Democrats said they remain undecided; many of them are pushing binding legislation to cap troop levels, force a new vote to authorize the war or begin bringing troops home.

For days, two groups of senators had backed competing resolutions of opposition: a sharply worded version by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), and a more conciliatory resolution by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.). The stalemate was broken Wednesday night when Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) backed a revised version of Warner's resolution.

Democratic leaders noted that the compromise puts them in a far stronger position to defeat a Republican-led filibuster against the resolution when it is brought to a vote next week. The first showdown will come Monday afternoon, when the Senate will vote on whether to proceed to the debate. At least seven Republicans, and possibly more than 10, could back the compromise, worked out by Warner and Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.). If, as expected, Democratic opponents of the resolution side with their leaders to break a filibuster, the measure would have close to the necessary 60 votes, but it is not there yet.

DOJ_NMG_0126433

If the Senate does break the filibuster, only to see half a dozen Democrats oppose the resolution, Democratic leaders could still pass the measure but would be deprived of the broad, bipartisan vote they want to send a clear signal to the White House.

Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who led the war effort in Iraq before being nominated as Army chief of staff, confirmed that the 21,500 troops in Bush's plan is not the total, as indicated in yesterday's CBO report. In written answers to the Senate Armed Services Committee, he said that "certain additional combat support and combat service support capabilities" would be required. They include "logistical enablers, intelligence assets, military police, and a command/control node," although the numbers would be "minimal."

Democrats said those answers directly contradict statements made by the current Army chief of staff just a week ago.

"The CBO report only confirms what we already know: The president has continually tried to hide the true costs of this war," said Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), chairman of the House Armed Services subcommittee on oversight and investigations.

Army and White House officials said they are reviewing the CBO report and have not yet determined the number of support personnel needed.

During a confirmation hearing yesterday, Warner pressed Casey on why he had asked for fewer than half the additional troops Bush now wants -- two combat brigades instead of five.

"I did not want to bring one more American soldier into Iraq than was necessary to accomplish the mission," Casey responded.

To opponents of the Senate resolution, such developments only bolstered their resolve to demand stronger action.

"A political victory is not more important than ending this war," Feingold said.

At issue are three clauses in a resolution that is now 11 pages long.

Of particular concern to some Democrats is a clause stating, "The Congress should not take any action that will endanger United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field." That provision was added to win GOP support. Levin said it would not prevent binding legislative action to stop further deployments.

But some Democrats took offense at equating a cutoff of funds with the endangerment of troops and said it would bind their hands in the coming months.

They also objected to a call for continued "vigorous operations in Anbar province," where U.S. forces have been battling al-Qaeda-linked Sunni extremists.

Another phrase saying that the resolution "should not be interpreted as precipitating any immediate reduction in" present troop levels was seen by some as an endorsement of the status quo.

Majority In Senate Support 'Stay The Course' Resolution (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 2, 2007

A bipartisan majority in the Senate yesterday united behind a firm "stay the course" resolution on the war in Iraq, despite searing public criticism from both sides in Congress over President Bush's handling of the war.

The resolution is critical of the war's execution and condemns any effort by Mr. Bush to send reinforcements to the region. In the measure, the Senate also promises not to cut off funding for the increasingly unpopular war.

"Congress should not take any action that will endanger United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field, as such an action with respect to funding would undermine their safety or harm their effectiveness in pursuing their assigned missions," says the resolution, authored mainly by Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican.

Although backers say they are deeply dissatisfied with the execution of the war, the resolution says that the United States "should continue vigorous operations" in parts of Iraq and that early withdrawal "would present a threat to regional and world peace."

Sen. Russ Feingold, the Wisconsin Democrat who has always opposed the war, called the resolution weak and misguided.

"The resolution rejects redeploying U.S. troops and supports moving a misguided military strategy from one part of Iraq to another," he said. "The American people have rejected the president's Iraq strategy, and it's time for Congress to end our military involvement in this war."

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat, also said yesterday that he would oppose the resolution because it doesn't call for withdrawing the troops quickly enough.

"I strongly oppose the Warner-Levin legislation," said Mr. Dodd, who voted in 2002 in favor of the war. "It is essentially an endorsement of the status quo, an endorsement I simply cannot make in light of the dire circumstances in Iraq, and the need for meaningful action now."

DOJ_NMG_0126434

Debate over the resolution angered some anti-war voters who were crucial to Democrats' victory in the November midterm elections.

"The whole reason so many of us worked for Democratic candidates was so that they would get a majority in Congress and bring the troops home," said Tina Richards, who described herself as a lifelong Republican from Missouri whose opposition to the Iraq war turned her into a Democrat. "They're in the majority now, but they won't bring the troops home."

She said her son is a Marine reservist who expects to be called up as part of Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

"It's pointless. These are nonbinding resolutions, and they won't do a thing to bring our troops home," Mrs. Richards said. "This is the definition of insanity; they're banging their heads against the wall and expecting a different result."

But the nonbinding resolution was embraced yesterday by several key members of both parties, including Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, and Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican. Both men, like Mr. Warner, voted in 2002 to go to war with Iraq. Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat who opposed the war, also signed on to the Warner resolution.

Although both sides agree that there is a majority of support to approve the resolution, there is far less certainty about whether it has the 60 votes needed to overcome any filibuster.

Approval of the resolution will have no real effect on war policy because it's nonbinding, said Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, adding that its criticism of the administration's policy serves only to undermine the war effort.

"We are not simply speaking to the president," Mr. Kyl said. "Everyone else in the world will get that message. ... Those are the words that will resonate around the world."

Is Iran Fighting Proxy War With U.S. In Iraq?; Interview With Howard Dean (CNN)

CNN THE SITUATION ROOM, February 2, 2007

THIS IS A RUSH TRANSCRIPT. THIS COPY MAY NOT BE IN ITS FINAL FORM AND MAY BE UPDATED.

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: And to our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM and it's happening right now.

As bombs go off across Iraq, the top U.S. military commander, up for a promotion, gets a grilling about the violence he left behind.

Is Iran using Shiite militants to fight a proxy war with U.S. troops in Iraq?

CNN's Christiane Amanpour will tell us what they're saying in Tehran. That's where she is right now.

And Democrats divided -- first, Joe Biden's attack on rival presidential candidates. Now shocking allegations from female members of a Congressional Caucus. I'll talk with the Democratic National Committee chairman, Howard Dean, this hour.

I'm Wolf Blitzer.

You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Market shoppers and bus passengers blown up by bombs. Students and teachers shot dead.

As fresh violence ripped through Iraq today, the outgoing U.S. military commander there was in the hot seat up on Capitol Hill, where there's a debate on whether he should get the top job in the U.S. Army.

CNN's Michael Ware is in Baghdad.

Christiane Amanpour is in Tehran.

But let's turn to our senior Pentagon correspondent, Jamie McIntyre -- Jamie.

JAMIE MCINTYRE, CNN SENIOR PENTAGON CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, several senators say they have not yet made up their mind if they will vote for the confirmation of General George Casey to be the Army chief of staff. Among them, one of his sharpest critics, Senator John McCain.

(BEGIN VIDEO TAPE)

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN (R), ARIZONA: I question seriously the judgment was -- that was employed and your execution of your responsibilities in Iraq. And we have paid a very, very heavy price in American blood and treasure because of what is now agreed to by literally everyone is a failed policy.

MCINTYRE (voice-over): Casey's critics fault him for failing to adapt as the war took a turn for the worse and only asking for more troops in December, after President Bush ordered an overhaul of Iraq strategy.

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY, U.S. ARMY: I did not want to bring one more American soldier into Iraq than was necessary to accomplish the mission.

MCINTYRE: Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin pressed Casey on President Bush's comment that Iraq was headed to a slow failure until the president himself stepped in.

CASEY: I actually don't see it as slow failure. I actually see it as slow progress.

MCINTYRE: In fact, Casey says he still feels only two brigades of additional U.S. troops are needed in Iraq, not the five the president ultimately ordered. And he stubbornly defended his strategy.

CASEY: It may not have produced the results on the time lines that people expected or wanted, but I do believe that it has laid the foundation for our ultimate success in Iraq.

(END VIDEO TAPE)

MCINTYRE: General Casey does not appear to be headed for the unanimous endorsement that his replacement, General Petraeus, got from the U.S. Senate. But he may be confirmed.

Among people who said they would vote for him, last hour on your show, Wolf, Senator Carl Levin said he would vote for him even though he had made some mistakes, because he didn't hold him responsible for what he called the bigger policy mistakes of the Bush administration -- Wolf.

BLITZER: And Senator Levin is the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, so he has some sway.

Thank you, Jamie, for that.

Meanwhile, there's new word today that the troop increase in Iraq could cost $27 billion for a year long deployment. A Congressional Budget Office report says it could also mean thousands of support troops being sent, in addition to the roughly 21,000 combat troops called for in the Pentagon's deployment plan.

In Iraq today, two suicide bombers blew themselves up in a crowded market in the town of Hillah. That's south of Baghdad. Sixty-one people were killed, 150 others wounded. In Diyala Province, the U.S. military says Iraqi troops stopped a suicide truck bomber at the gates of an Iraqi Army compound. The driver was shot dead but the vehicle blew up, wounding 13 Iraqi soldiers.

Police imposed a strict curfew tonight in the southern province of Najaf, where a bloody battle this week pitted Iraqi and U.S. forces against hundreds of gunmen from what Iraqi officials described as a Messianic killer cult. We're now learning new details of that clash.

And joining us now in Baghdad, our correspondent, Michael Ware -- you know, we've seen this phone video now of these bodies from that battle in Najaf the other day. I know you're investigating -- Michael, what went on?

It's very confusing. The only thing we know for sure, there are a lot of dead people there.

What are you picking up?

MICHAEL WARE, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, what we do finally know is that on Sunday just gone, there was a major engagement, a major battle just north of the holy city of Najaf, south of the capital, Baghdad.

Now, according to the Iraqi government, at the center of this battle was this apocalyptic death cult. I mean, this group who believe that a messiah was among them and had returned.

The government claims that part of their plan, that this sect's intention was to enter the holy city and assassinate the Shia religious sect leadership. They believed that this was part of a prophecy.

Now, this is what the government says, and they say that this group of about 600 or 700 strong had taken land north of the holy city, dug entrenchments, gun positions. They had heavy weapons and that essentially they were approaching zero hour in their deadly plan and government forces intervened.

Beyond that, what we actually do know is that a battle did took place, that government forces did engage irregular forces north of the capital. We also know that Iraqi Army units with American advisers attached became involved. They were quickly enveloped. The American advisers called in two Apache helicopter gunships, one of which went down during the fight. As the battle raged throughout the evening, F- 16s were called in. A-10 and AC-130 gunships and aircraft were also called in. A Stryker unit and some infantry from the American forces, several hundred troops in total, were also brought in.

Now, according to U.S. officials, at the end of this blazing battle, there was at least 250 dead and they've hauled in 400 detainees or more so far.

Now, the Americans, however, are a little bit more cautious about just who they were fighting. Military intelligence -- military spokesmen described them as a Shia breakaway group.

Now, they're saying the jury is still out on whether it was actually this apocalyptic cult, although some officers refer to it as a David Koresh like organization, the American cult leader in Waco, Texas some years ago.

However, there's other stories, that this is a faction upon faction among the Shia militias; that this was a massacre of anti-Iranian forces; that this was a tribal dispute.

Basically, at the end of the day, Wolf, no one saw this battle. No one really knows how it began. And the facts are still emerging from the ruins of this engagement.

BLITZER: I know you'll stay on top of the story for us, as you always do.

Michael, thanks very much.

WARE: Thank you, Wolf.

DOJ_NMG_0126436

BLITZER: And a stunning new report today says that on average, more than 1,000 Iraqis were displaced from their homes every day in 2006, since last February's bombing of a Shiite holy site in Samarra. The International Organization for Migration says more than 330,000 Iraqis have been displaced since that attack, which triggered an all out round of sectarian violence. And it's still raging in Iraq.

Iran today began celebrations -- anniversary celebrations, that is -- for its Islamic Revolutionary, which brought hard-line clerics to power a generation ago.

But is Iran exporting that revolution to neighboring Iraq by aiding Shiite militants?

And joining us now from Tehran is our chief international correspondent, Christiane Amanpour.

A rare opportunity for us to get insight -- what are they saying to you, Iranians, about these very serious U.S. allegations, Christiane, that the Iranians are helping foment this insurgency inside Iraq?

CHRISTIANE AMANPOUR, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, officially, they're not saying anything, except for veiled comments today on the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution to remain united against "U.S. conspiracies."

Unofficially, sources with very intimate knowledge of the government and government policy have told me that they are really surprised to hear these allegations, that they would not be overtly attacking or urging attacks against American soldiers there, that they want a stable Iraq because it's in their interests. And while they admit that they have a struggle with the United States over issues such as the nuclear issue and regional influence, that they wish they could work with the United States, as they did in Afghanistan, to resolve the situation inside Iraq.

BLITZER: The Americans insist that the Iranians are providing sophisticated equipment, including improvised explosive devices of a new generation, capable of penetrating the best U.S. armor.

Have you had a chance to ask them if they're providing this kind of equipment to Iraqis?

AMANPOUR: Yes, I have. I've asked them. And I've asked them, this is not new, these allegations. And I've asked them over the many times that I've been here and when I've met government officials.

And they always deny it. And their answer is always the same, that our interest is in a stable Iraq, that we want a democratic and free Iraqi government, which there is right now, the Shiite dominated Iraqi government, and that, yes, we would like "occupying forces out of Iraq," but once the conditions are set for them to leave Iraq. Because if not, they say, these sources, then Iraq will Iraq will be in an even bigger mess than it is right now.

BLITZER: What about the Iranian nuclear program that the U.S. and others -- the Europeans -- suspect is designed to build a bomb? How does this tension, the current tension between the U.S. and Iran, play into that bigger issue of Iran and a potential nuclear bomb?

AMANPOUR: Well, it certainly does. And, of course, while the West and many in the media talk about a nuclear bomb, here they are insistent, as they always have been, that that is not what they're pursuing. And they always point to the IAEA, which said it does not have evidence to anything other than a nuclear program.

They said that they are going to be announcing some kind of new development in their nuclear program over the next 10 days. We don't know what this is or whether it will happen. But we do know that they're taking journalists to one of the facilities this weekend. Among those journalists will be me and a cameraman from CNN, Mark Phillips (ph).

So maybe we'll know a little bit more over the weekend.

BLITZER: Our chief international correspondent, Christiane Amanpour, inside Iran.

Christiane, we're going to stay in close touch with you.

And will the American people support the Bush administration if it decides to get tough with Iran?

Coming up, I'll speak about that and more with Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns. He's over at the State Department right now.

Jack Cafferty is in New York with The Cafferty File -- Jack.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN CORRESPONDENT: It doesn't get much better than that, you know? You've got Michael Ware in Baghdad. You've got Christiane Amanpour in Tehran. I mean I don't know why you'd want to watch anybody else for news about what's going on in the Middle East, do you?

BLITZER: No. I totally agree.

CAFFERTY: And it isn't in my nature to be sucking up to the management around here, but that's pretty good stuff.

BLITZER: Yes.

CAFFERTY: $75,000 a minute, Wolf -- that's even more than you make. That's how much money Exxon Mobil earned every minute of last year. The oil giant today reported the biggest annual profit ever for a U.S. corporation -- $39.5 billion.

The company topped its own past record of $36.1 billion back in 2005. That wasn't such a good year.

Keep in mind that last year oil prices did hit a record high of $77 a barrel. Gasoline hit $3 a gallon.

Now, then gas prices spiked, a lot of politicians were quick to start calling for a windfall profit tax on the oil companies. Some of them even suggested breaking up the biggest oil companies, like Exxon.

But the talk died down once gas fell back to closer to $2 a gallon.

Oil company executives insist that oil prices go through boom and bust cycles, so their profit margins are about average compared with other industries. They also say they need to keep their large profits and size in order to compete against big foreign oil companies.

So here's our question -- what's your reaction to Exxon energy $75,000 a minute every single minute for an entire year last year?

E-mail us at caffertyfile@cnn.com or go to cnn.com/caffertyfile.

BLITZER: That adds up pretty quickly.

CAFFERTY: Yes, it does.

BLITZER: We're talking billions and billions.

CAFFERTY: Oh, yes.

BLITZER: Thank you very much, Jack.

Up ahead, accusations rocking the Congressional Hispanic Caucus and pitting two California Democratic lawmakers against each other in an increasingly public feud.

Also, the controversy over presidential candidate Senator Joe Biden's remarks about his potential rival, Senator Barack Obama. I'll talk about it with the Democratic Party chairman, Howard Dean. And love and politics Italian style. We're going to show you how a marital spat wound up making headlines and captivating a country. You're going to want to see what's going on in Italy right now.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: New developments in the bomb scares that paralyzed parts of Boston yesterday. Two men have now been charged in what turned out be a promotion for a TV show on a network owned by CNN's parent company, Turner Broadcasting.

But the story took another strange twist in front of the TV cameras earlier today.

Let's go to Boston.

CNN's Dan Lothian joining us with more on this -- Dan.

DAN LOTHIAN, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Hello, Wolf.

Well, the two men accused of placing those devices across the Boston area and causing a security scare were in court today. At their arraignment, they're facing some very serious charges. But afterward, they didn't appear to be taking it all very seriously.

(BEGIN VIDEO TAPE)

LOTHIAN (voice-over): Just released on $2,500 bail each, Sean Stevens and Peter Berdovsky hugged supporters then launched into an odd rant about haircuts and hairstyles.

PETER BERDOVSKY, DEFENDANT: For example, Afro, I think, comes kind of from the '70s. But then again, there's other styles, like the greased up hair, when they actually use grease.

LOTHIAN: Despite repeated attempts by reporters to get serious comments, the two men did not stray from their unusual performance.

SEAN STEVENS, DEFENDANT: I'm getting sort of more due to -- to get a haircut because it's getting in my bangs now.

LOTHIAN: Earlier, not guilty pleas were entered on charges of placing a hoax device and disorderly conduct. The two were conducting a marketing campaign for an ad agency hired by The Cartoon Network, which is owned by CNN's parent company, Turner Broadcasting.

It led to a massive bomb scare across the Boston area. Blinking electronic signs were found under bridges, highways and other locations.

JOHN GROSSMAN, MASSACHUSETTS ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL: It's clear that by placing a bomb like device where they did, the intent was to get that attention, at least initially, by causing fear, unrest, that there was a bomb located in this location. MICHAEL RICH, DEFENSE ATTORNEY: I don't think that anybody had -- had any intent to -- to raise fear, concern or alarm.

LOTHIAN: Outside the courthouse, supporters said authorities over reacted.

JAYSON PALM, SUPPORTER: They were just doing their jobs, really. This was part of an advertising campaign. They were getting paid to do this.

(END VIDEO TAPE)

DOJ_NMG_0126438

LOTHIAN: I asked the defense attorney about the odd behavior of his clients. He said they were "performing." He went on to say that they're still getting over their shock of what has happened to them over the past 24 hours -- Wolf.

BLITZER: I don't think I've ever seen a news conference like that during my years covering these kinds of stories.

Have you, Dan?

LOTHIAN: I have not. It was quite bizarre. I didn't know what was happening when it was happening at the time. And even after viewing it, it was still shocking.

BLITZER: Yes. I was watching it on TV and I was saying whoa, whoa, these guys are something.

All right, Dan, thank you very much.

The Internet, by the way, played a very important role in uncovering the background of those light installations placed around Boston.

let's get some more details on this promotion gone wrong.

Our Internet reporter, Jacki Schechner, has that -- Jacki.

JACKI SCHECHNER, CNN INTERNET REPORTER: Wolf, these promotional ads weren't just all over Boston and cities around the country, but there were photos of them all over the Internet. It's something that some blogs picked up on yesterday.

We asked the Boston police whether they've got any tips from bloggers, and they said that their investigative unit was monitoring blogs.

We want to give you an example of what has been online. This is Todd Venderlin's photo he uploaded to Flicker.com. He took this photograph more than two weeks ago. And it shows right here that promotional ad underneath a bridge in South Boston. You can get a closer up look of it there. And then he took it down and you can see what it looks like on the under side.

There's also another woman named Riga Murthy (ph), who took this photograph and uploaded it on January 21st. She says that she thought, when she first saw it, it was part of a popular street game that somebody posted in the comments, that it was, in fact, a Mooninite from the "Aqua Teen Hunger Force" show on The Cartoon Network.

Now, these things are big fodder online now. They're up on eBay. You can bid on them. This one was a starting bid of $2,000. It's a guy named Jack who says he got it outside a bar in Philadelphia. He was a big fan of the show and was going to hang onto it, Wolf. But he says now he thinks he can make some money off of it.

BLITZER: Two grand, nothing to sneeze at.

Thanks very much for that, Jacki.

Coming up, intra-party warfare leading one California Democrat to quit the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. We're going to have details of an increasingly ugly feud.

Plus, my interview with the Democratic Party chairman, Howard Dean. I'll ask him about presidential candidate Joe Biden's controversial remarks about possible White House contender, Barack Obama, and more.

Stay with us. We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: The Senate has gone forward and raised the federal minimum wage.

Let's go to our Carol Costello.

She's got the latest details -- Carol.

CAROL COSTELLO, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Yes, we just got word a couple of minutes ago, Wolf.

It looks like we're moving closer to an increase in the minimum wage. The Senate just passed, by a vote of 94-3, a bill to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour. The Senate's legislation includes tax cuts for small businesses.

Now, before the bill goes to the president's desk, the differences between the House and Senate versions will have to be ironed out. That will happen in a conference committee. Of course, we'll be following that for you.

Infighting spread today in Gaza despite a three-day-old cease- fire. Hamas militants opened fire in a raid on the Fatah Preventive Security Building in the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahiya. Elsewhere, in central Gaza, Hamas gunmen ambushed a convoy purportedly carrying arms to Mahmoud Abbas' presidential guard. Fatah says the convoy was carrying humanitarian aid. Today's fighting left five dead and dozens injured. It violates a cease-fire which went into effect on Tuesday. More on that thwarted execution plot in Birmingham, England. British police say they're seeking further detention of nine people arrested in a series of raids yesterday. Under British law, police must apply with Magistrate's Court for permission to hold suspects up to 28 days before charging them. The detainees are suspected of plotting to kidnap a British Muslim soldier then torture and behead him. The soldier has not been named.

And British police are confirming that Prime Minister Tony Blair was recently questioned over allegations that his Labor Party tried to reward political donors with titles of nobility. It is the second time police have interviewed Mr. Blair about these allegations. They say he is not a suspect and cooperated fully. Four people, including Mr. Blair's senior political adviser, have been arrested in connection to this scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0126439

That's a look at the headlines right now -- Wolf.

BLITZER: They've got scandals all over the world happening right now.

We're going to have another one in Italy.

That's coming up, as well.

Carol, thank you.

Also coming up, when it comes to Iran meddling the United States in Iraq, where is the evidence?

We're going to ask the undersecretary of state Nicholas Burns. He's standing by live.

Plus, my interview with the Democratic Party chairman, Howard Dean. We'll talk about politics, what's going on in the presidential race. That's coming up, as well.

Also, details of the feud that's unfolding right now among Democrats that's rocking the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. It's getting very ugly.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: To our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM, where new pictures and information are arriving all the time. Happening now, the former top U.S. military commander in Iraq grilled at his confirmation hearing by senators critical of the way he executed the troubled U.S. military mission in Iraq. General George Casey now up for Army chief of staff. He told the Armed Services Committee President Bush's troop increase will give commanders greater flexibility.

